the United States, for the slaves were considered and protected as property on both sides of the Spanish line, and the emigrants from the United States found the additional quantity of granted land they could acquire for every slave, made their removal advantageous. Who, then, under these circumstances, would have thought the property of slaves insecure by the provision in the treaty for the maintenance and security of property? Anterior to the treaty of cession the citizens of the old United States received large sums of money for slaves sold and transported by the avenue of the Mississippi to Louisiana; and had the treaty preserved a total silence, with regard to the protection of property, it would be irreconcilable with justice that we should first sell those slaves to the inhabitants, and, after securing the price, proceed to emancipate them, or lessen their utility or value by emancipating their descendants. We are asked to bind, limit, or manacle the proposed State of Missouri. Are we to do so because we are more trustworthy respecting their own interests than themselves? We have legislated over the people of that Territory for seventeen years, and, during all that time, our humanity slumbered. We suffered slaves to pass the Mississippi, and thereby enhanced the price of our lands; and, in proportion as we anticipate the closing the land sales, and the cessation of our interest in permitting slaves to go, our humane sympathies are excited until we at last become so willing to prohibit slavery that we contemplate a new sort of State, with only a portion of the features and capacities retained by the other parties to our great compact.

I will now give attention to what gentlemen who favor the restriction have urged, on the score of precedent. They say they are authorized, from the restrictions imposed on Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to build the power of Congress to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from New York on precedents. Precedents may be useful to impart to free government uniform and steady nerves, and to guard against the encroachments of prejudice and passion. There can, however, be no precedent in relation to the powers of our national compact of such antiquity as to acquire any great portion of authority when unaccompanied by demonstrations of their orthodoxy; for the Constitution was only adopted in 1787, since which, and until this Winter, the history and journal of the Convention have been secret. But, in subscribing to the authority and utility of precedents, it should be remembered that they are not to transcend their legitimate sphere. When a jurisdiction, power, or authority, is found or known to exist, precedents are interposed, that it may not be perverted by the use of arbitrary discretion; but this jurisdiction or power must be shown to exist before we admit its need of precedents for its regulation. An attempt is here made, not to regulate the powers and business of Congress by precedents, but to derive those powers also from the same source. If precedents were lawful weapons in accomplishing such an object, how easy would be the task of showing that the State Legislatures could pass bankrupt laws, which they have always done, although the supreme tribunal has lately declared a different opinion? How easy also might the obligation of the State magistrates and judges to execute the laws of the Union be established, although denied by the most respectable authorities in the States? Indeed, the admission of precedent as authority on such topics would ripen the confederacy into that condition, at no very distant period, in which it might be asserted that the powers of Congress, like those of the British Parliament, had their base in precedent, and not in the grants of our written Constitution. I am, however, wrong in wasting time in exceptions against the improper use of precedents; for, with the admission that precedents could as well have place in giving birth to political power as in the regulation of confessed powers, the restrictionists will acquire nothing serviceable to them, because precedents are in no case valuable unless considered as adjustments, on mature deliberation, of contested questions; whereas, the people of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, having consented to all the regulations sought for by Congress, and those regulations being called into existence, as it were, by their request, the question of the power of Congress was not disputed or discussed. It is admitted that the people of Missouri are unwilling to be restricted, and the question now first presents itself as to our Constitutional power to impose the restriction without their consent.

The view which I have submitted suffices, in my humble opinion, to show that the position assumed by the restrictionists is not susceptible of aid from precedents, and if it was, that there are no legitimate or proper precedents to aid it; and here I would be willing to rest this topic, were it not for the strange and objectionable inferences which gentlemen strive to deduce from the ordinance of 1787, for the government of the territory northwest of the Ohio river. The fourth section of that ordinance declares "that certain articles shall be considered as articles of compact between the original States and the people and States of that Territory, and forever remain unalterable, unless by common consent:" and the sixth article declares that "there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the territory."

Gentlemen insist that this article restrained the people of Ohio, and the other States formed in that Territory, from adopting any provision inconsistent with it in their State constitutions, without the consent of Congress, and at the same time afforded an instance of the authority of Congress thus to restrain the new States. This aspect of the ordinance is certainly plausible at first view, but not dangerous; for the idea of a power in Congress not only to impose on the people of a State a constitution not dictated by, or growing out of the federal compact, but to impose such arbitrary constitution on a people before they have sprung into existence, as was the case with regard to the then future or expected communities of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, is apt to shock the imagination, and stimulate such further inquiry as must obviate the error.

I contend that the sixth article of the ordinance, whatever be its mode of expression, was temporary in its operation, and only intended to be adopted for the government of the Territory whilst a territory, dependent on the legislation of Congress, and would have been no part of the State constitution of Ohio, unless by the free adoption of the people of that State. To give it this interpretation consists both with the obligations of Congress and the peculiar relation between Congress and the Territory. It will consist, in the first place, with the obligation incurred by Congress in the acceptance of the cession of the territory from Virginia, the deed of cession having provided that the States to be formed in the Territory should be distinct, republican States, and admitted members of the federal Union, having the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States, which they would not have, unless permitted to govern themselves in all respects where not restrained by the federal obligation. I say, in the second place, that the interpretation I give best consists with the relations which existed between Congress and the Territory; for the communities forming in the Territory, being destined for free States, and Congress having only a temporary power over the Territory, it was not presumable that Congress, in such circumstances, could desire to make an everlasting regulation—no, not even by the consent of the people, who were not then in being, or in a condition to do any thing which would bind the future people of the country, assembled in convention.

Permit me now, sir, to beg a more particular examination of the ordinance of 1787, and a view of its parts in their just distribution. The ordinance comprehends—

- 1st. A constitution and bill of rights;
- 2dly. Provisions for the creation of new States;
- 3dly. A recognition of the mutual interests and relations which shall subsist between the new States and Congress.

The first two parts, the constitution and bill of rights, and the provisions for the birth of new States, were intended as temporary regulations. The third, or the part in relation to the respective or mutual interests of Congress and the new States, was to remain perpetual.

1st. The ordinance comprehends a constitution and bill of rights. The constitution is found in the erection of a Territorial government. In prescribing the respective departments of that government, as that there shall be a Governor, to be appointed by Congress, who should have the appointment of magistrates and civil officers; that there should be a General Assembly, to be elected by the free white male inhabitants of the counties and townships, to serve for the term of two years; that there should be a Legislative Council, to consist of a certain number, and appointed as therein prescribed; that the Council and General Assembly should have legislative powers, subject, however, to the negative of the Governor; that there should be a secretary, judges, &c.; that there should be no law affecting private contracts, nor contrary to the ordinance, &c. Here, then, we have a Territorial government, with legislative, executive, and judiciary powers; but the ordinance affords more. The framers of this Territorial constitution were men fashioned after the manners and notions of our English ancestors, who have always conceived that a grant or recognition of legislative power should be accompanied by a magna charta, or bill of rights, declaratory of certain fundamental principles, by which those intrusted with such important power should be guided. They therefore furnish in the ordinance a bill of rights, which, like similar declarations theretofore adopted by many of the States, was an imitation of the declarations of magna charta and of the bill of rights of the first year of William and Mary. We accordingly find it provided that the people shall be entitled to the habeas corpus, trial by jury, representation, judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law; that bail should be allowed, fines be moderate, cruel or unusual punishments not inflicted; that no man should be deprived of liberty or property but by the judgment of his peers or the laws of the land, &c.

2d. The ordinance has provisions for the creation of new States, which are found in the fifth article, prescribing the time and circumstances in which the new States should be formed.

3d. The ordinance contains a recognition of certain relations of interest between the General Government and the new States, which is found in the 4th article, and were intended to remain perpetual. But an examination of the provisions of the 4th article (which all will agree was to be perpetual) will prove the just caution of Congress in abstaining from all pretence of binding those people after the period designed for their emancipation. For these perpetual provisions are mere declarations of the obvious rights and obligations which would at all events have governed their mutual relations, if not inserted in the ordinance, although expressed to remove doubts and give assurances to those who might feel concerned; such as, that the new State should forever remain a part of the Confederacy; that the inhabitants should contribute their portion of the national debt; that the new States should not interfere with the primary disposal of the soil, or tax the lands of the United States; the clause also declaring that the navigable rivers should be common highways, was the proper result of the 4th article of the old act of confederation of the States.

That so much of the ordinance as I have designated under my second head, which prescribes the time and manner in which the new States shall be formed, was intended to be temporary, and expire with its execution, whenever the territory became competent to form a State government, will not be questioned.

That so much of the ordinance contained under my first division as created a constitution for the territorial government, was only intended as a temporary provision, is also evident, as no one will contend that the territorial constitution and departments could continue after the formation of a State constitution and government. That so much of the ordinance (arranged also under my first head) as is resolvable into a bill of rights, is temporary with regard to duration, would seem to follow the admission that the territorial constitution was temporary, especially if I am right in supposing (as I have done) that the object and use of the bill of rights was a declaration for greater certainty of the great principles which was to govern the exercise of the powers granted by the constitution. The bill of rights would then only retain its being, whilst the constitution, to which it is a predicate, remained in force, which would of course be during the continuance of the territorial government, and no longer. But, as my immediate object now is to arrive at the result that the bill of rights was not binding on the people of Ohio after the competency to form a State constitution, my purpose will be as well accomplished by the suggestion of an idea not so intimately connected with duration.

Bills of right, or declarations of right, have been resorted to by our ancestors, to secure themselves against the abuse or oppression of legislative or executive authorities. They were the bonds of the sovereign, held by the people, as a fence against him. They conferred no legislative or executive powers; but, as far as they operated, constrained those powers. They differed from our modern American constitutions, as an imperfect does from a perfect right or obligation, or as a moral obligation is different from a legal obligation; for if the bill of rights was transcended, the excess was morally wrong; but, if the constitution be transcended, its legal operation is felt by annulling the excess of authority.

As a bill of rights imposes no obligation, except on the Government, none other can violate it. The people can violate no obligation in relation to it, for they are under no such obligation. It is a schedule of their rights, not of their duties; those rights which our ancestors were used to say "doth appertain to the people of this realm." Who ever heard of the people being bound by a bill of rights?

Gentlemen will have observed that the threefold division to which I have resorted is sufficient to comprehend the whole of the ordinance of 1787; and we have only to inquire to which of the three respective heads is the 6th article, inhibiting slavery, referable. It is not referable to the third head, which comprehends those interests, claims, and obligations, which arise out of the relations between Congress and the new States. The obligation to discharge a portion of the federal debt, to exempt public lands from taxation, and open the navigable rivers to the whole continent, &c., were objects affecting the permanent relations to the General Government; but whether slavery should exist in that country, like the provisions of the habeas corpus, jury trial, &c., only concerned that temporary connexion springing from, and consequently expiring with, the territorial dependency.

I have, moreover, shown, that, in adjusting all other relations of interest and obligation between Congress and the new States, (which class of provisions I admitted to be perpetual,) Congress confined themselves to a mere declaration or recognition of rights and duties; which would have existed although the ordinance had been silent. If, therefore, the 6th article, containing a new and authoritative mandate, be forced in the same class, it would furnish a manifest anomalism. The inhibition of slavery has no connexion with the second division of the ordinance, which only regulates the creation of new States. But the first head comprehends the inhibition. It is either a part of the constitution or of the bill of rights found in the ordinance, nor is it material which; for, if it be a clause of the constitution, its operation was to restrain the territorial legislature from the toleration of slavery, and expired with the government to which it gave limits. But, if it is to be considered a portion of the bill of rights, it expired with the extinction of the powers to which it was annexed as a restraint, whether we are to look for those powers in the territorial government, or in the temporary authority of Congress to legislate over the country in its territorial grade, and, indeed, as an article of the bill of rights, never had any force against the people themselves.

The preamble to the articles in the ordinance expresses the motives to be, for extending the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty, which form the basis whereon these republics, their laws, and constitutions, are erected; to fix and establish those principles as the basis of all laws, constitutions, and governments, which forever hereafter shall be formed in the territory, &c. And this preamble, which good men might call a declaration of the sense of Congress on the fundamental rights of a people who stood there in the grade of colonists; which bad men would denominate a mere flourish; and which, at all events, was not intended to have any effect, as it contains nothing like an enacting clause or precept; has, nevertheless, been pressed into the service of our opponents, as a proof, that the articles of the ordinance, thus prefaced, became part of the constitutions of the States to be thereafter formed in the territory by a people who, as yet, had no existence. The Congress possessing but a limited and temporary authority, might exercise that authority with exalted and commendable views, or, indeed, might form an expectation that its temporary authority could be so exercised, during the infancy of the western settlement, as to incite moral sentiments and habits in the people, calculated, in the end, to produce a relish for institutions which were considered desirable by men of fashion in the political world. But Congress knew, that it could not, in the exercise of its most enlarged powers, pass laws to be irrevocable by its successors, much less by the people in convention. Congress, during the colonial condition of the territories, claimed and exercised the power of changing or modifying the constitutions of the territorial governments, instances of which are found in the acts of February 26th, 1808; March 3d, 1811; and May 20th, 1812. It was, therefore, politic to afford emigrants an assurance that no change of constitution should be made, except on the basis of certain principles. This assurance is given by Congress, being one party, and was obligatory on that party. The preamble speaks of laws and constitutions, considering them as synonymous. It immediately follows the constitution made by Congress for the territory, and evidently had no relation to State constitutions, for the contemplated States are not referred to in the preamble, nor had they been mentioned in any previous part of the ordinance. The preamble declares that the articles of the ordinance shall remain unalterable forever, unless by common consent. Yes, forever, if you please; for there are rights and interests depending on the force and obligation of the temporary laws of Congress, which must live forever; such are the grants of land, and promises of public advantages to the inhabitants. But with whom did Congress make this compact of several articles? The ordinance answers the question: "With the inhabitants of the territory, and the future States to be formed therein," for so it says. Such of the provisions, then, as, from their nature, could only be applicable to the territory, and such as were expressly applied by Congress only to the territory, would, of necessity, expire when the territorial government should cease to exist, whilst such provisions as were applicable to the future States would remain. An attention to the phraseology of the articles of the ordinance, sufficiently manifest, in the recital of the successive provisions, which are applicable to the territory and which to the States. Thus, the clause requiring the payment of a portion of the federal debt of the Union, expressly speaks of the people of the territory, and also of the new States. The inhibition against interfering in the disposal of the soil, not only speaks of the territorial government, but of the new States. In the recognition of the subjection of the people to the old Confederacy of the Union, not only the territory, but the States to be formed therein, are spoken of. But, turn to the provisions of articles of the ordinance which I have insisted are temporary, and in the nature of a bill of rights, and mark the difference in phraseology. As when the habeas corpus, jury trial, &c., are secured, and excessive bail, cruel punishment, &c., prohibited, the inhabitants of the territory are only mentioned; not a word is there said of new States. Turn, also, to the 6th article which inhibits slavery; it speaks of the territory, and says not a syllable of new States.

I have not intended to dwell upon other objects connected with this question, because, being convinced that Congress has no power to impose the restriction, and that, if it had power, a reference to the faith of solemn obligations would compel us to negative the present attempt, it would seem superfluous, if not idle, to travel into the expediency of the measure. But, if the Constitution of the United States and the French Treaty are both in favor of the power you now attempt to exercise, it would remain for the friends of this Government to decide on the policy of restraining the liberty of the people and States, by a too copious use of powers which have hitherto been dormant. Any attempt to reform the manners or character of the people, by extirpating slavery, or by other means, will, at any time, be found a task, the performance of which will bring us into collision with long rooted prejudices, as well as local jealousies, and must draw the Government from that lofty and impartial stand which it ought to sustain as the arbiter of differences between the respective States.

Is there not as great danger to this Government itself, from the intemperate use of Constitutional powers, as from the infraction of that instrument? The first abuse must be borne, until its continuance engenders against government a spirit of distrust, or indeed enmity, whilst the last is apt to be corrected either by the judiciary, or a full investigation of the Constitution. The Old Congress, in adopting the ordinance for the government of the Northwest Territory, were tempted by moral considerations, in relation to slavery, which can have no weight with us, for Congress having now the undoubted right to prohibit the importation of slaves, can, by the due exercise of that right, make it immaterial (on the score of the increase of slavery,) whether slaves are removed to the new, or retained in the old States. But the States under the old Confederation, had a right to import slaves from Africa or elsewhere; and the Congress, by shutting the Western market against their admission, exercised its only mean of retarding the increase of slaves in the country.

A gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) says the inhibition of slavery in the territorial ordinance was the result of compromise. He has, however, failed to prove this assertion; nor can I conceive how the inhibition could have sprung from compromise, or how the gentleman would aid his side of the question by making it a compromise. What was compromised? If it was a concession on the part of Virginia, or the South, what was the equivalent received by the South? Virginia had previously prohibited the importation of slaves, but inasmuch as she could not prevent their importation by other States, she was willing to lessen the demand for them. Virginia, always since 1699, has evinced her anxiety to abrogate the slave trade, and exerted herself most to prohibit the trade at a time when Pennsylvania and other States, now so forward in establishing restriction on Missouri, did not discourage, but rather promoted the importation of slaves. In the second year of George II., and during several years thereafter, whilst Virginia imposed as heavy a duty on the importation of slaves as the Crown, influenced as it was by the British merchants, would permit, with a view to a prohibition of the trade, Pennsylvania imposed a duty, which, reduced to an ad valorem impost, did not exceed about four per centum, by which means this province had a transit duty on Virginia slaves, and eventually kept the trade open between Africa and the country south of Susquehanna, notwithstanding the struggle of Virginia against it.

It is insisted that the admission of slaves in Missouri and the West will open a wide market and encourage the smuggling of foreign slaves, in violation of the laws of the Union. We should be sure of the truth of this anticipation before we act on its basis, and, even when assured of its truth, it would furnish but an eccentric excuse for legislation, in which we would allege our own imbecility and incompetency to prevent an illicit trade, by ordinary means, as an apology for measures of extraordinary inconvenience and embarrassment to the Southern section of the Union. But, will it be pretended that this Government is incompetent to prohibit the slave trade; unless by these restrictions on States? None are authorized to assume that position until he shall have shown that the other and ordinary powers of the Government have been exhausted without curing the evil. Although Government has done something, it has by no means done its utmost to prohibit the trade. I had the honor last year to submit a proposal to punish those engaged in the slave trade with death; and, although the proposition was adopted in this House, it was rejected in the Senate. Two years since, when gentlemen objected against the bill for the recovery of fugitive slaves that it might afford a cover for kidnapping, I submitted, in connexion with that bill, a section inflicting the punishment of death on the offence of kidnapping. But that punishment was thought too severe; and the House, on the motion of a gentleman from Vermont, struck out the capital punishment, and inserted two or three years imprisonment. The slaveholding State of Virginia has made kidnapping a capital offence, whilst gentlemen from the North, who abhor slavery, cannot be brought to punish that offence otherwise than as a trivial misdemeanor. The laws of the Union to prohibit the importation of slaves have generally left their whole efficacy to the vigilance and virtue of common informers, who would seldom be found to carry prosecutions to a termination in sections of the country where the slave trade was not unpopular. Under some of our laws the trade itself was carried on; one of the Southern States having carried the sale and detention in slavery of a great number of imported Africans, under the express provisions of an act of Congress. Indeed, we were informed last year by the chairman of the committee on the slave trade, that the importation of slaves had been found profitable, even by suffering the laws of Congress to be executed, and submitting to the judgment of the court in prosecutions under them. We are not entitled to talk of the inefficacy of our ordinary powers, or from hence to infer an authority to ourselves incompatible with the interests of many of the States, until we shall have fully exercised those powers, and cured the defects of our past legislation.

When Mr. PINDALL had concluded, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, February 14.

Mr. SERGEANT presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Philadelphia, suggesting many alterations in the existing tariff of duties on imports, and recommending an increase of the duties on French brandies and silks, and that the duties on the wines of Spain and Portugal may be reduced; which memorial was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. RANKIN presented a memorial of James Wilkinson, late a major general in the Army of the United States, detailing his services and sufferings in the cause of his country, from the commencement of the war of the Revolution to the close of the late war with Great Britain, and praying to be indemnified against the effects of a judgment for two thousand five hundred dollars, with costs of suit, recovered against him by General John Adair, in consequence of his having arrested the said Adair in the city of New Orleans, in the year 1806, on a charge of his being concerned in the alleged conspiracy of Aaron Burr; which was referred to a select committee. And Mr. RANKIN, Mr. VAN RENSSLAER, Mr. RINGGOLD, Mr. STROTHER, and Mr. ARCHER of Maryland, were appointed the said committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the military service of the United States, for the year 1820; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy during the year 1820.

Mr. SMITH, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Anthony S. Delisle, Edward B. Dudley, and John M. Van Cleef," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole tomorrow.

Mr. SMITH, from the same committee, also reported the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the President, Directors, and Company, of the Merchants' Bank of Newport, in Rhode Island," without amendment; and the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole last appointed.

TRADE WITH THE INDIANS.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill to continue in force, for a further time, (until the 3d of March, 1821,) the act establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes; which, being read twice—

Mr. S. observed, that, as the bill contained no appropriation, and as the act which it proposed to continue in force would expire on the first of next month, he moved that the bill be ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WALKER, of North Carolina, moved that the bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. SOUTHARD could see no reason for its taking this course. As he had observed, the act would expire on the first day of March. If this bill went to a Committee of the Whole, it would be a long time before it would be reached on the orders of the day. This delay would allow the act to expire, which would be very injurious to the public interest, as it would derange the whole of the existing system of Indian trade, &c.; and unless the gentleman from North Carolina had some new system prepared, or some changes to propose, it would be useless to retard the present bill, and produce the injury and confusion which would ensue if the existing act were to expire without timely legislation, &c.

Mr. WALKER's motion was rejected by a large majority. He then moved that the bill be laid on the table; which motion was lost—ayes 10—and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

THE MISSOURI BILL.

The House then again went into Committee of the Whole on this bill.

Mr. CUSHMAN addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I rise, not with the expectation of giving any new light, but, as a representative of the people, to acquaint them with the reasons which will influence the vote which I shall give. The gentlemen who have preceded me have entered deeply into the subject; I shall but touch on the surface. They to facts added embellishment; I come before you with a plain, unvarnished tale. They gave you a sumptuous feast of substantial viands; mine is the humbler office to regale you with the whips and tarts, and the lighter materials of the entertainment. Those gentlemen have condensed their arguments; I must be indulged in a decent range. They address you from the fullness of their intellectual funds; I profess to have premeditated. They, by mingling the pleasant with the useful, carried off every vote; I, superficial in matter, and barren of facts, shall think myself happy to obtain a solitary suffrage.

I rose, sir, with diffidence, and I almost repent the rashness of the attempt to mix in the debate. With a sensibility unprotected, I have entered the combat with the Goliaths of the Capitol, clad as they are in heavy armor, and defended by coats of mail. To their ponderous lances and massy spears, I have no weapons to oppose but my stone and sling, my arrow and bow. I seek honorable warfare; and this, from the generous and gallant spirit of my antagonists, I am sure to receive. If, at any time, I should draw my bow at a venture, an arrow hurled by my feeble arm can never wound any King in Israel.

With the embarrassments which are incident to the occasion, I mingle regret. I regret that one of my honorable colleagues should have exerted so much of his ingenuity on a cause viewed by his constituents and mine with emotions not the most complacent. With this regret mingles astonishment. I am astonished that he should labor to brand an attempt, as wise as it is patriotic, to prevent the further extension of slavery with infamy; that, to render this attempt peculiarly odious, he should liken it to certain proceedings in the East, which, to say the least, were as injudicious as they were abortive; but, in his opinion, fraught with the most deleterious mischiefs. My worthy colleague, as well as myself, was born near the place where, as he facetiously stated, the pilgrims agreed to be "governed by the laws of God till they could make better."* I believe, sir, the laws of God are still in force in the place to which he alluded, and that they still have influence on the hearts and lives of the descendants of those pilgrims. His ancestors, as well as mine, were attached, sincerely attached, to the vital principles of liberty and the equal rights of man. They gave justice and humanity, as well as truth, a high rank among the social virtues.

Should we depart from their principles of liberty and of rectitude, their spirits would be uneasy in the abodes of the blessed; they would regard us with the emotions of indignation, and be troubled at the degeneracy of their sons.

It is, sir, painful to me to remember that my native State has erred. I can derive no consolation from exposing to public view her aberrations. It is not decorous in a son to behold the nakedness of a father. It is filial to turn his back on parental failings, or approach with reverence, and cover them over with some well-wrought veil. I cannot view with complacency any attempts, from whatever quarter, to degrade Massachusetts in the estimation of the public. Indulge me, sir, in an expression of respect. What I shall say will be but a short episode connected with the principal subject. Massachusetts, sir, is the place of my birth. There are the sepulchres of my fathers, for six generations. There is my alma mater.

"Centum complexa nepotes, Omnes calicolas, omnes supera alta tenentes."

There did I spend the halcyon days of youth in acquiring, as I trust, some useful knowledge. There, in company with kindred spirits, I have enjoyed the "feast of reason and the flow of soul." And there have I formed some of the purest friendships which the heart owns and the understanding ratifies.

Massachusetts has much to command the respect and affection of all her descendants. The Goddess of Liberty, if not born there—there she was rocked in the cradle. There she received her nourishment. There she attained her fair proportions, her harmony of features, and her elegance of stature; her beauty of countenance, its expression and bloom. There she unfolded her charms. There she held her seat with the emblems of her state, the ensigns of her power. There were her arms—there her chariot, her sceptre, and her crown. There she still rules, in the hearts of an enlightened people, who acknowledge, with gratitude, the wisdom, the justice, and the beneficence of her reign. Time was, when Massachusetts stood so high in the estimation of the States, that no one dare mention her name but with honor. In statesmen, patriots, and sages, she might vie with any State in the Union. If Virginia had her WASHINGTON in the field, Massachusetts had her ADAMS in negotiation. Nor is our country more indebted for her independence to the martial achievements of the one, though glorious, than to the diplomatic skill and firmness of the other, equally glorious. Massachusetts, sir, has not lost all her original brightness. The recent spots on her character ought to disappear in the splendor of her former renown.

In advocating the claims of Missouri, arguments have been addressed to our sympathy. At the word sympathy I turn my attention to the extreme east. Hinc illæ lacrymæ—there I behold matter for tears. Maine! ill-fated Maine! The story of her woes would make the angels weep! Yet there are those who, owing to her favor their honors and station, seem to be unmoved at her misfortunes.

* Mr. Holmes applied, by mistake, this simple inconsistency to the Fathers of Plymouth.

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

Wrapped up in universal patriotism, they find no room in their breasts for partial attachment; and, insensible to real sufferings, reserve all their tears for scenes of fictitious distress. I see nothing more in the wild foxes* of Missouri, than the grazing animals of Maine, to move our sympathy, except their sagacity and art.

It is not my design, sir, as I proceed, to avail myself of the auxiliary of religion or conscience in my cause. Under the specious garb of religion, much that is evil has been done to the world. And conscience is a convenient hobby-horse, on which, when the politician is mounted, he usually ascends so high into the ærial regions, that he loses sight of all terrestrial objects. Not by the floating notions of the head, nor by the fervid sensations of the heart, but by the sound maxims of wisdom, must we legislate. Not the abstractions of metaphysics or the visions of philanthropy, but the Constitution, and the treaties made by its legitimate authority, and become the supreme law of the land, and the safety of the people, must be the guides of the statesman.

The Constitutional right of Congress to impose the restriction in question, has been so perspicuously illustrated and evinced by honorable gentlemen from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HEMPHILL and Mr. SPRAGUEANT,) as well as an honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. TAYLOR,) whose talents and patriotism would do honor to any cause or nation, that any attempt to afford strength to their arguments, may seem a useless effort; nevertheless, as the whole force of the enemy is made to bear on this citadel of our power, I shall direct some of my force to this point. Here we must take our defence. If driven from this stronghold, we must surrender at discretion. I believe, however, that this fortress, if ably defended, will be impregnable; that it cannot be carried either by force or storm, by artful manœuvring or direct attack.

I preface the observations which I am about to make, by saying, that, as the organs by which we perceive, are not equally perfect in all men, and that, as no language in which ideas are conveyed to the mind is so precise and definite as in all cases to preclude all uncertainty or doubt as to the meaning of written instruments, statesmen, equally honest, equally intent on the public weal, in reasoning on these instruments, may draw different inferences and come to different results. Not only do our ablest lawyers differ in opinion in their construction of the same statute, but our learned judges, with minds the most luminous, comprehensive, and discriminating, and liable to no undue bias, are not always united in one and the same opinion, on cases growing out of the laws, treaties, or Constitution. For men to differ in opinion is so common, on interesting questions, that it ought not to cause any surprise. We ought rather to weigh each other's argument in an impartial scale, judge with candor, and deem those not as enemies, but friends, to the country, who put constructions on the Constitution different from our own.

* A gentleman in his delivered speech, used this term.

With respect to the explanations to be given to the provisions of the Constitution, there are some helps and guides. These are the definite objects which the people had in ordaining and establishing the Constitution, and the general powers which it grants. What are these? The object is thus defined: "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution."

Among the general grants of powers are these: Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises: Congress shall have power to pay the debts of the nation, and provide for the common defence and general welfare. Congress shall have power, applies to each and every article and clause of the eighth section as well as to the first. That this is grammatically correct I will not refer gentlemen to the learned President of Transylvania University, (Rev. Horace Holley, formerly of Boston,) but to the pupils under his tuition. This distinguished character, to whom I have alluded, lately shone conspicuously in the East, and is now illuminating a different region, where I trust he will impart some useful notions.* Useful notions of liberty, useful notions of the Constitution, useful notions of government, just notions of science, literature, and the arts; correct notions of language and grammar; elevated notions of religion and morals; and refined notions of manners, decorum, and taste. For, though Kentucky may justly boast of her orators, statesmen, and political economists; yet some of the notions which I mentioned might add lustre to her pre-eminent fame.

That, in a legislative sense, Congress shall have power, applies to all the articles and clauses of the section is to be inferred from the nature of the case as well as from the correspondence to the language used in the preamble, where the expression is more full and definite, and the object more clearly stated. The people here declare that, to "provide for the common defence and promote the general welfare, they ordain and establish this Constitution."

But, if a different construction should prevail, what will gentlemen obtain? If it should be conceded that Congress only have the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, and to pay the debts of the nation for the common defence and general welfare, it follows, of course, that the common defence is to be provided for, and the general welfare to be promoted; and that Congress have, for these purposes, the control of the whole revenue of the nation—I contend, sir, for no more.

I am as willing as any gentleman can be to acknowledge that the real sovereign of our country is the people; and that Congress are but the ministers of this sovereign. But this absolute sovereignty resides, not in minute portions or States, but in the whole people, whose will, expressed by their Constitutional organs, is the law, and must be obeyed. But what rules shall the ministers of the sovereign people observe in the administration of his Government? Certainly his written instructions, in the exercise of a sound discretion in applying general expressions of his will to particular cases, and in adapting to exigencies, as they arise, such measures as best comport with the known character of his Government. When we dissolved our political connexion with Britain, we asserted the power of doing what independent nations of right might do. What may independent nations of right do? May they not of right provide for their common defence and general welfare? If we have not this right it is in vain to boast of our independence. We are still colonies, or at best like some of the minor States in Europe, which, with a nominal independence, are supported and controlled by neighboring kingdoms. Is not such a condition degrading? Does it comport with the high spirit which ought to be cherished by our country? That there should be a sovereign people, and not have the right to provide for their safety and well being, is to me the greatest of all solecisms. And to contend for the right, and deny the power of exerting it, in the only mode by which the people can act, their Constitutional organs, is rendering the right nugatory.

* A gentleman from Kentucky had frequently repeated, and given a peculiar emphasis to the term.

Gentlemen may state extreme cases in order to shock us with the consequences of our doctrine. By this license of reasoning, the most useful truths might be refuted; the most important virtues rendered doubtful. For cases may be supposed in which filial obedience, conjugal affection, and gratitude to benefactors, lose their obligation. If gentlemen are of opinion that Congress have not the power to provide for the common defence and general welfare, because this power may be abused, I know not to what lengths such an opinion would lead them. To reason consistently, they must inhibit to mankind the use of reason and religion—for these may be abused. They must proscribe all that is valuable; they must inhibit to themselves the use of their own extraordinary ingenuity and elocution; for these, too, are capable of being perverted, or exerted in a wrong cause.

Gentlemen also may attempt to excite an alarm by giving an unnatural extent and enormity to the powers possessed by the national Government. They may liken them to the powers conferred on the Consul when the Roman Senate decreed that he should take care that the commonwealth should receive no detriment. For my part I should be alarmed if the Constitution did not confer this power. I should deem it as defective as the old Confederation. I should believe it to be justly described by a learned theologian, (the late Dr. Dwight,) who, as he expressed it, never viewed it but with the emotions which he felt for a child in his first essays to go alone—tottering instead of walking, and frequently falling on the floor for want of strength to manage his steps. I contend that the power which is claimed for the Constitution is inherent in every body politic which has within it the principles of its own preservation. It is not an attribute, it is essential to sovereignty. This power is conferred on Congress in stronger terms than by the decree of the Roman Senate which conferred power on the Consul. In the literal sense, this decree only gave the power to ward off injuries. But the Constitution is more explicit; in unequivocal language it confers a power on Congress, not only to secure the commonwealth from harm, but also to procure for it good—to provide for the common defence and promote the general welfare.

It was from the defect of the ordinary powers of the Roman Republic that it was so liable to receive detriment, and that, to guard against this detriment, extraordinary powers, on pressing emergencies, were conferred—such as were implied in the decree, or the creating of a dictator. These defects, and the occasional supply of these defects by conferring extraordinary powers, proved the bane of the commonwealth. The people of the United States, deriving wisdom and experience from the misfortunes of others, have guarded against the rocks on which they split. In their civil constitution they have conferred ample powers, competent not only to ordinary, but to extraordinary exigencies. Hence, we may hope for the durability and perpetuity of our Republic.

I do not apprehend contradiction to my positions from candid, enlightened, practical statesmen, versed in the business of legislation, who will have the goodness to understand them. I will succinctly state them. They are these:

All the powers of sovereignty are inherent in the people of the United States. These powers can only be exercised but by the organs of the people, the constituted authorities; and that, in the exercise of them, and their application to particular cases and emergencies, these authorities must be guided by their own judgment and discretion, enlightened and assisted by the spirit and letter of the Constitution, the wisdom of ages and the jurisprudence of nations.

Unless Congress have the right of judging and applying the provisions of the Constitution, Government must be at an end. The Constitution is not capable of self-motion. It must remain a caput mortuum—an organized body without a living soul. Some power, not inherent in itself, must give it the breath of life before it can move. Without the power of construction and applying, I have to learn what there is for Congress to do. They must be, not agents, but passive instruments. Would you, sir, have Congress to consult the people in every step they take, and wait for their sense of the constitutionality of every thing they attempt? This were impracticable. Would you have them submit to the dictation of the States? I know of no political hierarchy in the proudest of them that has the high prerogative to dictate to Congress what constructions are to be put on the provisions of the Constitution, or to what cases these shall be applied. I am, sir, a protestant in politics as well as in religion. I claim the right of private judgment for myself and associates, I deny the authority of any Pontifex Maximus to define our Constitutional creed—to declare to us the Catholic faith of our Republic.

The amendment to the Constitution which states, "The powers not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people," forms no barrier to the exercise of the right of Congress for which I am contending. The question arises: What powers are granted and what prohibited?

"Who shall decide when doctors disagree,
And wise casuists dispute, like you and me?"

I say, as before, Congress, in the first instance, must be the judge of their own power; in the second, the people; and, in the last resort, the Supreme Judiciary of the United States. I place the law, constitutionally enacted and sanctioned, above the people. The sovereign himself must be bound by his own law. If Congress err, they err at their peril. And, with all these checks and responsibility upon them, is there any danger to be apprehended from their exercising that sound, enlightened discretion in administering the Government, without which the Constitution must remain a useless, inanimate machine? What rules of construction shall Congress adopt in determining what powers are prohibited, and what granted? That, sir, which is sanctioned by the wisdom of ages, and prevails in our courts of law. In doubtful cases the construction ought to be in favor of the grantee. At the formation of the Constitution the States acted as sovereign. They made grants of power to the nation. In disputed cases the right construction is that which favors the nation. This rule of construction ought to prevail, not only because it is sanctioned by common usage, but for other substantial reasons. While the great States claim powers for themselves, bordering on absolute sovereignty, they are inclined to deny to the nation the power of self-preservation. It is also characteristic of all Federal Governments, however constructed, to have inherent weaknesses or defects. You cannot, with good effect, legislate for States, nor coerce obedience to your authority, without civil war. The safety of our Republic, the peace and domestic tranquillity of the people, demand constructions which give to the General Government a national form and energy. Such constructions are best adapted to give permanency and strength to the system, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity. There can be no danger from such constructions. I am bold to affirm that the powers possessed by the nation have in no instance been materially abused. They have been uniformly exerted for the common defence and general welfare. Hence, the General Government has become a favorite with the people. They consider it as a nursing father, and cherish towards it a filial reverence and affection. With as much confidence can I affirm, that the disaffection and disturbances which, at times, have existed in our country, have had their origin in the jealousies and ambition of the aspiring States, and were excited and fomented by certain leaders who influenced the counsels and dictated the policy of those States; and that, but for the artifices of such leaders, there would have been neither insurgency, sedition, clamor, nor scarcely a murmur of disapprobation.

The safety of our Republic, the integrity of the Union, the quietude and harmony of the people, imperiously demand that the proud aspiring States should be taught to know their distance, to lower their lofty crests, to revolve in their humble orbs around the National Government, the sun of the system, and lose their dazzling radiance in the superior splendor of his beams.

I am not, sir, for annihilating the States. They ought to possess full powers to enact municipal laws and to administer municipal justice—to regulate their internal police—to conduct their local concerns. But I deny the right of the proudest among them to interfere with the high prerogatives of the National Government.

On the doctrines of checks and balances, the qualified local sovereignties may be of use in the general system; they may check the National Government, if ascending too high on the wheel of prerogative. But it is to be feared that more frequently will they retard its useful movements. As connected with their own power and importance, as well as from a common sympathy, they may guard the people's rights, and defend their privileges. But more generally will they, like the great barons of the feudal times of Europe, under some colorable pretext of restraining the prerogative of the lord paramount, aim to abridge his legitimate authority, and take from him the power to promote the felicity of the nation. It neither savors of political wisdom nor enlightened patriotism to be over-zealous of power.

I believe, sir, it will appear, from the civil history of the world, that as many nations have lost their independence, and the people their liberty, from the deficiency of power in the governments to provide for the common defence and general welfare, as from the abuse of powers committed to their trust. To what cause shall we trace the misfortunes of Poland, but to the jealousy of the nobles, in denying to the supreme executive of the nation the power competent to provide for the common defence and general welfare? To what is owing the weakness and unwieldiness of Germany, but to the defect of power in the head, arising from the federal ingredients of which the Empire is composed? And in the feudal times to which I allude, how did the people lose their liberties? Harassed by the perpetual strifes, animosities, confusions, and petty wars, of the feudal lords, they, for the most part, threw their weight in the scale of the Crown, and parting with their liberty for safety and protection, took shelter under the shadow of the throne. Like causes may produce like effects; and if ever the people of the United States should depart from our confederated Republic, it will be owing to the turmoils, seditions, insurgencies, and civil commotions, excited and fomented by the aspiring States. The people, wearied out by such turbulent scenes, will part with their freedom for security, and seek peace and quietude under a consolidated government, wielded by a single arm. Unless the exercise of a sound discretion be allowed Congress in applying general provisions of the Constitution to particular cases, I know not, Mr. Chairman, what you have to say in defence of some of the most important measures of the Government. I know not what the advocates of these measures can offer in defence of your military academies or national bank? I know not what justification you could offer to the people of the East for what they suffered by the restrictive system. "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce." But it is only in the exercise of your judgment that you apply the right to regulate commerce to the cases mentioned. Some of our ablest lawyers, whose patriotism and attachment to the Government could not be suspected, uniformly denied the justness of this application.

In fine, sir, I know not what will become of the treaty by which Louisiana was ceded to the United States. "New States may be admitted into the Union." The power here conferred, if you only regard the natural import of the terms, the sense in which they could be understood by the framers of the Constitution, would hardly justify you in purchasing kingdom after kingdom, continent after continent, and placing no bounds to our country but those which limit the globe itself.

Do you inquire, sir, whether, by these observations, I intend a censure? I frankly reply I do not. I approve, I applaud a liberal, bold, manly policy; the policy of WASHINGTON, which raised the genius of our country, and added dignity to the American character. I applaud the statesman or the hero who poises himself on his own magnanimity, and, setting at defiance the vulgar censures of the great, performs noble achievements for the glory and felicity of his country. Such statesmen and heroes are the boast and glory of a nation—its ornament and defence.

From the tenor of the preceding observations, it is obvious that Congress are invested by the Constitution with powers to impose such restrictions on citizens as the common defence and general welfare require, provided there be no express provisions to the contrary.

But is there no barrier to these restrictions arising from treaty? This topic I shall waive, as a further discussion of it would be superfluous. It has been ably treated, and in a masterly manner, by a pre-eminent statesman—a member of the other House—a native of Maine—a statesman whose intellectual endowments are unrivalled but by his moral virtues—whose luminous mind irradiates the nation and reflects a lustre on his native State. [Hon. Rufus King.]

But, conceding the power and right on Constitutional and treaty ground to impose restrictions, have you no scruples arising from a sense of justice, the sacredness of property? Has not every citizen a claim on the Government to be secured in his possessions? Property in our country is sacred. It is guaranteed by the letter and spirit of our laws.

But, Mr. Chairman, how is a black slave to be considered? As property, or a human being? I believe, sir, neither wholly one nor the other, but partly both. When gain is concerned, the black slave is considered as property; but, when power is in question, he is dignified with three-fifths the attributes of a man. As far as property is to be affected, you ought to proceed with caution. For if, by mere dint of power, you can take away a part, the principle on which you act would justify you in taking the whole; and the citizen might be deprived of one species of property after another, till he had nothing left which he could call his own. Happily, the restriction contended for sanctions no such strides of power—no such injustice. It gives all possible security to property in possession, and provides for the future, that a human being, whatever be his complexion, in the Territory or State of Missouri, shall feel the force of these self-evident truths—that God created all mankind equal, and endowed them with certain inalienable rights—amongst which are "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Can ingenuity, aided by elocution, fix a stigma on such a just and wise and liberal policy in the opinion of the enlightened world? It is somewhat singular that the gentlemen who are so fastidiously delicate respecting the powers of Congress, should habitually usurp an unwarrantable power over a large portion of their fellow-men. What is your right to make an African your property, but the right of the strongest? By the same right the Barbary Powers make slaves of their prisoners of war. God has no attribute to sanction such injustice, such violation of the laws which he originally engraved on the human mind.

Property itself, sir, if not a creature of the law, by law is modified, restrained, or regulated in its use. In a state of society, respecting many kinds of property, no man has a right to do what he will with his own. It cannot be used by him to the destruction of others: No man is permitted, by law, to set fire to his own house in the midst of a city, however convenient it might be to him to have it consumed. In a number of instances the laws interpose and regulate the property which men have in animals, or restrain or limit their use. If any species of them were becoming noxious to any section of country, or if multiplying them should become hurtful and injurious to the community, laws might be enacted to prevent the mischievous effects.

This reasoning is applicable to every species of property, of every complexion, whether blue, or yellow, or black. If, therefore, you consider your slaves property—and if spreading this species of property over the Missouri would be injurious to the best interest of the nation, as nothing has been stipulated to the contrary, on the principles that regulate other kinds of property, Congress may regulate or prohibit to you the use of this.

The property of the North was under the ban of National Government for years. The embargo and restrictive system not only interdicted to us the use of our property, but cramped our enterprise. They in effect annihilated our property in navigation, and denied to the hardy and industrious their accustomed means of support. Numbers who lived in affluence, and promoted industry, circulating wealth and refinement through the community, were by those measures reduced to comparative poverty and distress. Hence, sir, the loud call on the justice of the nation for a bankrupt law, to restore those who suffered in that common cause to a standing in society; to replace them in situations in which they may be encouraged to exert their industry and enterprise for the benefit of themselves, their families, and their fellow-citizens.

We did not complain then, nor do we now complain of our patriotic privations. We gloried in them, because we believed them connected with the common defence and general welfare. We ask our Western brethren to behold our example, to imitate our patient loyalty, to rival our suffering virtue. Their trials, compared with ours, will in experiment be found light. The little finger of the commercial was heavier than the whole hand of the restriction on slaves. The same power which, by regulating commerce, destroyed navigation, might as legitimately be exerted to prevent a traffic, domestic as well as foreign, as disgraceful to our Republic as it is inconsistent with the first principles of liberty and the inherent rights of mankind.

To the evils of slavery, where slavery exists by compact, there is, perhaps, no adequate remedy. But not to prevent, where there is a power of prevention, is a strange repugnance of practice to theory. And to diminish the whole quantity of an evil by making it more extensive, by increasing it in a tenfold ratio, appears to me worse than that quackery in the boasted art of healing, which, instead of extracting, should scatter the morbid matter of the diseased part throughout the whole frame, till all that was sound should become infected. Respecting the introduction of slavery in the Western territory, the learned aphorisms of the learned gentleman, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) quoted in a learned language, would apply with great pertinence and force; "resist beginnings; an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of remedy."

Where there is a demand for any commodity, there the market will be supplied. Open a profitable sale for slaves in the Missouri, and Africans will be brought there to market by all means, and from all quarters. The shortsighted avarice of individuals will elude all your laws, the activity of your peace officers, the vigilance of your fleets or armies. In opposition to all that can be done, there will be fresh importations, and undersellers in the market, which will defeat the hopes which you indulge of gain. There is no way so effectual to prevent this inhuman traffic, so contrary to all laws founded on the broad basis of universal equality, both human and divine, as to remove all temptation, to render the trade as unprofitable as it is odious. This will be laying the axe at the root of the tree, and giving it a fatal stroke by which it will wither, droop, and die. To remove the temptation, and to render this traffic unprofitable, is in accordance with the policy so early adopted, and so perseveringly pursued, by that society to whom the cause of humanity is indebted for many of its triumphs, and in whose lives the principles of a pure and benign religion are exemplified; I mean the Friends. As they have the merit of being among the first to concert measures to abolish slavery, they can feel the greater joy in seeing their labors crowned with so much success. For their well directed, unrelenting efforts to unloose the heavy burden, and to break every yoke, they deserve well of mankind, and will, doubtless, receive the benedictions reserved for those who "break the rod of the oppressor and let the prisoner go free."

In the course of this debate, Mr. Chairman, frequent references have been made to the state papers, or history of Vermont. But, stripped of the coloring of the commentators, who have taken the usual license of culling their texts and putting on the gloss, I see nothing of the marvellous in them. What were the claims which the citizens of Vermont set up? Did they ever claim the right to control the Union, or to intermeddle with the high prerogatives of the nation? Did they ever claim the right to dictate to Congress what measures should be adopted, what policy should be pursued, what construction should be put on the Constitution; in what manner its provisions should be applied? Did they ever claim the right to take from the National Government the power to provide for the common defence and general welfare? I believe, sir, that the brave, modest, patriotic citizens of Vermont, for so they ought to be characterized, never made such arrogant pretensions.

All I can find in their history is, the right of self-government asserted, the right of regulating their own internal concerns, by their own authority; of managing the affairs of their own State in their own way. Have these rights ever been denied to any of the States? Have any attempts been made to infringe them? Their bold and spirited language was warranted by the occasion. They had for years existed as an independent State, and aided the United States in the Revolutionary war. They sued for an admission into the Union. Their suit, as they thought, was evaded by vexatious delays. They felt themselves trifled with by those who wielded the powers of the Confederacy. They perceived, or thought they perceived, an equivocal spirit, not consistent with equity or honor. They expressed themselves in the warmest language of the passions. They struggled for years, and, after all, as the price of admission into the Union, had to submit to such conditions as Congress saw fit to impose, one of which was the relinquishment of a large tract of land. Such is the infinite dissimilitude in the two cases, between that of Missouri and that of Vermont, that no inference can be drawn from the one, which can fairly be applied to the other.

Much, Mr. Chairman, has been said about the State rights of Missouri. But, where is the State of Missouri? In what section of the country does it lie? For my part, I know of no such State in the Union. There is none of that name among the twenty-two that compose the Confederacy of States. Inhabiting a valuable Territory, called Missouri, ceded to the United States in full sovereignty, there are citizens, I presume, respectable, worthy citizens, amenable to our Government and laws. But I know not by what authority any portion of citizens, however respectable, can claim the attributes of sovereignty and the State rights, till they are a sovereign State. This would be claiming privileges and immunities, and for non-existences.

H. OF R.

Admission of Missouri.

When Missouri shall become a State, and be admitted into the Union, she may then talk of her State rights and sovereignty. But, at present, such language is premature. Where State rights exist, there is no attempt of the General Government to interfere with them. The restriction is not to be imposed on a State, but on citizens of the United States. We legislate for individuals, and not for the State of Missouri—no such State is known. The reasonings in favor of the State rights of a non-existing State must be on assumed premises, and the conclusion drawn unwarrantable. They presuppose what does not exist, and they endow non-existence with the rights and attributes of a sovereign. The foundation on which you build, having no solidity, your superstructure, however towering, must fall to the ground.

As connected with the question before you, Mr. Chairman, gentlemen have enlarged on the right of self-government. As applied to a body politic, what do they intend by self-government? Do they mean its right to blindly follow the bent of some ruling passion—the right to trample on the rights of others—the right of a part to give laws to the whole—the right to disturb the peace of the community in pursuit of a favorite object? Self-government, applied to bodies of men, as well as to an individual, includes the control of the passions, their subordination to reason, the guidance of discretion, the submitting to rules and precedents, deriving their authority from inherent fitness, public experience, the established maxims of the times, and the condensed wisdom of ages. Gentlemen, I am sensible, are shocked at the doctrine of precedents. But what will they substitute in their place? Their own opinions, formed on the spur of the occasion, influenced by interest and caprice? This, sir, would be acting from desultory emotions, and not according to method or rule. It would be setting up an ignis fatuus in place of the polar star.

Many fine tales are told us about a spirit of compromise, of amity, of accommodation. And, to move us to make sacrifices on the altar of public harmony, the example of the sages who formed the Constitution is set before us in all its allurements. But, sir, what have we to compromise? Or what is your quid pro quo? For emoluments and power on your part, will you give us commercial restrictions, inhibitions of a profitable trade? Will you give us the privilege of paying duties on imports without allowing us credit, and of exporting without debentures? Will you give us the pleasure of spilling our blood and expending our treasure in your service, to enhance your importance, and to swell your triumphs? With such gifts, sir, we are already well satisfied—we have had our full share. Do us justice, and reserve your bounties for those who need them. On some future emergencies they may be more opportune.

Between the members of Congress and the delegates who formed the Constitution, there is an infinite difference. Out of unequal, unpliant, or heterogeneous materials, made ready to their hands, they had to form a harmonious system. Of course, it became necessary to compare, to adjust, to accommodate, and so adapt, and to dispose of the parts, as to produce a beautiful and magnificent whole. They were delegated for this special purpose, and had the right to compromise. We have no such right. We are not negotiators, but legislators. It is our office, not to make bargains, but to enact laws. We have no legitimate power to buy or sell, or make gain of the people whom we represent, or to transfer any portion of their privileges from one section of our country to accommodate that of another. I believe, sir, that the States, with all their boasted plenipotence, never possessed, or delegated their right to commit political sacrilege or simony.

We are not the architects, but the superintendents of the civil edifice which the Convention erected. Our general duties are implied in our office. It is our province to keep this beautiful structure of liberty in repair, to preserve its symmetry, and to guard it from all injuries. It would be a breach of trust to suffer any of its apartments to be occupied by those who would sap its foundations, impair its strength, or deface its ornaments.

I have yet to learn, sir, why all this sensibility, this animation, this alarm? why, on the innocent proposition before you, cry havoc, and let slip the dogs of war? Are State rights, where no State is, in danger? Is a pure and disinterested regard to the people of Missouri the predominant passion? Are you sure, sir, that your patriotic ardor, your manly zeal, to prevent the encroachments of power, have no spice of ambition, no tincture of avarice? Search, sir, your own breast before you sarcastically comment on our philanthropy and religion. It has been frequently asserted, by gentlemen who are entitled to the highest consideration, that of all curses with which our country is afflicted that of black slavery is the greatest. Why, then, are our attempts to prevent this curse from being entailed on a fair portion of our territory viewed with such abhorrence? Is there more than meets the eye? Do you perceive some hidden mischief lurking under the attempt? Do you perceive wisdom and virtue laboring to strengthen the Union, establish justice, and insure domestic tranquillity? Do you perceive concealed under it the sword and the purse to be wielded by the sound discretion of Congress to provide for the common defence and general welfare? Or do you seem to perceive the movements of a gallant army, conducted by able commanders, whose brilliant achievements have secured peace and prosperity to the country and covered themselves with glory! No wonder you startle, change color, and turn pale. At the glory and felicity of our country, the most stout-hearted of our politicians seem to be appalled.

They see in them a monstrous prodigy, huge, ill-shapen, from which light is departed. They are amazed at the spectacle—the hair of their heads stand erect with horror, and their voice cleaves to their jaws:

“Monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademptum.”

“Obstupui, steteruntque comæ, et vox faucibus hæsit.”

I should, sir, here offer an apology, did I not, in these embellishments of speech, imitate the example of Virginia.* Massachusetts, reprobate as she is, may yet be permitted to hold a taper to the light of the sun.

As the scaffolding of ambition, or as a mere instrument to retain power, I do not advocate the restriction. I seek no victory but that of principle—no triumph but that of the common defence and general welfare. To me it is indifferent by which section of the country the sceptre is wielded, if it be wielded by justice, directed by wisdom, and tempered by clemency.

I care not, sir, by whose counsels the nation is swayed, if by these counsels the public safety and happiness is promoted. I care not what State exerts a paramount influence, if that influence is salutary and benign. If Virginia will always give us a WASHINGTON for President, that ancient and honorable State may enjoy that pre-eminence forever.

In the course of the debate insinuations have been made, which cannot be misunderstood. It would indicate stupidity to misconstrue them. I shall not waste time to repel them, but solicit your attention to a statement which I am about to make.

You have, sir, in your pleasure grounds certain nuisances; in order to prevent their rank growth, you spread them over your farm. And because they are there becoming hurtful, you attempt to disburden your lands by diffusing them over the surrounding country. The people who are to be affected by your attempts to spread such nuisances among them, gently remind you of the unfairness of your proceedings, and point out to you, in respectful language, the injurious effects which must result from your conduct. These you meet with menace, invective, and sarcasm, and pronounce their precautions to prevent a growing mischief, as tinctured with malice aforethought, a deliberate design to accomplish your ruin. Or, Mr. Chairman, you have a seat in Italy, near Ætna or Vesuvius—you apprehend danger from the eruptions of the mountains; and to guard against the injurious effects, you form machines to extract from these mountains the superfluous lava, and conductors to convey it to the surrounding kingdoms, and thus, to free yourself from fear and alarm, overwhelm all Europe in one undistinguishable ruin.

The calamities, sir, which you are preparing for yourself and posterity, by spreading slavery over the Western world, are beyond calculation; they will be infinite. The pestiferous mischief will take deep root in that luxuriant soil, and vigorously flourish. A black population will overflow the land. The sable herds will roll back upon you, carrying death and misery in their train, and become more destructive to the American Republic than were the Goths and Vandals to the Roman Empire. I shudder at the thought of being an instrument of entailing such a pest on my country.

Blind to the consequences of your actions, to the passions of the moment, will you sacrifice the happiness of ages? Perceiving the bowl which contains the deleterious poison presented to the lips of our country, which, if swallowed, will contaminate her blood, and enervate her Constitution, we call, and we call aloud on her, to refuse the potion. For this more than patriotic attempt, this act of filial piety, are we to be considered as designing knaves or honest madmen? To deter us from saving our country from disgrace, debility, and decay, do you present to our senses spectacles the most shocking? Do you assail the ear with the most alarming sounds; the eye with all that is to the sight terrific; the preludes of battle, and the direful results? Are we made to hear and see the clangor of the trumpet, the clash of arms, the dying groans, and garments rolled in blood? Are we forced to behold, in prospective, as the result of our enlightened policy, the waters of some among the largest of our rivers discolored with gore, and their channels choked up by the mangled bodies of the slain? Where, sir, is to be the scene of these horrid transactions, this deplorable catastrophe? On the banks of the Delaware or the Hudson? Most probably those of the Hudson will be preferred, as there imagination has laid the scene of the second Hartford Convention—there the insidious plot to provide for the common defence and general welfare—there the constructive treason against the prescriptive rights of the South.

Heap, sir, from the exuberant fertility of your imaginations, terror upon terror, and cause war and slaughter, and death and carnage, civil commotions, and national convulsions, to pass in review before the eye of fancy; threaten to pour out upon us all the evils of Pandora's box, or to let loose all the plagues of the bottomless pit!—all is in vain. Neither threats nor devices nor manœuvres nor arts crimsoned with blood, will deter us from deliberately adopting and steadily pursuing a wise, equitable, and humane policy, calculated to perfect “the Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.” I ought, Mr. Chairman, to ask pardon for the frequent repetition of this sentiment. It is music to my ear, though to the ears of others it seems to be more unwelcome than the fame of the hero of Pensacola or New Orleans.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am not apprehensive that these calamities will have any existence but in disturbed imaginations. I entertain a better opinion of the good sense of the people. I cannot believe that any large portion of them, because a momentary passion is not gratified, will desert the standard of the Union. We are liable to be deceived, even by our senses. The eye, the most perfect of them, does not always present the true image of things. The ear is still more fallacious. The feelings excited and expressed here are not the criterion of public sentiment. And, to judge of the common mind by what is witnessed in the Capitol, you are liable to the same deception as you would be to judge of the state of the air, from the wind blowing into a close room through a crevice or aperture. From the loudness or shrillness of the noise, you might suppose that without there were storms, tempests, hurricanes, and tornadoes—"the war of elements and the crush of worlds!" But go abroad and you behold a serene sky, a placid sun, and a salutary breeze, only sufficient to purify the atmosphere from noxious vapors, and to prevent the corruption which all things contract by too much rest.

But, should some choice spirits among the people, disappointed in their favorite project, communicate their own ardor and passion to numbers, and excite them to rebellion, what would be the consequence? The whole history of our Republic will inform you. No combinations against the National Government have prospered. It has gained strength in every rencontre. Its arm is not so shortened that it cannot save; its energy is not so impaired that it cannot protect itself or enforce its mandates. That power which authoritatively said to the North give up, will with equal effect say to the South keep back, and to the West peace, be still!

But, sir, as imagination is free, I will suppose that, through the arts of the designing, a spirit of disaffection and revolt should be communicated to a large section of our country, and a formidable rebellion raised against the laws enacted by the Supreme Legislature, and sanctioned by the Supreme Judicial authority, and approved by the well-affected people,—what, sir, would be our policy? Think you, that to save our friends in that section, we should interpose—that we should spill our blood and waste our treasure to coerce you to a good temper and submission? No, sir, we should leave you to "reap the fruits of your ways" and "be filled with your own devices." Time and suffering would restore you to soundness of mind, and bring you back to your allegiance.

Those who moved you to treason would be answerable for consequences. All the blood spilt would be on their own heads. They would be responsible for the crimes committed to God, to their country, and to the civilized world.

Attempt no longer to alarm our fears about the safety of the Union. The Union is not a rope of sand—it is a "threefold cord, which cannot easily be broken."

We of the extreme East have evinced our attachment to the Union, even "at times which tried men's souls—when your summer's soldier and sunshine patriot shrunk from danger." On the apprehension of danger to the Union, we rallied round its standard, defended it with our lives and fortunes, and made our breasts its ramparts. What, sir, is our reward? We come to you for a small boon, and that boon is delayed. Missouri, the adopted Missouri, to the prejudice of the true heir, has supplanted us in your affections. This

Missouri, lately an alien from the family, and scarcely of an age to unfold her charms, at the gentlest tap at your door, must be welcomed into your drawing-room with all her menial servants prostrate at her feet, or the whole House thrown into confusion. But Maine, with all the beauty, the bloom, the fragrance, of eighteen, who has been devoted to your service, is received with cruel neglect, and only permitted to pass your threshold on the condition of associating with your slaves. Is this your treatment of a child who has ever been dutiful, and manifested in all her conduct the most filial tenderness and respect? When she asks of you bread, do you give her a stone; when she desires a fish, do you sting her with a scorpion? "Tantane animis celestibus ira!"

We justly complain of this partiality to your new favorite—if not an illegitimate, yet of foreign extraction and mixed blood. I speak allegorically and mean no offence. Do you threaten, if Miss —, not in her teens, be not gratified in all her fond humors, to raise disturbances in the family—to sow the seeds of discord among brethren—to set the "father against the son, the son against the father, the mother against the daughter, and the daughter against the mother"—to tear up the foundation of domestic peace? Look, sir, at the consequences of your actions. Count the cost, compute the gain, consider which section of our country has most to lose by secession from the Union, by disaffection and revolt. The North is the region of strength. The Eastern grand section of the Union has wealth and resources. It has valor, patriotism, and an enterprising spirit. It has navigation and commerce. It has a free population—an intelligent, industrious, virtuous people—the nerve, the sinew, the vital principle, the life-blood of a Republic. With these advantages, and wisdom to avail ourselves of them, are we to be driven from our pursuit of the general welfare through menace or fear? Reproach us not with the sterility of our soil; the severity of our climate. The labor, sir, of freemen will make any soil fertile—liberty, any climate delightful. Industry, enterprise, and commerce, lead to wealth, and wealth to power and importance. Need I mention the States which, less favored by nature, in some respects, with commerce, industry, enterprise, have taken an imposing attitude, and commanded the deference of surrounding nations? I refer you to the Venetians and Dutch; I refer you to the English, who, by navigation, commerce, and manufacturing skill, attained to great wealth and splendor, and, at times, wielded the destiny of Europe. I repeat it, therefore, do your utmost, by a disloyal and refractory spirit, to dissolve the Union, and accomplish your object; we have the least to fear.

We are prepared for the worst, though we seek the best. We shall cling to the Union as long as there is the least hope of safety. But if, through the unmanly jealousies, the headstrong passions, the ill-directed ambition of the proud, aspiring States, this Union must be dashed to pieces, we shall not perish. Escaping on some of the larger fragments, of these we shall reconstruct a vessel of State, in which, if not with so much glory, we may be wafted along on a gentle current of prosperity, and enjoy peace, safety, and felicity.

But, sir, the people of the United States have too much good sense, patriotism, and civic virtue, to lose sight, for any length of time, of their true interest, of their substantial glory. There is in them a redeeming spirit. They will never jeopardize the Union to gratify momentary passions, however inflamed or strong. They know, by experience, that the measures of Government, which, at the time of their adoption, have excited the greatest ferment, and caused the greatest agitation, and seemed to be the preludes to national convulsions, in operation have been found to have contributed most to the safety, peace, and glory of the nation. Such was President Washington's proclamation of neutrality, and the policy which ensued, by which our country was saved from an unprofitable and calamitous war. Such was the treaty negotiated by the honorable John Jay, under the auspices of which our country attained to a prosperity unexampled in the history of nations. These, sir, were emphatically the halcyon days of our Republic. And such, without the spirit of prophecy, I believe will be the restriction on slavery in our Western territory. The succeeding, if not the present generation, after the fervor of the moment shall subside, will view, with mingled emotions of regret and astonishment, the present opposition to a measure, which will have become their ark of safety—their rock of defence.

I am not, sir, among the diviners of the times, who imagine that the sun of our glory will go down at noon. I rather predict that it will continue to shine with healing in its beams, and shed on a more extended horizon increased light, and splendor, and joy. Were I to give scope to imagination, I might see in prospective a vast accession of territory, of population, of wealth, and grandeur to our nation. In this prospective view, the Canadas, with New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, allured by the wisdom and beneficence of our institutions, will stretch out their hands for an admission into this Union. The Floridas will become a willing victim. Mexico will mingle her lustre with the federal constellation. South America, in token of fellowship, will burn incense on our Republican altar. The Republic of the United States shall have dominion from sea to sea, from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, and from the river Columbia to the ends of the earth. The American Eagle, in a serene sky, will soar aloft to the stars of Heaven. Fame, with her loudest trumpet, will sound the greatness of our country from pole to pole. The proudest nations of the globe, in admiration of her renown, shall court her friendship. The blessings of our Government shall be felt throughout the world. Its influence shall come down upon all the people like rain on the mown grass—as showers that water the earth. In the plenitude of its power shall the righteous flourish, and abundance of peace, so long as the moon endureth.

Mr. Wood, of New York, followed Mr. Cushman, and advocated the restriction.

Mr. PINCKNEY, of South Carolina, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: It was not my intention at first, and it is not now my wish, to rise on this important question: one that has been so much and so ably discussed in both branches of Congress: one that has been the object of so many meetings of the people of the different States, and of so many resolutions of the legislatures, and instructions to their members: but I am so particularly circumstanced, that it is impossible to avoid it. Coming from one of the most important of the Southern States, whose interests are deeply involved, and representing here a city and district which, I believe, export more of our native products than any other in the Union; having been also a member of the Old Congress, some important acts of which are brought into question on this occasion, and, above all, being the only member of the General Convention which formed the Constitution of the United States, now on this floor, and on whose acts rests the great question in controversy, how far you are or are not authorized to adopt this measure, it will, from all these circumstances, be seen that it is impossible for me to avoid requesting your permission to state some observations in support of the vote I shall give on a question, certainly, the most important that can come before Congress: one, to say the least of it, on which may depend, not only the peace, the happiness, and the best interests, but, not improbably, the existence of that Union which has been, since its formation, the admiration of the world, and the pride, the glory, and the boast, of every American bosom that beats within it.

In performing this solemn duty, I trust I shall do it with that deference to the opinions of others which it is always my duty to show on this respectable floor, and that I shall be as short as the nature of the subject will permit, and completely moderate. Indeed, in questions of this importance, moderation appears to me to be indispensable to the discovery of truth. I, therefore, lament extremely that so much warmth has been unnecessarily excited, and shall, in the remarks I may make, studiously avoid, what I conceive the decorum of debate ought to enjoin upon every member.

At the time I left, or sailed, from the city I here represent, scarcely a word was said of the Missouri question; no man there ever supposed that one of such magnitude was before you. I, therefore, have, since the serious aspect this subject has assumed, received numerous inquiries on it, and wishes to know my opinion as to the extent and consequences of it. I have candidly replied, that, so far as respects the regaining an ascendancy on both the floors of Congress; of regaining the possession of the honors and offices of our Government; and of, through this measure, laying the foundation of forever securing their ascendancy, and the powers of the Government, the Eastern and Northern States had a high and deep interest. That, so far as respects the retaining the honors and offices and the powers of the Government, and the preventing the establishment of principles to interfere with them, the Southern and Western States had equal interest with the Northern. But, that, when we consider to what lengths the right of Congress to touch the question of slavery at all might reach, it became one, indeed, of tremendous import.

Among the reasons which have induced me to rise, one is to express my surprise. Surprise, did I say? I ought rather to have said, my extreme astonishment, at the assertion I heard made on both floors of Congress, that, in forming the Constitution of the United States, and particularly that part of it which respects the representation on this floor, the Northern and Eastern States, or, as they are now called, the non-slaveholding States, have made a great concession to the Southern, in granting them a representation of three-fifths of their slaves; that they saw the concession was a very great and important one at the time, but that they had no idea it would so soon have proved itself of such consequence; that it would so soon have proved itself to be by far the most important concession that had been made. They say, that it was wrong from them by their affection to the Union, and their wish to preserve it from dissolution or disunion; that they had, for a long time, lamented they had made it; and that, if it was to do over, no earthly consideration should again tempt them to agree to so unequal and so ruinous a compromise. By this, I suppose, Mr. Chairman, is meant, that they could have had no idea that the Western and Southern States would have grown with the rapidity they have, and filled so many of the seats in this House; in other words, that they would so soon have torn the sceptre from the East.

It was, sir, for the purpose of correcting this great and unpardonable error; unpardonable, because it is a wilful one, and the error of it is well known to the ablest of those who make it; of denying the assertion, and proving that the contrary is the fact, and that the concession, on that occasion, was from the Southern and the Northern States, that, among others, I have risen.

It is of the greatest consequence that the proof I am about to give should be laid before this nation; for, as the inequality of representation is the great ground on which the Northern and Eastern States have always, and now more particularly and forcibly than ever, raised all their complaints on this subject, if I can show and prove that they have not even a shadow of right to make pretences or complaints; that they are as fully represented as they ought to be; while we, the Southern members, are unjustly deprived of any representation for a large and important part of our population, more valuable to the Union, as can be shown, than any equal number of inhabitants in the Northern and Eastern States can, from their situation, climate, and productions, possibly be. If I can prove this, I think I shall be able to show most clearly the true motives which have given rise to this measure; to strip the thin, the cobweb veil from it, as well as the pretended ones of religion, humanity, and love of liberty; and to show, to use the soft terms the decorum of debate oblige me to use, the extreme want of modesty in those who are already as fully represented here as they can be, to go the great lengths they do in endeavoring, by every effort in their power, public and private, to take from the Southern and Western States, which are already so greatly and unjustly deprived of an important part of the representation, a still greater share; to endeavor to establish the first precedent, which extreme rashness and temerity have ever presumed, that Congress has a right to touch the question and legislate on slavery; thereby shaking the property in them, in the Southern and Western States, to its very foundation, and making an attack which, if successful, must convince them that the Northern and Eastern States are their greatest enemies; that they are preparing measures for them which even Great Britain, in the heat of the Revolutionary war, and when all her passions were roused by hatred and revenge to the highest pitch, never ventured to inflict upon them. Instead of a course like this, they ought, in my judgment, sir, to be highly pleased with their present situation; that they are fully represented, while we have lost so great a share of our representation; they ought, sir, to be highly pleased at the dexterity and management of their members in the Convention, who obtained for them this great advantage; and, above all, with the moderation and forbearance with which the Southern and Western States have always borne their many bitter provocations on this subject, and now bear the open, avowed, and, by many of the ablest men among them, undisguised attack on our most valuable rights and properties.

At the commencement of our Revolutionary struggle with Great Britain, all the States had slaves. The New England States had numbers of them, and treated them in the same manner the Southern did. The Northern and Middle States had still more numerous bodies of them, although not so numerous as the Southern. They all entered into that great contest with similar views, properties, and designs. Like brethren, they contended for the benefit of the whole, leaving to each the right to pursue its happiness in its own way.

They thus nobly toiled and bled together, really like brethren; and it is a most remarkable fact that, notwithstanding in the course of the Revolution the Southern States were continually overrun by the British, and that every negro in them had an opportunity of leaving their owners, few did; proving thereby not only a most remarkable attachment to their owners, but the mildness of the treatment, from which their affection sprang. They then were, as they still are, as valuable a part of our population to the Union as any other equal number of inhabitants. They were, in numerous instances, the pioneers, and in all the labors, of your armies. To their hands were owing the erection of the greatest part of the fortifications raised for the protection of our country; some of which, particularly Fort Moultrie, gave, at that early period of the inexperience and untried valor of our citizens, immortality to American arms; and in the Northern States numerous bodies of them were enrolled into and fought by the sides of the whites the battles of the Revolution.

Things went on in this way until the period of our attempt to form our first national compact, the Confederation, in which the equality of vote was preserved, and the first squeamishness on the subject of not using, or even alluding to, the word slavery, or making it a part of our political machinery, was shown. In this compact, the value of the lands and improvements was made the rule for apportioning the public burdens and taxes. But the Northern and Eastern States, who are always much more alive to their interests than the Southern, found that their squeamishness was inconsistent with their interest; and, as usual, made the latter prevail. They found it was paying too dear for their qualms to keep their hand from the slaves any longer. At their instance, and on their motion, as will appear by a reference to the Journals of the Old Congress, the making lands the rule was changed, and people, including the whites and three-fifths of other descriptions was adopted. It was not until in 1781, that the Confederation was adopted by, and became binding on, all the States. This miserable, feeble mockery of Government crawled on until 1785, when, from New York's refusing to agree with all the States to grant to Congress the impost, (I am not sure, but I believe she stood alone in the refusal,) the States determined no longer to put up with her conduct, and absolutely rebelled against the Government. The first State that did so was New Jersey, who, by a solemn act, passed in all its proper forms by her legislature and government, most positively and absolutely refused any longer to obey the requisitions of Congress, or to pay another dollar. As there was no doubt other States would soon follow their example—as Pennsylvania shortly did—Congress, aware of the mischiefs which must arise if a dissolution took place of the Union before a new Government could be formed, sent a deputation of their own body to address the Legislature of New Jersey, of which I was appointed chairman. We did repair there, and addressed them, and I had the honor and happiness to carry back with me to Congress the repeal of her act by New Jersey—a State, during the whole of the Revolutionary war, celebrated for her patriotism, and who, in this noble self-denial, and forgetfulness of injuries inflicted by New York on her and the rest of the Union, exhibited a disinterestedness and love of Union which did her the highest honor.

The revolt of New Jersey and Pennsylvania accelerated the new Constitution. On a motion from Virginia the Convention met at Philadelphia, where, as you will find from the Journals, we were repeatedly in danger of dissolving without doing any thing; that body being equally divided as to large and small States, and each having a vote, and the small States insisting most pertinaciously, for near six weeks, on equal power in both branches—nothing but the prudence and forbearance of the large States saved the Union. A compromise was made, that the small States and large should be equally represented in the Senate, and proportionally in the House of Representatives. I am now arrived at the reason for which I have, sir, taken the liberty to make these preliminary remarks.

For, as the true motive for all this dreadful clamor throughout the Union, this serious and eventful attack on our most sacred and valuable rights and properties, is, to gain a fixed ascendancy in the representation in Congress; and, as the only flimsy excuse under which the Northern and Eastern States shelter themselves, is, that they have been hardly treated in the representation in this House, and that they have lost the benefit of the compromise they pretend was made, and which I shall most positively deny, and show that nothing like a compromise was ever intended.

By all the public expenses being borne by indirect taxes, and not direct, as was expected; if I can show that all their pretensions and claims are wholly untrue and unfounded, and that while they are fully represented, they did, by force, or something like it, deprive us of a rightful part of our representation, I shall then be able to take the mask from all their pretended reasons and excuses, and show this unpardonable attack, this monster, in its true and uncovered hideousness.

Long before our present public distresses had convinced even the most ignorant and uninformed politician of the truth of the maxim I am about to mention, all the well-informed statesmen of our Union knew that the only true mode for a large agricultural and commercial country to flourish, was never to import more than they can pay for by the export of their own native products; that, if they do, they will be sure to plunge themselves into the distressing and disgraceful situation this country is in at present.

If, then, this great political truth or maxim, or call it what you please, is most unquestionable, let us now see who supports this Government; who raises your armies, equips your navies, pays your public debt, enables you to erect forts, arsenals, and dock yards. Who nerves the arm of this Government and enables you to lift it for the protection, the honor, and extension of our beloved Republic into regions where none but brutes and savages have before roamed? Who are your real sinews in war, and the best—I had almost said nearly the only—sinews and sources of your commerce in peace? I will presently tell you.

If, as no doubt, you will in future confine your imports to the amount of your exports of native products, and all your revenue is to be, as it is now, raised by taxes or duties on your imports, I ask you who pays the expense, and who, in fact, enables you to go on with your Government at all, and prevents its wheels from stopping? I will show you by the papers which I hold in my hand. This, sir, is your Secretary of the Treasury's report, made a few weeks ago, by which it appears that all the exports of native products, from Maine to Pennsylvania, inclusive, for the last year, amounted to only about eighteen millions of dollars; while those among the slaveholding States, to the southward of Pennsylvania, amounted to thirty-two millions or thereabouts, thereby enabling themselves, or acquiring the right, to import double as much as the others, and furnishing the Treasury with double the amount the Northern and Eastern States do. And here let me ask, from whence do these exports arise? By whose hands are they made? I answer, entirely by the slaves; and yet these valuable inhabitants, without whom your very Government could not go on, and the labor of two or three of whom in the Southern States is more valuable to it than the labor of five of their inhabitants in the Eastern States, the States owning and possessing them are denied a representation but for three-fifths on this floor, while the whole of the comparatively unproductive inhabitants of the Northern and Eastern States are fully represented here. Is it just—is this equal? And yet they have the modesty to complain of the representation, as unjust and unequal; and that they have not the return made them they expected, by taxing the slaves, and making them bear a proportion of the public burdens. Some writers on political economy are of opinion that the representation of a State ought always to be equally founded on population and taxation. It is my duty to believe that these are the true criterions; for my own State (South Carolina) having, in her House of Representatives, 124 members, 62 of them are apportioned to the white population, and 62 on taxation; thus representing the contributions of our citizens in every way, whether arising from services or taxes.

H. OF R.

Admission of Missouri.

Before I proceed to the other parts of this question, I have thus endeavored to give a new view of the subject of representation in this House; to show how much more the Eastern and Northern States are represented than the Southern and Western; how little right the former have to complain, and how unreasonable it is that, while, to continue the balance of representation in the Senate, we consent to give admission to Maine, to make up for Missouri, they most unconscionably require to have both, and thus add four to the number now preparing, most cruelly, to lift the arm of the Government against the property of the Southern and Western States.

If I have succeeded, as I hope I have, in proving the unreasonableness of the complaints of the Eastern and Northern States on the subject of representation, it would, I suppose, appear extraordinary to the people of this nation that this attempt should now be made, even if Congress should be found to possess the right to legislate or interfere in it. But if, in addition to this, it should be in my power to show that they have not the most distant right to interfere, or to legislate at all upon the subject of slavery, or to admit a State in any way whatever except on terms of perfect equality; that they have no right to make compacts on the subject, and that the only power they have is to see that the government of the State to be admitted is a republican one, having legislative, executive, and judiciary powers, the rights of conscience, jury, a habeas corpus, and all the great leading principles of our republican systems, well secured, and to guaranty them to it: if I shall be able to do this, of course the attempt must fail, and the amendment be rejected.

The supporters of the amendment contend that Congress have the right to insist on the prevention of involuntary servitude in Missouri; and found the right on the ninth section of the first article, which says, "the migration or importation of such persons as the States now existing may think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808, but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation not exceeding ten dollars."

In considering this article, I will detail, as far as at this distant period is possible, what was the intention of the Convention that formed the Constitution in this article. The intention was, to give Congress a power, after the year 1808, to prevent the importation of slaves either by land or water from other countries. The word import, includes both, and applies wholly to slaves. Without this limitation, Congress might have stopped it sooner under their general power to regulate commerce; and it was an agreed point, a solemnly understood compact, that, on the Southern States consenting to shut their ports against the importation of Africans, no power was to be delegated to Congress, nor were they ever to be authorized to touch the question of slavery; that the property of the Southern States in slaves was to be as sacredly preserved, and protected to them, as that of land, or any other kind of property in the Eastern States were to be to their citizens.

The term, or word, migration, applies wholly to free whites; in its Constitutional sense, as intended by the Convention, it means "voluntary change of servitude," from one country to another. The reasons of its being adopted and used in the Constitution, as far as I can recollect, were these; that the Constitution being a frame of government, consisting wholly of delegated powers, all power, not expressly delegated, being reserved to the people or the States, it was supposed, that, without some express grant to them of power on the subject, Congress would not be authorized ever to touch the question of migration hither, or emigration to this country, however pressing or urgent the necessity for such a measure might be; that they could derive no such power from the usages of nations, or even the laws of war; that the latter would only enable them to make prisoners of alien enemies, which would not be sufficient, as spies or other dangerous emigrants, who were not alien enemies, might enter the country for treasonable purposes, and do great injury; that, as all governments possessed this power, it was necessary to give it to our own, which could alone exercise it, and where, on other and much greater points, we had placed unlimited confidence; it was, therefore, agreed that, in the same article, the word migration should be placed; and that, from the year 1808, Congress should possess the complete power to stop either or both, as they might suppose the public interest required; the article, therefore, is a negative pregnant, restraining for twenty years, and giving the power after.

The reasons for restraining the power to prevent migration hither for twenty years, were, to the best of my recollection, these: That, as at this time, we had immense and almost immeasurable territory, peopled by not more than two millions and a half of inhabitants, it was of very great consequence to encourage the emigration of able, skilful, and industrious Europeans. The wise conduct of William Penn, and the unexampled growth of Pennsylvania, were cited. It was said, that the portals of the only temple of true freedom now existing on earth should be thrown open to all mankind; that all foreigners of industrious habits should be welcome, and none more so than men of science, and such as may bring to us arts we are unacquainted with, or the means of perfecting those in which we are not yet sufficiently skilled—capitalists whose wealth may add to our commerce or domestic improvements; let the door be ever and most affectionately open to illustrious exiles and sufferers in the cause of liberty; in short, open it liberally to science, to merit, and talents, wherever found, and receive and make them your own. That the safest mode would be to pursue the course for twenty years, and not, before that period, put it at all into the power of Congress to shut it; that, by that time, the Union would be so settled, and our population would be so much increased, we could proceed on our own stock, without the farther accession of foreigners; that, as Congress were to be prohibited from stopping the importation of slaves to settle the Southern States, as no obstacle was to be thrown in the way of their increase and settlement for that period, let it be so with the Northern and Eastern, to which, particularly New York and Philadelphia, it was expected most of the emigrants would go from Europe: and it so happened, for, previous to the year 1808, more than double as many Europeans emigrated to these States, as of Africans were imported into the Southern States.

I have, sir, smiled at the idea of some gentlemen in supposing that Congress possessed the power to insert this amendment, from that which is given in the Constitution to regulate commerce between the several States; and some have asserted, that under it, they not only have the power to inhibit slavery in Missouri, but even to prevent the migration of slaves from one State to another—from Maryland to Virginia. The true and peculiarly ludicrous manner in which a gentleman from that State lately treated this part of the subject, will, no doubt, induce an abandonment of this pretended right; nor shall I stop to answer it until gentlemen can convince me that migration does not mean change of residence from one country or climate to another, and that the United States are not one country, one nation, or one people. If the word does mean as I contend, and we are one people, I will then ask, how it is possible to migrate from one part of a country to another part of the same country? Surely, sir, when such straws as these are caught at to support a right, the hopes of doing so must be slender indeed. I will only mention here, as it is perfectly within my recollection, that the power was given to Congress to regulate the commerce by water between the States, and it being feared, by the Southern, that the Eastern would, whenever they could, do so to the disadvantage of the Southern States, you will find, in the 6th section of the 1st article, Congress are prevented from taxing exports, or giving preference to the ports of one State over another, or obliging vessels bound from one State to clear, enter, or pay duties in another; which restrictions, more clearly than any thing else, prove what the power to regulate commerce among the several States means.

The gentlemen, being driven from these grounds, come then to what they call their great and impregnable right—that, under the 3d section of the 4th article, it is declared, new States may be admitted into this Union by the Congress; and that, by the latter clause of the same section, the Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

By the first clause they contend, that Congress has an ample and unlimited command over the whole subject; that they can reject the admission of a State altogether, or can admit one, and impose such conditions, or make such compacts with a State as they may please; and that, unless a State accepts the offers they may make, they may refuse her admission. Let us first inquire what the laws of nations call a State. Vattel says, "Nations or 'States are bodies politic: societies of men united 'together to procure their mutual safety and advantage by means of their union. Such a society 'has its affairs and interests; it deliberates and 'resolves in common, and thus becomes a moral 'person, having an understanding and a will peculiar to itself, and is susceptible of obligations 'and laws.'" This is what he calls a State. What do we call one? A territory inhabited by a people living under a government formed by themselves, which government possesses, in a republican form, all the legislative, executive, and judiciary powers necessary to the protection of the lives, liberties, characters and properties of their citizens, or which they can exercise for their benefit, and have not delegated to the General Government, for the common defence and general welfare of an union, composed of a number of States, whose rights and political powers are all perfectly equal; that, among these, one of the most important is, that of deciding for themselves what kind of persons shall inhabit their country, no others being either so capable or fit to judge on this very important point as respects their private happiness as themselves, as they alone are either to suffer or benefit from the injudicious or wise choice they may make; that as the other States possess completely this power, Missouri has the same right; that, if she was inclined, she could not give to Congress the right to decide for her, nor could the latter accept it; that all the inhabitants of Missouri being against the prohibition, to insist on it, is to entirely put it out of her power to enter the Union, and to keep her in a state of colonial tyranny; that, if you can exercise this right, where will you stop? May you not dictate to her the nature of the government she shall have? may you not give her a plural executive, a legislature for six and judges for one year? If you say there shall be no slavery, may you not say there shall be no marriage? may you not insist on her being different in every respect from the others? Sir, if you are determined to break the Constitution in this important point, you may even proceed to do so in the essences of the very form you are bound to guaranty to them. Instead of endeavoring to lessen or injure the force and spirit of the State governments, every true friend of his country ought to endeavor, as far as he can, to strengthen them; for, be assured, it will be to the strength and increase of our State governments, more than any other, that the American Republic will owe its firmness and duration.

The people of Europe, from their total ignorance of our country and Government, have always augured that its great extent, when it came to be thickly peopled, would occasion its separation; this is still the opinion of all, and the hope of many there; whereas, nothing can be more true in our politics than that, in proportion to the increase of the State governments, the strength and solidity of the Federal Government are augmented; so that, with twenty or twenty-two governments, we shall be much more secure from disunion than with twelve, and ten times more so than if we were a single or consolidated one. By the individual States exercising, as they do, all the powers necessary for municipal or individual purposes—trying all questions of property, and punishing all crimes not belonging, in either case, to the federal courts, and leaving the General Government at leisure and in a situation solely to devote itself to the exercise of the great powers of war and peace, commerce and our connexions with foreigners, and all the natural authorities delegated by the Constitution, it eases them of a vast quantity of business that would very much disturb the exercise of their general powers. Nor is it clear that any single government, in a country so extensive, could transmit the full influence of the laws necessary to local purposes through all its parts; whereas, the State governments, having all a convenient surrounding territory, exercise these powers with ease, and are always at hand to give aid to the federal tribunals and officers placed among them to execute their laws, should assistance be necessary. Another great advantage is, the almost utter impossibility of erecting among them the standard of faction, to any alarming degree, against the Union, so as to threaten its dissolution, or produce changes in any but a Constitutional way. It is well known that faction is always much more easy and dangerous in small than large countries; and when we consider that, to the security afforded by the extent of our territory are to be added, the guards of the State Legislatures, which being selected as they are, and always the most proper organs of their citizens' opinions as to the measures of the General Government, stand as alert and faithful sentinels to disprove, as they did in the times that are past, such acts as appear impolitic or unconstitutional, or to approve and support, as they have frequently done since, such as were patriotic or praiseworthy. With such guards it is impossible for any serious opposition to be made to the Federal Government on slight or trivial grounds; nor, through such an extent of territory or number of States, would any but the most tyrannical or corrupt acts claim serious attention; and, whenever they occur, we can always safely trust to a sufficient number of the States arraying themselves in a manner to produce by their influence the necessary reforms, in a peaceable and legal mode. With twenty-four or more States it will be impossible, sir, for four or five States, or any comparatively small number, ever to threaten the existence of the Union. They will be easily seen through by the other eighteen or twenty, and frowned into insignificance and submission to the general will, in all cases where the proceedings of the Federal Government are approved by them. And, even in cases where doubts may arise as to the wisdom or policy of their measures, all factious measures will be made to wait Constitutional redress, in the peaceable manner prescribed by the Constitution.

Without the instrumentality of the States in a country so large and free, and with their Government at a great distance from its extremities, there would be considerable danger of faction; but at present there is very little, and, as the States increase, the danger will lessen; and it is this admirable expanding principle or system, if I may use the term, which, while it carries new States and governments into our forests and increases the population and resources of the Union, must unquestionably, at the same time, add to its means to resist and repress with ease all attacks of foreign hostility or domestic faction. It is this system, which is not at all understood in Europe and too little among ourselves, that will long keep us a strong and united people; nor do I see any question, but the one which respects slavery, that can ever divide us.

The question being the admission of a new State, I hope these remarks will be considered as in point, as they go to show the importance of the State governments, and how really and indeed indispensably they are the pillars of the Federal Government, and how anxious we should be to strengthen and not to impair them, to make them all the strong and equal supporters of the federal system.

With respect to Louisiana, Congress have already by their acts solemnly ratified the treaty which extends to all the States, created out of that purchase, the benefits of an admission into the Union on equal terms with the old States; they gave to Louisiana first, and afterwards to Missouri and Arkansas, Territorial governments, in all of which they agreed to the admission of slaves. Louisiana was incorporated into the Union, allowing their admission; Missouri was advanced to the second grade of Territorial government, without the prohibition of slavery: thus, for more than sixteen years, Missouri considered herself precisely in the situation of her sister Louisiana, and many thousands of slaves have been carried by settlers there. To deny it, then, now, will operate as a snare, unworthy the faith of this Government. What is to be done? Are the slaves now there to be manumitted, or their masters obliged to carry them away, break up all their settlements, and, in this unjust and unexpected manner, to be hurled into ruin? If we are to pay no respect to the Constitution, or to treaties, are we to pay no respect to our own laws, by which the faith of the nation has, for sixteen years, been solemnly pledged, that no prohibition would take place, as to slavery, in those States? I have said so much, to show how important it is to the firmness and duration of the American Union, to preserve the States and their government in the full possession of all the rights secured by the Constitution.

I have hitherto said nothing of the treaty, as I consider the rights of Missouri to rest on the Constitution so strongly, as not require the aid of the treaty. But, I will, at the same time say, that, if there was no right under the Constitution, the treaty, of itself, is sufficient, and fully so, to give it to her. Let us, however, shortly examine the treaty. The words are these: "The inhabitants 'of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in 'the Union of the United States, and admitted, 'as soon as possible, according to the principles 'of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment 'of all the rights, advantages, and immunities, of 'the citizens of the United States.'" Of these it is particularly observable, that, to leave no doubt on the mind of either of the Governments which formed it, or of any impartial man, so much pains are taken to secure to Louisiana all the rights of the States of the American Union, a singular and uncommon surplussage is introduced into the article. Either of the words, immunities, rights, or advantages, would have been, of itself, fully sufficient. Immunity means privilege, exemption, freedom—right means justice, just claim, privilege—advantage means convenience, gain, benefit, favorable to circumstances. If either word, therefore, is sufficient to give her a right to be placed on an equal footing with the other States, who shall doubt of her right, when you now find that your Government has solemnly pledged itself to bestow on, and guaranty to, Louisiana all the privileges, exemptions, and freedom, rights, immunities, and advantages, justice, just claims, conveniences, gains, benefits, and favorable circumstances, enjoyed by the other States?

In speaking of treaties, Vattel states as follows: "The implicit submission to their authority which 'is exhibited everywhere, proves the strength, 'indeed, unanswerable strength, in which it is 'founded."

These writers say, that every thing which the public safety renders inviolable is sacred in society. Who, then, can doubt that treaties are in the number of those things that are held most sacred by nations? They determine the most important affairs, give rules to their pretensions, and secure their most precious interests. But treaties are only vain words, if they are not considered as inviolable rules to sovereigns, and as sacred throughout the whole world. Treaties are, then, most holy and sacred among nations; and, if people are not wanting to themselves, infamy must ever be the share of him who violates his faith; for, in doing so, he violates the law of nations; he despises that faith which they declare sacred; he is doubly guilty—he does an injury to all nations, and wounds the whole human race.

If this is the reasoning of the best writers on the laws of nations, are we now disposed, for the first time, to be the instruments of rendering this nation infamous in the eyes of the whole world, and wound the human race? Are we, who have so frequently charged the English and Spaniards with breach of treaties and of faith, now to become breakers of treaties ourselves—exhibit our hitherto honorable, and even uncharged, Republic as an evil example to other Governments? Are we, who have always kept our treaties with scrupulous faith with our Indian neighbors, and considered their weakness as an additional call on our honor, to do so—are we now, for the first time, to turn back on all our former courses, and make our feeble brethren of Missouri the first victims of our breach of national faith? Even if the treaty was ambiguous, if it was doubtful, do not the laws of nations expressly declare "that, in doubtful cases, treaties shall be construed in favor of those for whose benefit they were made? And was it not for the express benefit of Louisiana (all Louisiana, to the utmost limits) that this treaty was made, giving to the whole Territory, and all that may inhabit it as citizens of this Union, equal rights, immunities, and advantages, with the citizens of all the other States in it? Unquestionably it was; and it is our duty to prevent, in the words of Vattel, "the infamy of our hitherto untainted and even unsuspected Government, and honorably and literally carry the treaty into execution."

Having thus, I trust, proved clearly that you have no right to adopt this inhibition of slavery, but are forbid to do so by the Constitution, as well as by the treaty, I ought perhaps to stop here; but there are some other points which I ought not to pass unnoticed. One of these is the ordinance of July, 1787, passed by the Old Congress, at the period of the sitting of the Convention in Philadelphia, for forming the Constitution, by which that body (the Old Congress) undertook to form a code for the future settlement, government, and admission into the Union, of all the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, ceded by Virginia to the United States in 1785; which cession has so often been read to the House in this discussion. On this subject, I beg leave to remark that, by the Confederation of the United States, the Old Congress had no power whatever but that of admitting new States, provided nine States assented. By this, it is most unquestionable, that no number of States under nine had any right to admit new States. Of course, it was the intention of the Confederation that, on so important a measure as the establishment of governments for, and the admission of, new States, Congress should never possess the power to act, unless nine States were represented in that body at the time of their doing so. This ordinance, therefore, in prescribing the forms of government, as they respected legislative, executive, and judiciary powers, in establishing bills of rights, and the times and terms of their admission into the Union, and inhibiting servitude therein, is chargeable with ingratitude and usurpation. It is chargeable with ingratitude, when we reflect that the cession of the great tract of country—this rising empire of freemen—was gratuitously, and with noble disinterestedness and patriotism, made by Virginia, that the passing of an ordinance which contained a provision which could not but go to prevent the admission of Virginians there, as they could not move there with their slaves, was a most ungracious and ungrateful return to that State for her liberality, and could not but meet with the disapprobation of this nation.

I have already mentioned the reasons to show, that unless they had nine States present, the Old Congress had no power to admit new States, and of course no power to prescribe the forms of government, bills of rights, or terms or times of admissions, benefits, or exclusions, with a less number than nine.

If there were not other strong reasons attending the passing this ordinance, those already mentioned are sufficient to show that it is a nullity; that it never had or could have had a binding force; that the present Congress had nor has any Constitutional right to confirm that part of it which respects the exclusion of involuntary servitude from that Territory; and that the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, having by their constitutions voluntarily excluded it, possess the power whenever they please to alter their constitutions, and admit servitude in any way they think proper.

Let us, sir, recollect the circumstances the Old Congress were in at the time they passed this ordinance: they had dwindled almost to nothing; the Convention had been then three months in session; it was universally known a Constitution was in its essentials agreed to; and the public were daily expecting (what soon happened) the promulgation of a new form of Government for the Union. I ask, sir, was it under these circumstances proper for a feeble, dwindled body, that had wholly lost the confidence of the nation, and which was then waiting its supersession by the people—a feeble, inefficient body, in which only seven or eight States were represented, the whole of which consisted of but seventeen or eighteen men—a number smaller than your large committees; a body literally in the very agonies of political death;—was it, sir, even decent in them (not to say lawful or Constitutional) to have passed an ordinance of such importance? I do not know or recollect the names of the members who voted for it, but it is to be fairly presumed they could not have been among the men who possessed the greatest confidence of the Union, or at that very time they would have been members of the Convention sitting at Philadelphia. But I am perhaps taking up your time unnecessarily on this subject, and I shall proceed to others.

A great deal has been said on the subject of slavery—that it is an infamous stain and blot on the States that hold them; not only degrading the slave, but the master, and making him unfit for republican government; that it is contrary to religion and the law of God; and that Congress ought to do every thing in their power to prevent its extension among the new States.

Now, sir, I should be glad to know how any man is acquainted with what is the will or the law of God on this subject. Has it ever been imparted either to the old or new world? Is there a single line in the Old or New Testament, either censuring or forbidding it? I answer without hesitation, no. But there are hundreds speaking of and recognising it. Hagar, from whom millions sprang, was an African slave, bought out of Egypt by Abraham, the father of the faithful and the beloved servant of the Most High; and he had, besides, three hundred and eighteen male slaves. The Jews, in the time of the theocracy, and the Greeks and Romans, had all slaves; at that time there was no nation without them. If we are to believe that this world was formed by a great and omnipotent Being; that nothing is permitted to exist here but by his will, and then throw our eyes throughout the whole of it, we should form an opinion very different indeed from that asserted, that slavery was against the law of God.

Let those acquainted with the situation of the people of Asia and Africa, where not one man in ten can be called a freeman, or whose situation can be compared with the comforts of our slaves, throw their eyes over them, and carry them to Russia, and from the North to the South of Europe, where, except Great Britain, nothing like liberty exists. Let them view the lower classes of their inhabitants, by far the most numerous of the whole; the thousands of beggars that infest their streets, more than half starved, half naked, and in the most wretched state of human degradation. Let him then go to England; the comforts, if they have any, of the lower classes of whose inhabitants are far inferior to those of our slaves. Let him, when there, ask of their economists, what are the numbers of millions daily fed by the hand of charity; and, when satisfied there, then let him come nearer home, and examine into the situation of the free negroes now resident in New York and Philadelphia, and compare them with the situation of our slaves, and he will tell you that, perhaps, the most miserable and degraded state of human nature is to be found among the free negroes of New York and Philadelphia, most of whom are fugitives from the Southern States, received and sheltered in those States. I did not go to New York, but I did to Philadelphia, and particularly examined this subject while there. I saw their streets crowded with idle, drunken negroes, at every corner; and, on visiting their penitentiary, found, to my astonishment, that, out of five hundred convicts there confined, more than one-half were blacks; and, as all the convicts throughout that State are sent to that penitentiary, and, if Pennsylvania contains eight hundred thousand white inhabitants, and only twenty-six thousand blacks, of course the crimes and vices of the blacks in those States are, comparatively, twenty times greater than those of the whites in the same States, and clearly proves that a state of freedom is one of the greatest curses you can inflict on them.

From the opinions expressed respecting the Southern States and the slaves there, it appears to me most clear, that the members on the opposite side know nothing of the Southern States, their lands, products, or slaves. Those who visit us, or go to the southward, find so great a difference that many of them remain and settle there. I perfectly recollect that when, in 1791, General Washington visited South Carolina, he was so surprised at the richness, order, and soil of our country, that he expressed his great astonishment at the state of agricultural improvement and excellence our tide-lands exhibited. He said, he had no idea the United States possessed it. Had I then seen as much of Europe as I have since, I would have replied to him, that he would not see its equal in Europe. Sir, when we recollect that our former parent State was the original cause of introducing slavery into America, and that neither ourselves or ancestors are chargeable with it; that it cannot be got rid of without ruining the country, certainly the present mild treatment of our slaves is most honorable to that part of the country where slavery exists. Every slave has a comfortable house, is well fed, clothed, and taken care of; he has his family about him, and in sickness has the same medical aid as his master, and has a sure and comfortable retreat in old age, to protect him against its infirmities and weakness. During the whole of his life he is free from care, that canker of the human heart, which destroys at least one-half of the thinking part of mankind, and from which a favored few, very few, if indeed any, can be said to be free. Being without education, and born to obey, to persons of that description moderate labor and discipline are essential. The discipline ought to be mild, but still, while slavery is to exist, there must be discipline. In this state they are happier than they can possibly be if free. A free black can only be happy where he has some share of education, and has been bred to a trade, or some kind of business. The great body of slaves are happier in their present situation than they could be in any other, and the man or men who would attempt to give them freedom, would be their greatest enemies.

All the writers who contend that the slaves increase faster than the free blacks, if they assert what is true, prove that the black, when in the condition of a slave, is happier than when free, as, in proportion to the comfort and happiness of any kind of people, such will be the increase; and the next census will show what has been the increase of both descriptions, free and slave, and will, I think, prove the truth of these opinions.

In this discussion the question as to the purchase of Louisiana has been introduced, and gives me an opportunity to state my opinion on the subject. So far as my knowledge of the facts, preceding that purchase, enable me to form an opinion, I pronounce that Mr. Jefferson, in planning the purchase, and the gentlemen who were employed in negotiating it, covered themselves with glory. The facts that preceded that purchase were these: In the year 1786, Spain despatched a Minister, named Gardoqui, to this country, instructed to offer to form with us a treaty of commerce, which she said was an advantageous one, if we would, in the same treaty, consent to give up the navigation of that part of the river Mississippi which ran through the Spanish dominions. This, sir, I asserted on this floor some days ago, and now repeat, that, on this treaty being, according to the then routine of business, referred to Mr. Jay, then Secretary for Foreign Affairs, he did, to the best of my recollection, report that it would, in his opinion, be expedient to adopt it; that seven, all of the Eastern and Northern States, did vote for it, but that, owing to the Confederation requiring that nine States should be necessary to form a treaty, it was at length defeated. If any part of the public business in this country, in which I have been engaged, ever gave me more pleasure than others, it was the agency I had in association with an honorable gentleman, now high in office, and in Washington, in preventing it. I believe I may venture to say, that it was owing to us the whole of the Western country now belongs to us, and that the Mississippi now flows through American lands, and that the American flag now waves alone on her waters. I, therefore, have always felt more than a fraternal—I have felt, sir, a paternal love for this country. Nor, sir, is this the only important agency I have had in the affairs of this very valuable part of our Union. It will be remembered that, in the year 1802, the Intendant of New Orleans issued a proclamation, shutting that port to the further reception and deposit of American produce, under the treaty of 1795, and that, on his doing so, a ferment was excited throughout the Union, of the most alarming nature; that war was called for, both in the Senate and out of doors, which it was difficult for all the prudence and love of peace of the President to repress. Being, at that time, the Minister of the United States in Spain, I received instructions from our Government to use every exertion in my power, consistent with its dignity, to get the deposit restored, which I fortunately did, and this affair led to the acquisition of both the river and whole country in the manner you know. At the time I went to Europe, I was alone commissioned and authorized to treat for, and purchase, all the part of Louisiana, including New Orleans, to the east of the Mississippi and the Floridas; but, on arriving in Europe, I found Louisiana had been previously secretly sold to Bonaparte, of which I informed Mr. Jefferson, and he took the measures which accomplished the purchase.

In pursuing the arguments of some gentlemen, on this subject, I have omitted to notice one of their arguments, springing from that part of the third section of the fourth article, which says, "the Congress shall have the power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory, or other property, belonging to the United States," because this article certainly refers only to the territorial state, to which I have already referred, and in which, I do not hesitate to aver, that, in making such regulations for the government of the territory, they are no more authorized to inhibit slavery in the territory, than they are in the State—for, if they should have the power, it would indirectly effect the same thing; it not being difficult to see, that, when a territory has been, like Missouri, for sixteen years in a strict state of territorial discipli-line, prohibiting slavery, when the period arrives for her admission as a State, she will be peopled entirely by inhabitants not having slaves, and who will, of course, insert the prohibition in their constitution.

It ought to be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that the greatest part of the debt due for Louisiana is still unpaid, and that, if the mode I have asserted, by which your Treasury is now furnished, and must be in future, is true, then the slaveholding States will have more than half of the purchase to pay; but, suppose we have only one-half of it to pay, is it not fair, is it not just, that the use of this purchase should be as open to the inhabitants of the slaveholding, as to the inhabitants of the non-slaveholding States? And how can this happen, if you say to the inhabitants of the Northern States, you may go there with your families, and all your properties; but, if you, from the Southern or slaveholding States, choose to go there, it must be without your slaves, these shall not go? thus denying to these the instruments of their agriculture, and the means of their comfort, and completely preventing the possibility of their removing. From this, sir, will arise another evil, that of the fall of the value of all the lands the United States may have to sell in the Territories or States from which slavery is excluded, at least one-half, which, if the computations of the number of acres come any thing near the mark, must amount to at least six hundreds of millions of dollars lost to the common Treasury.

I have not condescended to notice the remark, that one of the evils of slavery is, the lessening and depreciating the character of the whites in the slaveholding States, and rendering it less manly and republican, and less worthy, than in the non-slaveholding States, because it is not less decorous than true; it is refuted in a moment by a review of the Revolutionary, and particularly the last war. Look into your histories, compare the conduct of the heroes and statesmen of the North and South, in both those wars, in the field, and in the Senate; see the monuments of valor, of wisdom, and patriotism, they have left behind them, and then ask an impartial world, on which side the Delaware lies the preponderance: they will answer in a moment, to the South.

It will not be a matter of surprise to any one, that so much anxiety should be shown by the slaveholding States, when it is known that the alarm, given by this attempt to legislate on slavery, has led to the opinion, that the very foundations of that kind of property are shaken; that the establishment of the precedent is a measure of the most alarming nature; for, should succeeding Congresses continue to push it, there is no knowing to what length it may be carried.

Have the Northern States any idea of the value of our slaves? At least, sir, six hundred millions of dollars. If we lose them, the value of the lands they cultivate will be diminished in all cases one half, and, in many, they will become wholly useless, and an annual income of at least forty millions of dollars will be lost to your citizens; the loss of which will not alone be felt by the non-slaveholding States, but by the whole Union; for, to whom, at present, do the Eastern States, most particularly, and the Eastern and Northern, generally, look for the employment of their shipping, in transporting our bulky and valuable products, and bringing us the manufactures and merchandises of Europe? Another thing, in case of these losses being brought on us, and our being forced into a division of the Union, what becomes of your public debt? Who are to pay this, and how will it be paid? In a pecuniary view of this subject, therefore, it must ever be the policy of the Eastern and Northern States to continue connected with us. But, sir, there is an infinitely greater call upon them, and this is the call of justice, of affection, and humanity. Reposing at a great distance, in safety, in the full enjoyment of all their Federal and State rights, unattacked in either, or in their individual rights, can they, with indifference, or ought they to risk, in the remotest degree, the consequences which this measure may produce. These may be the division of this Union, and a civil war. Knowing that whatever is said here, must get into the public prints, I am unwilling, for obvious reasons, to go into the description of the horrors which such a war must produce, and ardently pray that none of us may ever live to witness such an event.

If you refuse to admit Missouri without this prohibition, and she refuses it, and proceeds to form a constitution for herself, and then applies to you for admission, what will you do? Will you compel them by force? By whom, or by what force can this be effected? Will the States in her neighborhood join in this crusade? Will they, who, to a man, think Missouri is right, and you are wrong, arm in such a cause? Can you send a force from the eastward of the Delaware? The very distance forbids it; and distance is a powerful auxiliary to a country attacked. If, in the days of James II., English soldiers, under military discipline, when ordered to march against their countrymen, contending in the cause of liberty, disobeyed the order, and laid down their arms, do you think our free brethren on the Mississippi will not do the same? Yes, sir, they will refuse, and you will at last be obliged to retreat from this measure, and in a manner that will not add much to the dignity of your Government.

I cannot, on any ground, think of agreeing to a compromise on this subject. However we all may wish to see Missouri admitted, as she ought, on equal terms with the other States, this is a very unimportant object to her, compared with keeping the Constitution inviolate—with keeping the hands of Congress from touching the question of slavery. On the subject of the Constitution, no compromise ought ever to be made. Neither can any be made on the national faith, so seriously involved in the treaty which gives to all Louisiana, to every part of it, a right to be incorporated into the Union on equal terms with the other States.

Surely, sir, when we consider the public distress of this country, and the necessity of union and good humor to repair our finances, and place our commerce in that improved situation which will give us some hope of the rise of our products, such as may have a tendency to relieve our public and private embarrassments, if we had no other motives for it, certainly this should be sufficient. But, sir, there is one of infinitely higher moment. Do we recollect, that we are the only free Republic now in existence, and that, probably, such existence can only depend upon our distance from Europe, and our union with our present numbers? It may safely be calculated we have two millions of men, the greatest part of whom are able to bear arms.

In case of our continuing an united people, no attack from Europe, a distance of four thousand miles, could ever be made with the least hope of success. From the distance, all Europe could not furnish either the men or means sufficient to divide or destroy this Union. If we continue united, as we have been, in such an event, the States would so second the General Government, and so nerve its arm, as to put all attack at defiance. But, if on this, or any other occasion, this Union should unhappily divide, and from friends become bitter and implacable enemies to each other, who shall say what Europe may attempt? Mark what they have done among themselves, to subjugate France, and destroy, in that part of the world, every thing that has the semblance of republicanism. View the league they have formed, in which, for the first time, all Europe is seen united as a single Government, to maintain their monarchical forms. Such is no doubt, their detestation of every thing like republicanism, that, were the United States in Europe, where they could be reached by land, I have not the smallest doubt, they would long since have been attacked; and every attempt made to reduce them to a monarchy. We are considered, sir, as an evil example to the monarchical world. We are considered as the only repository of those principles which have lately appeared and flourished for a time in Europe; and which it has cost them so much blood and treasure to suppress, and should our divisions, from friends to enemies, ever afford them an opportunity of striking at us, with the least probability of success, no doubt they will do so.

I will not trespass farther on your patience, but thank the Committee for the honor they have done me, by their attention. I hope the great importance of the subject will be my excuse; and that, considering the relation in which I have stood to the Western country and the Mississippi, for the salvation of which, so far as means the keeping it annexed to this Union, as I have already said, I think I may claim to a gentleman, now high in office, and myself, as much as any other two can claim, the happiness of being the instruments, and having thus, in the early part of my life, labored with success for the parent, I cannot but think it a little extraordinary, that I should, at this distant period, be called upon to defend the right of her children. My fervent wish is, that I may be able to do it with the same success.

When Mr. PINEKEY concluded—

The Committee rose, reported progress, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 15.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce, reported a bill to impose a new tonnage duty on French ships, or vessels; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. NEWTON, from the same committee, also reported a bill concerning navigation, and to repeal the act entitled "An act concerning navigation," passed on the 18th of April, 1818; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

On motion of Mr. PINDALL, the letter from the Secretary of State of the 7th February, 1820, transmitting a list of the newspapers in which the laws of the United States are published, and an estimate of the expense of such publication, was referred to a select committee; and that the same committee inquire into the expediency of repealing or amending the acts requiring the publication of the laws in the newspapers; and Mr. PINDALL, Mr. FOOT, and Mr. MERCER, were appointed the said committee.

[This motion of Mr. P. was grounded on the belief that the expenses of promulgating the acts of Congress in newspapers had increased to an unreasonable and improper extent, and that the laws on the subject required repeal or modification, so as to reduce this expense.]

On motion of Mr. WALKER, of North Carolina, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of limiting the quantity of public lands hereafter to be exposed to sale at the several land offices of the United States.

Mr. WALKER said he had heard great complaints against the present mode of exposing to sale the public lands; that the present system opened a door for speculation, and that great speculations had been actually made in the purchase of public lands. He believed that the greatest defect in the system was, that there was too much land brought into market; which afforded an opportunity to purchasers to make large speculations in the purchase: the object of the resolution was to limit the quantity offered for sale, to prevent further abuses, and to prevent too great an extension to purchasers. He was not friendly to an alteration of the price or manner of sale of the present land law, but believed that a limitation of the quantity would answer every purpose which was contemplated by the desire to alter the present law.

An engrossed bill entitled "An act to continue in force for a further time, the act entitled 'An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes,'" was read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Commissioners of Navy Hospitals, rendered in obedience to the resolution of this House of the 31st ult., showing the receipt and expenditure of the moneys accruing to the Navy Hospital fund: which report was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, rendered in obedience to the resolution of this House of the 4th instant, requiring him "to report such measures as, in his opinion, may be expedient to enforce the more speedy payment of public moneys due from individuals and corporate bodies, to the United States;" which was also ordered to lie on the table.

WESTERN ROADS.

Mr. Cook submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the first section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1819," approved March 3, 1819, as pledges the fund reserved for laying out and making roads to the States of Indiana and Illinois, for the repayment of the moneys appropriated and advanced by the United States, for constructing the United States road from Cumberland to the Ohio river, and of appropriating the same to defray the expenses of laying out and making a road from the Ohio river opposite to Wheeling, by Columbus, in the State of Ohio, and by the permanent seat of government of Indiana, on the most eligible route, to Vandalia, in the State of Illinois.

In offering this resolution to the consideration of the House, Mr. Cook begged leave to ask its attention to the act there referred to. By that act the fund reserved for the improvement of roads leading to the States of Indiana and Illinois, had been pledged to the repayment of the money appropriated by Congress for the completion of the Cumberland road. This road was commenced, Mr. C. believed, ten or twelve years ago. By the acts of 1816 and 1818 authorizing the admission of Indiana and Illinois, respectively, two per cent. on the net proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands in those States was reserved by Congress to the laying out and making of roads leading to those States, respectively; and in consideration of this appropriation made by Congress, with others, which were understood on all hands to be for the benefit of those States, respectively, the States surrendered a part of their sovereignty: they agreed that the lands of the United States, then remaining to be sold, should be free from taxation for five years after the day of sale; and in Illinois the bounty lands given to the soldiers of the late army, were also to be exempted from taxation for three years from the date of their patents. This surrender of the sovereign right of Illinois to tax the lands thus exempted, was, Mr. C. said, the consideration given for the road-fund now under consideration, as well as some other advantages which were granted to her, and for which she is grateful to the Government. This, with the other propositions made by Congress, were now matters of compact between Illinois and the United States; and to divert this fund from the channel in which Mr. C. could not but think it was intended to flow, Illinois would consider a violation of that compact.

To appropriate that fund to the making of a road terminating at Wheeling, a point several hundred miles from the border of the State, never could be an appropriation in unison with the intention either of Congress or of the State of Illinois. As well, Mr. C. said, might you appropriate it to the making of a road leading from Santa Fe to Missouri, uniting those two sovereignties, as to the object for which it stands pledged; for this would be a road leading towards Illinois. From an examination of the subject, Mr. C. said he found that the revenue which Illinois would derive from a tax on the lands which may be sold within the State, and on the bounty land, which she cannot now derive, in consequence of this compact, would, at a reasonable rate, amount to about two hundred and eighty thousand dollars, a large proportion of which would now be subject to be called into her coffers, and of which she really stood in great need. Could it be contended, Mr. C. asked, that this fund, which was reserved to Indiana and Illinois, respectively, to make roads leading to them, in the one case about ten and the other twelve years after the Cumberland road was commenced, was at that time intended, or understood, either by those States or by the United States, to be subject to defray the expenses of that road? It could not be possible. It seemed, Mr. C. said, much more likely to have been reserved for the purposes contemplated by the resolution which he had offered, to extend that road to the borders of those States, respectively; and unless it was so appropriated, or at least in making roads leading to, and not towards them, he did not think they would have just cause of complaint against the Government. Since the admission of those States Mr. C. believed a fund of about $50,000 had already accrued from the sale of lands, which should be now lying in the National Treasury. This sum, although it would not complete the road, would defray the expense of marking and laying it out, and go far towards opening it, so as to render it passable; and as the fund continued to increase, it might be employed to complete it. Indeed, said Mr. C., it seems to me to be so obvious that the intention of Congress was, that this money should be appropriated to the improvement of roads, to facilitate the entrance to those States, that reasoning cannot make it plainer; and any diversion of it to any other object, therefore, is a violation of the compact between those States and the United States. He trusted that the resolution would be considered and adopted.

The resolution was then considered and adopted, without a division.

Mr. Cook offered also the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the payment of so much of the money arising from the sale of the public lands in the State of Illinois, since the first day of January, 1819, as has been reserved by law for the encouragement of learning, to said State.

Mr. C. observed that the object of this resolution was, simply to enable the State of Illinois to obtain the three per cent. fund arising from the sale of public lands which had been reserved by Congress to be appropriated by the State to the encouragement of learning. This course, he said, had been considered necessary, since the Secretary of the Treasury might not otherwise feel authorized to pay it over. This, Mr. C. said, was the course taken by Indiana to obtain her road fund, reserved in the same way.

This resolution was also adopted without a division.

THE MISSOURI BILL.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on this bill.

Mr. RANKIN, of Mississippi, took the floor, and spoke more than an hour against the restriction.

Mr. R., observed, that Creon, King of Thebes, had been represented by Euripides, to have sent a herald to Athens, who inquired for the King of Athens. Theseus replied, "You seek him in vain; this is a free city, and the sovereign power is in all the people." In our Government, all admit the sovereignty of the people; but, if the arguments of gentlemen who advocate this restriction be correct, Congress possesses absolute sovereignty, and the people are their servants. It is urged that, although Congress has no express delegation of power in the Constitution, yet Congress may, by virtue of its sovereign power, impose any conditions on the admission of Missouri into the Union. There is no sovereignty in Congress, known to the Constitution, except such as is expressly delegated; the limits of which are clearly marked and defined by that instrument. Even State governments, which derive their powers immediately from the people, are but a portion of natural liberty or absolute sovereignty, delegated to rulers, to be exercised for the common welfare. The Federal Government, emanating from the States, and wielding an authority regulating and protecting the community of States, is one degree farther removed from the source of power. In such a Government we are not required, as gentlemen have contended, to search the Constitution for prohibitions, but we search for what is delegated. The silence of the Constitution is our law—a mandate as prohibitory to our exercise of legislation, as the voice of the Almighty to the waves of ocean. Its language is, "Thus far shall you go, and no farther." Depart from these principles, and you tread on dangerous grounds. Imagine you possess an undefined, unlimited sovereignty, not delegated, but resting on your capricious will, superior to all constitution and laws, and you sap the foundation of your liberty; sooner or later you are buried in the ruins of the superstructure. Despotism is equally dangerous, odious, and oppressive, whether exercised by an individual or the National Legislature. Despotism is but the arbitrary exercise of powers limited, defined, and bounded by no law but the sovereign will of the despot.

Without resorting to general principles and reasoning, the language of the Constitution itself is sufficiently explicit as to what we may do constitutionally. The first article declares, that all powers therein "granted are vested in the Congress of the United States." We have, then, to inquire, is the power to impose this restriction "granted" by the Constitution? If there be any doubt on that subject, prudence, at least, forbids us to proceed farther. The 9th and 10th articles of the amendments declare, "that the enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people;" and "that the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." I have been particular in making these preliminary remarks, because gentlemen who have occupied a distinguished ground in favor of the restriction appear to rely much on the sovereignty of Congress. It is necessary that a thing so powerful in its operations should be clearly understood.

Regarding the principles already laid down, let us proceed to examine the different clauses and sections of the Constitution which are supposed to enable us constitutionally to impose this restriction on Missouri. In pursuing the course which I had originally designed for myself, (said Mr. R.,) I must necessarily tread on some of the grounds occupied by the gentlemen who have preceded me in the debate. This is a misfortune arising from the necessity which has compelled me to delay my argument until this period, but would not justify presenting it to the Committee mutilated and imperfect.

By the 9th section of the first article of the Constitution it is declared, "the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by Congress prior to the year 1808," &c. Does this delegate any power to Congress to prohibit the importation of slaves, even after the year 1808? A gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGRANT) says, that a prohibition of the exercise of a power necessarily implies that there is a power to be restricted. This conclusion is by no means necessary. It may proceed from abundant caution, in order to avoid the doctrine of implied powers, which have been so much used in this discussion. But even this restriction, which might, at the time the article was prepared, have appeared necessary, in order to reconcile the contrariety of opinions that then existed, and quiet the jealousies of the States, became unnecessary when the amendments were subsequently adopted, confining the exercise of the powers of Congress to what was expressly delegated. Many enlightened statesmen viewed the Federal Government as a monster crouching over the State sovereignties, already possessed of powers, which at some future day it would exert, sufficient to annihilate them, and therefore imposed checks and barriers where none were necessary. This is mentioned, not with a view of disturbing antecedent legislation, but to show that, in the united zeal of the North and South to terminate the slave trade, they have exercised a power at least questionable. But, if questionable in relation to that which implication favors, how much more so in regard to this new, undefined, unlimited assumption of sovereignty?

In the construction of this section, said Mr. R., we should adopt the rules dictated by common sense, applicable to such subjects. Construe it either literally or according to the spirit and meaning. Gentlemen in favor of this restriction may adopt either, or both, as will best suit their purpose. Gentlemen, not satisfied with this, ask us to admit that the word "persons" means negroes or slaves, which meaning they derive from the spirit and meaning of the section, and adopt a literal sense for the word "migration," which is said to mean a transition from one State into another, although you may not travel a mile in the passage. Heretofore, when any man was asked what is the meaning of this section, he immediately replied, "to enable Congress to prohibit the slave trade after the year 1808." But, sir, to what conclusion do we arrive in construing this section literally? The word "persons" is a generic term, embracing every description of human beings, no matter of what complexion, while the words "migration and importation" are of equally extensive signification; the former including such persons as have volition, and can migrate; and the latter, such as have no volition, but are imported or carried along by the will of the master. This signification to the word migration, appears to comport with its original, or, what a gentleman from Delaware (Mr. McLANE) was pleased to call its technical use, being applied to the passage of birds from one region into another, changing their climate at pleasure, free as the air they skim in the transition. It has been subsequently used to signify a voluntary change of country by individuals and families, but never to signify an involuntary removal.

If this word "migration" must have a meaning unconnected with, and different from, "importation," why not use it, as many contend it was originally designed by the Convention, to enable Congress to prohibit the influx or migration of foreigners to our country, after a limited period? This word "migration" was, therefore, either intended to apply to emigration from Europe, or, what appears equally probable, was intended, in connexion with the word "persons," to disguise this anti-republican feature in our republican Constitution. For why should the Convention conceal the words "negroes or slaves," under the word "persons," and, in the same sentence, speak of the "importation" of "persons" as they would of a bale of merchandise? The words "shall think proper to admit," point strongly to an admission from abroad, and not to a mere change of residence within the United States.

Some regard, as gentlemen in opposition to the principles I advocate have very justly contended, ought to be paid to a long-continued exposition of this section, by legislation in relation to its provisions. The authorities produced by the friends of restriction, to show the respect which tribunals of justice pay to this principle, will be applied by them while we trace the course of legislation adopted by Congress in relation to this subject. Upwards of thirty years have elapsed since the adoption of the Constitution, during which period Congress have, with a vigilance that never reposed, directed their efforts to the abolition of the slave trade, without even suspecting they possessed the power now attempted to be assumed—a power to prevent an American citizen from changing his residence, and carrying with him his slave to any section of the Union where slavery is not prohibited. How easily might every preceding Congress have exercised their "humanity" in preventing an "extension of the evils of slavery" to the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama! But the wisdom of 1819 was alone competent to this arduous task; this discovery of "negatives pregnant" and latent and dormant powers.

In 1794 Congress prohibited "residents" in, or "citizens" of, the United States, from fitting out vessels for the slave trade, and, in 1800, from having an interest in vessels fitted out for that purpose. The act of 1803 prohibited the importation of slaves into States where slavery was prohibited by law, and that of 1807, passed in anticipation of the period fixed in the Constitution, was intended forever to terminate that traffic to the United States. From that period until the last session of Congress it was believed by all sides that whatever power was delegated by this section had been expended in legislation.

What construction was given this article by contemporaneous expositions? In that most able commentary on the Constitution of the United States, called the Federalist, which is known to be the joint production of Mr. Madison, General Hamilton, and "that great civilian, Mr. Jay," we have a construction which will be found in No. 42 of that work. Add to this an authority, which gentlemen in favor of this restriction will certainly be disposed to respect, the opinion of the Massachusetts Convention, when in debate on the Constitution of the United States. They say that, by the old Articles of Confederation, the General Government had no power to prevent the importation of slaves into the States, and rejoice that a period is fixed when Congress may interpose its authority, and forever terminate this traffic.

The meaning of this section we have from a very distinguished man, who was a member of the General Convention that formed the Constitution of the United States. There was a time when the brilliancy of this man's mind illumined the path of reason and penetrated the labyrinths of art and science; yesterday he was within these walls, but no longer what he was; he stands the melancholy wreck of intellectual greatness, teaching humiliation to human pride, and showing how low man can be depressed when enervating disease palsies his frame, and the hand of the Almighty presses upon him. I refer to Luther Martin, of Maryland. When called upon by the Legislature of his State to declare his objections to the Constitution, previously to its adoption, in a written communication to that body, he declares:

"By the ninth section of this article, the importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited, prior to the year 1808, but a duty may be imposed on such importation."

"The design of this clause is to prevent the General Government from prohibiting the importation of slaves; that the same reasons which caused them to strike out the word 'national,' and not admit the word 'stamps,' influenced them here to guard against the word slaves; they anxiously sought to avoid the admission of expressions which might be odious in the ears of Americans, although they were willing to admit into their system those things which the expression signified; and hence it is, that the clause is so worded as to authorize the General Government to impose a duty of ten dollars on every foreigner who comes into a State to become a citizen, whether he comes absolutely free, or qualified so as a servant; although this is contrary to the design of the framers, and the duty was only meant to extend to the importation of slaves." P. 55.

After observing that the committee of detail had reported this clause, without limitation as to the time of importation, which provision the Convention rejected, he says: "they were informed by the delegates from South Carolina and Georgia that their States never would agree to any system which put it in the power of the General Government to prevent the importation of slaves, and that they, as delegates from those States, must withhold their assent from such system." A committee, composed of one member from each State, was chosen, to whom this subject, together with that part of the report of the committee of detail which declared "that no navigation act shall be passed, without the assent of two-thirds of the members present in each House," was referred. "This committee," says he, "of which also I had the honor to be a member, met, and took into their consideration the subjects committed to them; I found the Eastern States, notwithstanding their aversion to slavery, very willing to indulge the Southern States, at least with a temporary liberty to prosecute the slave trade, provided the Southern States would, in their turn, gratify them by laying no restriction on the navigation acts; and after a very little time the committee, by a great majority, agreed on a report, by which the General Government was to be prohibited from preventing the importation of slaves, for a limited time, and the restrictive clause relative to navigation acts was to be omitted."

He adds, in page 58, "You will perceive, sir, not only that the General Government is prohibited from interfering in the slave trade, before the year 1808, but there is no provision in the Constitution that it shall afterwards be prohibited, nor any security that such prohibition will ever take place."

This statement is not made from frail memory, after time had almost effaced the recollection of scenes long transpired, but is history itself, recording events while transacting.

By the second clause of the third section and fourth article of the Constitution, "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State." The power here delegated may have full scope in regulating the settlement authorizing a temporary legislation, and disposing of the public lands, without attempting to seize or legislate away private property. The words "other property," in this clause, strongly intimate that construction. But, said he, Mr. Chairman, I am not disposed to pursue a course of reasoning that may appear too refined. Congress can make all "needful rules and regulations" respecting their "territory." Needful does not mean mere expediency, but something really necessary to be done. The most that the advocates of this restriction can say is, that, in their opinion, it is expedient. Again, sir, is this a rule and regulation respecting your territory? As much so as the constitution of Missouri, when formed for the State, will be a constitution for the Territory of Missouri. When your paternal government has expired, and Missouri is no longer a Territory, she enjoys this legacy. Make her whole constitution, and call this legislation for your territory; for if you can make one article, you can, with equal justice, make the constitution, and entirely dispense with the voice of the people.

By the first clause of the fourth article and second section of the Constitution, "Congress shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government." The power to impose this restriction is derived, by some gentlemen, from this section, because, say they, no constitution can be republican in which slavery is not prohibited. The word "guaranty" neither gives the power of imposing conditions, nor does it mean to form, or assist in the formation of a government; but presupposes the existence of a State government to be guarantied. This provision was intended to protect, by the strength of the Union, the State sovereignties, in case foreign influence or internal commotions should render the States incapable of supporting, separately, their republican institutions. In this opinion I am supported by the terms used, and by the excellent commentary previously referred to in this argument. This article cannot, then, confer the power contended for by the friends of the amendment. But, at all events, the Convention could not have intended that the constitutions of new States should be more republican than the Constitution of the United States and the constitutions of the original States, in which slavery had been recognised, and the right to that species of property guarantied.

The first clause of the third section and fourth article of the Constitution declares, "New States may be admitted by Congress into the Union." This is really the only clause in the Constitution which delegates any power to Congress in relation to the admission of Missouri. The other grounds have been noticed, because they had been relied on by gentlemen in favor of restriction; "may" expresses a discretionary power—a power to admit, and a power to refuse admission, but nothing more. I have (said Mr. R.) heard this called an universal proposition, which, according to the reasoning of gentlemen, means, that if you are authorized to do a specific act, you may, by virtue of that authority, do any thing else you please in relation to the subject for which that act is to be performed. Gentlemen would argue, if you may admit a man into your house, you may compel him to enter the window, or come down the chimney; or you may impose any conditions on him when he enters—such as binding him neck and heels, rifling his pockets, or cutting his throat. It has been said that many things are necessarily implied, when not expressed in the Constitution, being necessary to carry the original powers into effect; this is admitted, but not to the extent for which gentlemen contend. We do not admit that this restriction is at all necessary to carry the power of admission into effect. The power of admitting renders the power of passing a law for the admission, and extending the benefits of the Union to the State, when admitted, necessary; but does not confer on Congress the power to frame a constitution for, and strip the people of their sovereignty.

This restriction has also been called a compact. Yes, sir, the same kind of a compact a victorious army makes with a place whose defenders, worn out by fatigue and famine, are compelled to accept the terms dictated by power; the same kind of a compact the Romans made with the savage Brennus, when he cast his sword into the scale that increased her ransom. You say to the people of Missouri, on this condition you shall be admitted into the Union, and, instead of asking them to make an agreement with you, allowing them the privilege of accepting or rejecting it, the agreement is made by you, and presented to them to execute. The condition of their refusal is a perpetual state of colonial vassalage; this you call an agreement—a compact! Why, sir, in order to make a valid compact, reason, as well as law, declares, that there must be parties able to contract, and willing to contract; able to accept and reject the terms proposed. Is Missouri willing to enter into this compact with you? She protests against your usurpation—not having the equal power to resist, she can only protest. The General Government may enter into a compact binding upon the nation when acting within the scope of the authority delegated by the Constitution; but they have no more power to seize on the rights of the freemen of Missouri, and then require of them, as a peace-offering, a portion of those rights, than I have to enter the house of my neighbor, to which I have no color of claim, and require of him, as a condition for my leaving him in the peaceable possession of his property, the use of one of his apartments forever. Cannot Missouri enter into a compact? Yes, says the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) States have made, and are capable of making, contracts. Did not Virginia, says he, make a compact with the United States, &c., in ceding the Northwestern Territory? Let me ask the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, what was Virginia when she made this compact—a Territory, or a free independent State; her constitution formed, and capable of rejecting unjust requisitions? Is that the condition of Missouri? No, sir; terms are prescribed which they are unwilling to accept, and which they have no State capacity either to receive or reject. By the gentleman's reasoning, a sovereign, independent State can make a compact, therefore the Territory of Missouri can do so; a man can make a binding agreement, therefore a child can enter into a valid obligation. Again, sir, it has been said that the people of Missouri are receiving a consideration for this "surrender of a portion of their municipal rights"—their admission into the Union. Why, sir, to this they are entitled already, by the treaty of 1803, entered into with the Government of France, by which Louisiana was ceded to the United States, and by which it is stipulated, that "the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated into the union of the United States, and admitted, as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities, of citizens of the United States; and in the meantime they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess."

The price of their admission into the Union is already paid, and, if you regard the treaty, they must be admitted. Your "may" in the Constitution is converted into "shall" in the treaty. You have bought a tract of land, and paid the consideration stipulated in the deed solemnly executed, yet the vender refuses to give you possession without you pay him an additional consideration. If such demands would be iniquitous in transactions between individuals, how much more so when made by a nation, boasting of its justice and magnanimity!

It has been said that there is no power to complain of a violation of, or to enforce an obedience to, this treaty. Shall we, therefore, not perform our engagements, because we cannot be coerced? The honest heart revolts at such a proposition. Justice commands the performance of our engagements, although there is no power to enforce, and no eye sees our delinquency. A great and magnanimous people should scorn such a subterfuge.

Congress, say gentlemen, have the power of admitting new States, and the treaty-making power had no right to stipulate for the admission of Louisiana into the Union. The second clause of the sixth article of the Constitution declares, that "all treaties made by the authority of the United States are the supreme law of the land." "By the authority," must mean the treaty-making power, the President and Senate, in whom the power is vested. The authority of the United States has made this treaty, and the House of Representatives has repeatedly sanctioned its provisions. Whatever objection might have been made previously to its ratification, because of its interference with the power vested in Congress to admit new States, the objection now comes too late. The Senate could have made no appropriation of money for the purchase of Louisiana without the concurrence of the House of Representatives. This concurrence was a pledge, on the part of that branch of the National Legislature, that the stipulations of the treaty should be performed. Your legislation for the territory ceded, and the admission of Louisiana, were additional pledges. You have surveyed the public lands, pocketed the money, and enjoyed all the advantages of the cession, and now refuse to comply with your agreement, because you say the President and Senate had no power to make the treaty, and there is no power to compel you to perform your agreement if valid. From the treaty of 1803, every successive Congress has, in some shape, recognised the validity of this treaty, and given some pledge that its stipulation should be regarded until we, more wise, but, perhaps, less just, than our predecessors, have discovered that it was made without authority, and is void! Had not the people who removed to that country under your former course of legislation a right to expect that security, for themselves and their property, which the treaty promised?

This treaty declares who shall be incorporated into the Union, when they shall be incorporated, to what they shall be entitled when incorporated, and promises, in the meantime, security to their liberty and property. In the meantime, must indicate a time between two points—the points here indicated are, the ratification of the treaty, and their admission into the Union. Congress might, in the meantime, have prohibited the settlement of the country from other parts of the Union; but if they permitted others to settle there, being inhabitants of the ceded territory, at the time of its admission into the Union, they were necessary to enjoy the privileges of admission into the Union. Congress could not admit the original inhabitants and exclude others there at the time of its admission; nor could they disregard the rights of those who settled there subsequent to the treaty; for all who are inhabitants, “in the meantime,” are secured in their property and liberty.” When are they to be admitted? “So soon as possible, consistent with the principles of the Constitution;” so soon as they have the number heretofore required for such admission. Having that number, they now ask you to perform your stipulation, and can you justly refuse? To what are they to be entitled, when admitted into the Union? To the enjoyment of all the “rights, advantages, and immunities, of citizens of the United States.” Yet you deny them one of the most essential and dearest rights, the right to form their own constitution, and shape their own municipal regulations. They are what you have agreed they shall be, with this degrading exception, this surrender of municipal rights. This word “shall,” in the treaty, takes away discretion, and we must either disregard the treaty, or admit Missouri—not stripped of its sovereign power, but on a footing with the other States, to all the “rights, advantages, and immunities,” of citizens of the United States.

The ordinance of 1787 has been resorted to for the purpose of showing that Congress has exercised this power, and may therefore now do the same. There is no crime that could not be justified by reasoning in this mode: such things have been done, therefore they are right! This ordinance was passed under the Articles of Confederation, previously to the adoption of the Constitution, and cannot prove that such an ordinance would have been authorized by the Constitution. Subsequent legislation only went to carry into effect what had been promised prior to the Constitution.

Gentlemen have called to their aid the Declaration of Independence: “All men are born equally free and independent! Those who believe that this declaration gives liberty to every slave in the Union, will find a learned chapter on that subject, in a ludicrous work written by Judge Breckenridge, of Pennsylvania, called Modern Chivalry, to which I refer the gentlemen. But is this political maxim indeed true? Then I suppose an incident of that freedom and independence would be, that every people have a right to adopt their own government and laws. Do you not deny this privilege to the people of Missouri? In your zeal to extend liberty to the slave, you take away from freemen of your own color, and entitled to equal rights with you, their “inalienable rights.” The people of Missouri ask the privilege of forming their own constitution, and you deny them that privilege, unless they adopt an article which you prescribe. Have we so soon forgotten that our fathers resisted similar usurpations of power attempted by England—fought and established the independence we now enjoy? Other gentlemen derive this power from that part of the Constitution which enables Congress to provide for the “general welfare:” nothing can be more dangerous than this doctrine. When Napoleon annihilated the Government, and seized the liberties of France, he said, this is demanded by the general welfare. When Cæsar subverted the liberties of Rome, he professed to be providing for the general welfare. When Cromwell turned the Parliament of Great Britain out of doors, he professed to be acting for the general welfare. The genius of desolation, seated on the ruins of empires, speaks, as a voice from the tombs to you, to “beware of the exercise of this dangerous power.” The departed Governments of Carthage, Greece, and Rome, of Venice, and of Switzerland, hail your advances in this path of the sepulchre of nations. The friends of restriction plant a dagger in the bosom of their country, and call this providing for the general welfare. They excite the most awful discord among the members of this House, which enters into and distracts all its deliberations, and excites the most alarming ferment in the community, and call this humanity. Humanity to our country forbids agitating a question so well calculated to disturb the repose of society.

Is it justice to the States of the Union where slavery is tolerated, to prohibit them from a settlement in Missouri, purchased by the common funds of the nation? The exclusion is not direct, because it would not be borne in that shape; but if I cannot enter there with my property, which habit, or something else, has rendered necessary to me, I am excluded. What answer can we make to the people of Missouri when they ask, “is not self-government our right, our privilege, and our inheritance?” “Can you divest us of our property without our consent?” “When emancipation has taken place in other parts of the Union, the people, by their Representatives, consented to the divestiture of their rights; but we are to be divested of our rights, without representation, by the strong arm of Congress, and that in the name of conscience and humanity.”

I cannot, said he, pass unnoticed the course which has been adopted, in relation to this subject, and which, in the language of Mr. Jay, has been effected by a "plan of co-operation" in the community. The people intend to be just to themselves and their Representatives; but how readily may they be deceived! A meeting is called, at which the horrors of slavery are painted in the most glowing colors—the honest sympathies of every individual present are excited, and, when wrought almost to frenzy, they are seriously asked, are you willing to extend this evil? No! resounds from a thousand tongues. No inquiry if the condition of the slave will not be ameliorated by "this extension." The Constitution is either never mentioned, or such a construction given it as suits the public feeling. Gentlemen should recollect that this method of construing the Constitution, by popular assemblies, is at least dangerous, and that the example now given may be imitated at some future day, when they would willingly forget what has now transpired. On matters of interest and feeling, the people must be consulted; but I have sworn to support this Constitution, and who shall determine for me, whether this act is a violation of my oath or not? In the midst of such popular excitement, the prejudiced and corrupt are carried along by the current, the timid abandon their consciences, and upright men too often fall a sacrifice to their integrity. Could any plan of "co-operation" be necessary to bring the members of this House to a correct discharge of their duty? The feelings, both of the North and South, were enlisted in favor of an amelioration of the condition of the slave; but a regard for the Constitution, the treaty, the general rights of the people of the Union, and of the people of Missouri, prevent them from interfering. The "extension of slavery!" This is a deceitful term. If, by extending, you mitigate the evils, such an extension is humanity, is mercy. No man has passed through the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, and Alabama, who does not know that their condition is much better there than in the old States. By the same reasoning you give to the unfortunate prisoner the light, the pure air of Heaven, and wholesome food; and you call this an extension of his evils. You confine him to his loathsome dungeon, his brown bread, and his galling fetters, and you call this humanity. The supposition that you are opening a market, and thereby tempting an illicit traffic, is ideal. The present price is sufficient to tempt avarice, and an increase of value can scarcely be expected from any reasonable mode of calculation.

We are told "not to be alarmed;" there is no disposition to disturb property, in slaves, in the old thirteen States. I judge of the intentions of gentlemen from the principles they advocate. We are told that Congress may, when the Constitution is silent, exercise its sovereign power; that all men, among whom are slaves, are born equally free and independent; that Congress can do any thing conceived necessary for the general welfare, and that slavery is a great evil and ought to be abolished; that Congress, having the power to regulate commerce, and prohibit migration, can prevent the passage of slaves from one State to another. These doctrines lead to an unlimited exercise of power—to a declaration that slavery does not exist within the United States; but if it does, that Congress may abolish it, or confine it to narrow limits; yet we are told not to be alarmed. You conduct us to an awful precipice, and hold us over it, in your trembling hands, while you call to us, do not be alarmed. We cannot but feel alarmed for the security of our property; when such principles are advocated we assure you we are alarmed. Should you succeed, it is questionable whether you gain any thing for the slave. No respect for the Constitutional principles induces you to urge this restriction—humanity towards your country, already rent by discord, forbids widening the breach. I do not speak of disunion. I hope our Union will be as perpetual as the rocks and mountains of our continent. Disunion is a subject which I fear to have rendered familiar to the people of this country. But may I not call to gentlemen in pursuit of this imaginary good—"Spare, oh spare your country the evils which the agitation of this question has produced, and must necessarily produce, in this hitherto happy nation. Let us not, in pursuit of phantoms, destroy this last asylum of the oppressed, the only resting place of liberty, exiled from every other portion of the world."

Mr. HENDRICKS, of Indiana, spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman: Rising, at this late hour of the debate, and preceded by many who were prominent and powerful in the discussions on this floor, it is not to be expected that very much remains for me to say. This, however, is a circumstance which I do not regret, for it is not my purpose or intention to say much. Sir, at an early period of this discussion, it was my intention to have offered, at large, to the Committee, my views on this subject, but not having been fortunate enough to have occupied the floor at that stage of the debate, I find much of the ground which I had marked out for myself occupied, and successfully, as I think, occupied by others.

With that ground, sir, I shall have as little to do as possible. I will not tire the Committee in wandering unnecessarily upon it, but will ask their indulgence while I say a few words, which appear to me necessary to be said, and which are some of my reasons for the vote I expect to give on the proposition now before the Committee. Sir, my apology for troubling the Committee is, the interest which, with others, I take in this great question, and the circumstance that that portion of the Union, of which I am a citizen and a Representative, seems to have become, in a great measure, the theatre of this debate.

Mr. Chairman, the history of the Northwestern Territory is connected with the earliest and the proudest days of this Republic, and its history in times to come will show it warmly and devotionally attached to the rights of the States and the integrity of the Union. Sir, there is nothing fortuitous or uncertain in this opinion. The States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, are standing monuments of the magnanimity of an ancient and respectable State, (Virginia.) They are monuments also of a wise and liberal policy, whence springs their happy institutions, and their freedom from slavery, that great evil of the South. They show a policy of the General Government, which, should it roll on with the flood of emigration to the West, will add a constellation to your Union, equal in lustre to the brightest star of the East. This is the view of the amendment under discussion—an amendment which commands my approbation and coerces my support. An amendment, objectionable, say gentlemen, because Congress have not the Constitutional power to enact it. Those who oppose the restriction of slavery in Missouri call for the Constitutional provision, which authorizes the measure—call for the speaking index which points to this question, as though every measure of the Government could have been anticipated, and all its future incidents seen by the framers of the Constitution.

Mr. Chairman, the language of the Constitution is plain enough for me. And here let me remark, that this amendment presents itself to my mind in a point of view different from that in which it appears to be considered, by most gentlemen who have spoken of it. This amendment is objected to, because it is understood to propose conditions for the State of Missouri. This is not the way I understand it. It speaks to the people of Missouri Territory, and not to the State of Missouri. To the people of the Missouri Territory, and to the people of all the territories, we have been in the habit of speaking. Even gentlemen on the opposite side of the question admit we may speak to them.

Sir, I think, in the progress of this discussion, it has been clearly made out that Congress may impose conditions. Indeed, this seems of necessity to be admitted on all hands, for without admitting this principle we cannot justify the government we hold over the territories, or the control we hold over the public lands within the limits of the new States. Sir, in this case, we do not dictate to, or impose conditions on, the State. We only say to the people of the Territory what we consider necessary for their constitution to contain, and without which they are not to expect admission into the Union. They are not possessed of sovereign State powers when making this constitution, nor when it is made, until Congress shall admit them into the Union. This ceremony of admission has been deemed necessary in the history of our Government, in relation to all the new States. Their sovereign State power is derived from the constitution, which has not force or efficacy until approved by Congress. It is true the power which made this constitution was in existence before, but it was chaos reduced by these proceedings to consistency and order.

But, it is said that, by this amendment, you require these conditions to be adopted by Missouri, and to come from her, because Congress have not the power to make or impose them. This, sir, is true, and is correct, in the same way that the first party to a contract must obtain the consent of the second party before the contract is complete; but, after that consent is obtained, the first party has the same advantage from it, and it is as binding on the second party as if all had been originally in the power of the first party; for, in truth, this is nothing more or less than a contract, and it is one of those contracts which, though made in the minority of Missouri, will be binding on her after she shall arrive at full age. I deny, then, Mr. Chairman, that any thing required by this amendment is to be done in the character or capacity of a State, on the part of Missouri.

Again, sir, the treaty. The third article of the treaty so much spoken of in this debate, could not have been intended to pass the boundaries of the Constitution. If such were its stipulations, those stipulations could not be carried into effect. Sir, what created the treaty-making power? The Constitution; and the moment the treaty-making power passes the boundaries of the Constitution, that moment its powers become annihilated. We are told that it is now too late to object to the treaty—that it has been ratified by the Senate, and sanctioned by the House of Representatives, in the passage of laws to carry it into effect. Sir, I do not object to the validity of the treaty. The acquisition of Louisiana was one of the happiest epochs of our political history since the close of the Revolution. But I object to any construction of that treaty unknown to and unauthorized by the Constitution. I object to any construction of the treaty which would do away the discretion of Congress in the admission of new States. Can any unconstitutional stipulation in a treaty gain strength by the ratification of the Senate, or the passage of a law by Congress to carry that treaty into effect? Surely not. Suppose, for instance, that the treaty-making power had stipulated that the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia of the States to be formed west of the Mississippi, should be reserved to the Government of the United States,—would gentlemen tell us that the stipulation could be carried into effect? No; because such stipulation would be contrary to the Constitution of the United States. Such stipulation would be an infringement of the rights of the States. And are we not to guard the rights of the General Government, as well as those of the States? The treaty, then, I understand as placing the inhabitants of the province of Louisiana in the same situation they would have been in if they had been included within the original limits established by the Treaty of Peace.

Sir, if the treaty-making power can pass the limits of the Constitution, it could have provided that the States to be formed in the province of Louisiana could have the power of making war or peace, or of creating titles of nobility. The language of the treaty is, in substance, the language of the Constitution; and the privileges and immunities conferred on the Louisianian must be such privileges and immunities as the Government of the United States can bestow; for, according to the principles of the gentlemen opposed, neither the treaty nor the Constitution can confer on the ancient inhabitant of Louisiana the rights and privileges which result from the regulations of a State, and which are the offspring of municipal law; because these things, say gentlemen, are the prerogatives of State sovereignties, and cannot be exercised by Congress. Then, what are the privileges and immunities of an inhabitant of Louisiana under the treaty and the Constitution? They are simply those of a citizen, distinguished from a foreigner or an alien. The inhabitant of Louisiana is not subject to the requisitions of an alien law; he becomes at once a citizen of the United States. The treaty, then, does not seem to stand in the way of the free operation of the Constitution—the practice and policy of the Government—in the admission of new States. There is no guaranty in the treaty in favor of adventurers to the country, or in favor of the Louisianian, after he shall have become a member of the State Government.

The force of the treaty then fails, gentlemen. It is imposing conditions on him, in the character of a citizen of a State, of which they complain; and in such character the treaty has no guaranty in his favor, and it would be absurd if it had. It would be France stipulating for the privileges and immunities of citizens, not only of the United States, but of a particular State.

But, sir, to the positive language of the Constitution: "Congress shall have power to dispose of, and to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory, or other property belonging to the United States." Here there is a direct power; absolute control over the most important and first object of sovereignty. Here is a Constitutional power, more extensive than is necessary for the amendment before the Committee. Congress owns, in fee simple, the soil of the country. This soil may be retained by its owners, or it may be parted with on conditions. It may be leased for life or for years. These leases may contain as many conditions as may be agreed on. One of these may be, that the soil shall not be cultivated by a slave, and that it shall not be the residence of a slave. Sir, the citizen of the United States, no matter whether he be from the South or North, may constitutionally be prevented from settling that soil. Your standing armies and your militia may be marched from every State to dispossess him. This is a policy which the Government will very seldom adopt, but the power to adopt it is found in the Constitution, and it is the Constitutional power to adopt this measure which we are now in search of, and not its expediency. Sir, this part of the Constitution is not a dead letter. Look at your statute book. There you will find laws specifying this power and authorizing its exertion, in driving intruders from the public lands. It is but a few years, sir, since the President's proclamation required the exercise of this power, and, but for the relaxing policy of the Government, the military force of the country would have been employed in carrying it into effect. Here, then, is a case in which Congress may constitutionally exclude the further introduction of free-men from that soil; much easier, do I apprehend, may she exclude slaves; mere property. A case in which Congress may, after the admission of a State without restriction of slavery, hold a direct and absolute negative over the peopling her territory with slaves.

Sir, the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution says, "that new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." Here, sir, is all the power known to the Constitution, on the subject of admitting new States. Congress may admit, and may refuse admission. Congress may exercise abroad an uncontrollable discretion on the subject; but, in the proper exercise of this discretion, Congress may not reject without a cause. If a cause of rejection exist, this House will know it. Congress may then examine the boundaries exhibited in the constitution submitted, to see that they do not pass the limits and boundaries of this Government; for, if the doctrine contended for by many gentlemen on this floor be correct, that Congress can only determine whether the constitution be republican or not, then the question of boundary would be an improper inquiry for this House. The people claiming admission might stop at the Sabine, or go to the Rio del Norte. They might include the more western provinces of Mexico, or go to the Isthmus of Darien. This doctrine established, with the binding obligations of the treaty to admit the people of Missouri, as contended for by other gentlemen, and the question of boundary with Spain is no longer under the sole direction of the treaty-making power. The people of Missouri may go to the West and to the South, to the furthestmost boundary ever claimed by the Government. You are bound by treaty, say gentlemen, to admit them, and, once admitted, you are bound by the Constitution to protect them against invasion.

Sir, the Constitutional power to admit new States, submits the constitution of such States to the scrutiny of this Government. Congress may, and it is the duty of Congress, to see that no provision of such constitution clashes with the Constitution of the United States; that such new State, for instance, does not assume the powers of "making treaties, alliances, and confederations with foreign Governments;" of granting letters of marque and reprisal;" or "of keeping troops, or ships of war, in time of peace, without the consent of Congress." This power, then, seems to contain all necessary guards against encroachment of principle, and where any encroachment of principle, no matter what, is likely to be attempted, it does seem to me, that it would not be too assuming in Congress, to say to a people asking permission to form for themselves a constitution and State government: Your habits and opinions, on a particular subject, make it probable, that you will introduce a principle into your Constitution incompatible with the opinions and policy of this Government. With this principle you are not to expect admission into the Union. This would be a piece of information necessary for them. It would be a beacon to direct them into the port of admission.

Mr. Chairman, another section of the Constitution comes in aid of my opinions. The fourth section of the fourth article says, "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union

FEBRUARY, 1820.

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion and domestic violence." Now it seems to me that the plain and obvious meaning of this is, that Congress may examine a constitution before she can guaranty any thing about it; and Congress must, in the very nature of this clause, have the power of judging and determining what a republican form of government is. Congress cannot guaranty any thing of which she is ignorant; and the Constitutional protection against invasion and domestic violence in favor of the States, carries with it something more than a mere supervision of the constitution, to see if it be republican; for the seeds of discord and domestic violence may be sown in a constitution, although it be republican. A thousand features may be found in a constitution calculated to produce invasion, though that constitution be republican." "Invasion and domestic violence" are effects sometimes found in States. Congress is bound to control and do away these effects. She is bound also, both for her benefit and that of the State, to do away the obvious "causes of invasion and domestic violence," and if these obvious causes are found in the constitution of a new State, Congress is bound by every consideration of justice, both to the General Government and to such new State, to require that those objectionable parts of her constitution be expunged before she is admitted into the Union. All legislative powers to check vice of any kind, are necessarily appropriated with powers of some description, to deal with and do away the causes of such vice.

Mr. Chairman, there is little danger of encroachment on the governments of the States. The States have, at all times, sentinels at their posts and within this hall. Who are we, sir, but the sentinels of the State governments—citizens of the States, sent here for the special purpose of representing them in the national assembly? With our constituents, we have a closer affinity to the States than to this Government. We feel their interests as primary ones. This has been sufficiently manifested in the progress of this discussion. If I can determine any thing from my own feelings, I know this to be the case. The rights and advantages of the State which I have the honor to represent, are those which make the strongest appeal to my heart. Sir, the overthrow of this great Republic is more in danger from the encroachments of the State governments than of this Government. Some high unconstitutional pretensions of the State governments are more likely to sap the foundations of our liberties and destroy this Government. Sir, for examples I might refer you to the histories of other nations and other times, but I need not leave that of my own country. The arm of this Government, during the late war, was paralyzed by the pretensions of a State government, (Massachusetts,) by a conflict for State rights.

But, sir, to the general scope and plain meaning of the Constitution. It is said that Congress have but one Constitutional negative over the admission of a State. Congress may require her constitution to be republican, and, if it be not, she may reject it. But, I apprehend, sir, that, in construing an instrument, all its parts are to be taken together. We should never lose sight of the object of the Convention which framed the Constitution. We should never lose sight of the end and object of all good governments. These are, the happiness of the people governed. Governments ought still to be progressive, from bad, if they be so, to good, and from good to better. Perfection of human happiness is the tendency of all good governments. Slavery is an evil. It is admitted to be so by all the South; and its existence is a matter of much lamentation to them. It is, then, more natural to suppose that the evil was intended to be stopped—to be removed from the body politic as soon as possible—than that it should be extended with the extending Union. Sir, suppose slavery had no existence in the United States. A State west of the Mississippi would present you with a constitution recognising slavery, and demand admission into the Union. I think that no gentleman, from any quarter, would receive such a constitution into the Union. We should then search the constitution with an eagle's eye. The intelligence of the South would then be able to find enough to justify the rejection of such a constitution.

Mr. Chairman, I am not at liberty to inquire how the slaves of the South became slaves. I am not at liberty to inquire what ruthless hand first manacled the slave, and trampled on the natural rights of man. I may not travel out of the record, the Constitution. In that instrument, although the terms manacle and slave are not to be found, this species of property is recognised by strong language, and by definition too plain to be mistaken. With pleasure do I hear, from the representatives of the South, that this evil does not lie at their door; and with equal pleasure do I find, in the history of my country, the proof of this fact. Slavery, personal slavery, was introduced into this country by that Government whose policy it was to rivet the fetters of political slavery on the freemen of the colonies. It is a vestige of British policy which the storms of the Revolution could not do away, and which had too deep root in the Government to be eradicated by reform. It was an evil of so much magnitude that it became necessary to provide for it in the Constitution; but, being an evil, the provisions of the Constitution never meant to foster and cherish it in the Government. It was not intended to grow with its growth, and strengthen with its strength; to grow faster, and become stronger, than this Government, which it would do by planting it in the fertile regions beyond the Mississippi. Sir, it is not fairer to say that slavery has been adopted by this Government, because its existence is found in the Constitution, than it would be to say that crimes of the deepest dye are sanctioned by this Government, because their existence is recognised and admitted by the Constitution. Sir, evil is more frequently the object of legislation than good. For good, and for good men, constitutions and governments are not necessary. They are made for evil, for vicious, and for bad men. The existence of every crime is admitted in a constitution, but it would be an inference, from this, entirely inadmissible, that murder was sanctioned by the Constitution, and ought not to be punished by law.

H. OF R.

Admission of Missouri.

FEBRUARY, 1820.

Sir, I understand the Constitution to recognise the slave of the South as the property of his master. As such, he is protected by the Constitution, and his situation is unalterable by law; but, like all other property, he is liable to the restraints of law. Sir, an honorable gentleman, endeavoring, as I understood him, to reconcile slavery with abstract principle, has said, that any thing is right and proper to be done which the safety of a people may require. Will the honorable gentleman permit us to change a little the direction of that argument, and to bring it to bear more immediately on the question? Suppose then, the safety of this great Republic to require the restriction of slavery. If the gentleman's argument be a good one, it furnishes at once, on the ground of expediency, all that is necessary with which to support the amendment before the committee. Sir, from the existence of slavery in the Constitution and Government, we are not chargeable with crime; but, when we adopt a new Constitution, or receive a new Constitution recognising slavery—when we introduce an evil in the Government, then we become chargeable with that evil. Then it is we create the condition of slavery, which before that time had no sanction of a permanent law. Then it is that we are at liberty to inquire into first principles, and to compare the situation of a slave with the natural rights of man.

Sir, on this question I should be willing to rest on the wisdom of those who have gone before me. I should be willing to say, that the construction of the Constitution, from the commencement of the Government to this period—the precedents furnished, and the system of legislation, from the much famed ordinance of 1787 almost to the present day, are sufficient lights for me on this occasion. I should say that a system of legislation continued for thirty years—a system which existed before the Constitution, and under the Constitution producing the happiest political results, is one which I would not readily believe to be founded in usurpation, and tending to the destruction of the Government. Such, sir, is the ordinance of 1787 for the government of the Northwestern Territory; the propositions offered by Congress to the people of Ohio, in the law authorizing them to form for themselves a constitution and State government; the provisions of the constitution of that State inhibiting slavery. Such were the propositions of Congress to the people of Indiana, in 1816, in the law authorizing them to form a constitution and State government. Such was the positive and absolute condition requiring that the constitution of Indiana, when formed, should be republican, and not repugnant to the articles of the ordinance of 1787, one of which prohibited slavery; and such were the provisions of the constitution of that State inhibiting slavery. Such, also, were the propositions offered to Illinois on a similar occasion. Sir, for further notice of some of the principles of this ordinance, and for additional links in this chain of legislation, I refer you to the acts of cession of North Carolina and Georgia to the General Government—to the acts of Congress preparatory to the admission of Kentucky into the Union—to the act relative to the Territory of Orleans, authorizing the people of that Territory to form for themselves a constitution and State government. Permit me, sir, to turn the attention of the Committee to some of the conditions and restrictions of that act. The proviso to the third section is in these words:

"Provided, The constitution to be formed in virtue of the authority herein given, shall be republican, and consistent with the Constitution of the United States; that it shall contain the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty; that it shall secure to the citizen the trial by jury in all criminal cases, and the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, conformably to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States; and that, after the admission of the Territory of Orleans as a State into the Union, the laws which such State may pass shall be promulgated, and its records of every description shall be preserved, and its judicial and legislative written proceedings conducted, in the language in which the laws and the judicial and legislative written proceedings of the United States are now published and conducted; and that the river Mississippi, and the navigable rivers and waters leading into the same, or into the Gulf of Mexico, shall be common highways, and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of the said States as to other citizens of the United States, without any duty, impost, or toll therefor, imposed by the said State."

Of the same character is the act prohibiting the taking of slaves to the Territory of Orleans. All this, sir, I cannot believe to have been the offspring of inattention in those who have legislated since the commencement of this Government. I believe, sir, that precedents and constructions of a constitution, are as binding on Legislatures as decisions are binding on the courts of law. And the reason which requires a written constitution, requires that this should be so. Why, sir, is a written constitution necessary? It is necessary that the lines and boundaries be clearly delineated and certainly known. It is necessary, that the powers of the Government be defined and rendered certain; and, where doubts, ambiguities, and uncertainties exist, precedents and constructions define and make certain. And, sir, precedents have additional force and efficacy when formed under circumstances calculated to impress a character of intelligence and stability upon them—when formed in the calm of tranquillity and reason, remote from party excitement and political strife. Such, sir, are the precedents to which I have alluded.

But, sir, we are told that this restriction cannot be carried into effect; that Missouri is required to enact it, and that which she may enact she may amend or repeal at pleasure. Sir, there is something in this doctrine which I do not understand. There are some things in a constitution which you cannot change by amendment. A repeal of some provisions is not amendment, but destruction of a constitution. Look, sir, at the fifth article of the Constitution of the United States. There certain clauses are declared not to be amendable till after the year 1808, and another provision declared unalterable. It is this: "No State shall, without its consent, be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." Would you call that amendment which would destroy the republican features of this Government, and introduce a king and nobility? Or would you call that amendment which would destroy the first principles of a State constitution—the compacts and agreements with this Government, on which its existence depended? Or suppose, sir, a new State should destroy her constitution altogether—should repeal it—break off all connexion with the Union, and set up for herself, would she still be entitled to her share of the benefits of the original compact, while she would deprive the General Government of all the advantages which she might derive from a political union with such State? This Government ought to be cautious how it propagates such doctrine. Where, then, would be the stipulations in your favor on the subject of the public lands—the compacts of the new States not to tax them, and not to interfere with the primary disposal of the soil?

But, sir, the sovereignty of the old States, and the equal footing of the new, are terms much used by gentlemen in this debate. Sovereignty, in its application to a State government, whether old or new, is a qualified term. Absolute sovereignty is not an attribute of the General Government, or that of the States. The great fabric of our constitutions consists of an union and a division of power and sovereignty. Some of the fractional parts of these adhere to the Constitution of the United States, while others adhere to the constitutions of the States. The old States were shorn of their locks of sovereignty by this Constitution. Where, sir, is the power of declaring war and making peace; of raising and supporting armies? The old States once possessed absolute sovereignty, but that attribute is no longer ascribable to them. It is true, however, they are sovereign for all the purposes of municipal legislation and domestic concern. The new States, sir, are not on an equal footing with the original States. This phraseology is qualified in relation to them. Would to God they were. They would then have resources and wealth, almost inexhaustible, in the public lands. This doctrine, sir, would be extremely pleasant to the new States. How much they would or would not yield for its application to them I cannot say; but it is reasonable to suppose they would yield every thing but principle for the soil of their country.

Sir, while the forests of the old States are their own, to dispose of at pleasure, those of the new States belong to this Government. The General Government can dispose of them or retain them as they please; can discourage emigration to the new States, prevent their population, and deprive them of taxing the lands within their jurisdiction. The new States are creatures of this Constitution, which is itself the creature of the original States. They share equally, it is true, in the high prerogatives of legislation. They are equally represented with the old States in both branches of the National Legislature, and they have equal control of the sword and the purse of the nation; but they are deprived of the principal sources of revenue, and their history, since the formation of this Constitution, has been one of conditions, propositions, and restrictions. To some of these, however, the constitutionality of which, until the present discussion, I have never heard doubted, we, north-west of the Ohio river, are indebted for our happiest institutions—our freedom from slavery. We are content with our situation. We are rich in the salubrity of our climate, the fertility of our soil, and the navigation of our rivers. Industry and agriculture smile upon our deserts, and commerce is invited to the West. These things, sir, induce me to believe that it is expedient also to prohibit the further introduction of slavery in Missouri. On which, sir, permit me to say a few words, and I have done.

Sir, it has been said that this proposition is one of a most unfortunate character; that we have just terminated a war with one of the most powerful nations of the earth; a war in which the triumphs of our fleets and armies have given additional lustre to the Revolutionary trophies of the country; that party strifes and animosities were reclining on the lap of prosperity and peace; and that this is a most unpropitious time to agitate this question.

Sir, these considerations, to my mind, make this a most fortunate time for this discussion. I rejoice that this discussion has found tranquillity and calm on the political ocean; that it has found the nation reposing in harmony, at the close of a war, and the Administration riveted in the affections of the American people. These considerations relieve my mind from all apprehensions of disunion—a sound so often reiterated in this hall. Sir, I regret to hear gentlemen talk about civil wars; about the powers and pretensions of the various parties to this contest; of the prowess of the North, and the determined resistance of the South. We are told that there is but one opinion in Missouri and all the South on this subject. Sir, permit me to say that this is somewhat different from my information about Missouri and the people of the South. There are large numbers of the citizens of the South who do not, who cannot, and who will not, hold slaves. These have the feelings of the North on the subject of slavery and restriction. Many of these have come to the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, on that account; and many who do hold slaves would come, if they could dispose of them.

Sir, I have said that this restriction is expedient. The peopling of Missouri from the slaveholding States, while it would make no perceivable and very little real difference in the numbers of their slaves, it would fix the complexion and the aspect of Missouri, perhaps, forever. The statements and opinions of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, on this part of the subject, I think entitled to much weight; but, going on the principle that evil generally gains upon good, I think it expedient to restrict. Slavery, sir, is an evil, which carries in its train many auxiliaries. It is an epidemic in the body politic. Slavery is admitted to be morally wrong; it cannot, then, be politically right. It makes industry disgraceful, familiarizes with injustice, which is easily transferred from a black man to a white man. This is its natural tendency, and it will have this effect in Missouri. Every State must be supported by industry, and that is a bad policy which sinks industry into disgrace.

But gentlemen tell us that slaves in the Southern States have become too numerous; that they are burdensome to their owners, and dangerous to society. And what has produced this result? Is it that the increase of the slave population in the South has so much gained on the free population? Yes, sir, this is the fact. The statistical annals of the country prove it to be so. Take, then, this fact, and no matter how extensive the region over which you scatter your slaves, the day will come when all that region will be in the same situation in which the Southern States now are. They will be burdensome to their masters, and dangerous to society. What political safety or good, then, would result, either to the slaves or their owners, by such distribution? You would, indeed, put off the evil day, but you would pay a heavy interest in the extension of the evil. Humanity towards the slaves would not be promoted by their dispersion, and the great work of emancipation and colonization, which has to commence some day, will be easier to commence now than half a century to come. But, we are told, that the citizen of the South will go to Missouri, and that it would be cruel to prevent him from taking his domestics, his menial servants, who are attached to his family and children, along with him. But these domestics are also fathers, mothers, and children. They belong to different though contiguous estates. They have all the natural ties and affections; but they are torn asunder forever. A father is taken to Missouri; a mother and infants are left on the Potomac. Where, then, is the humanity of this measure? But I have already occupied too much of the time of the Committee. I will no longer prosecute the subject.

Mr. CUTHBERT, of Georgia, followed, and occupied the floor also about an hour against the restriction, when the Committee rose, on motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 16.

Another member, to wit, from New Jersey, CHARLES KINSEY, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury, transmitting a list rendered to him by the Register of the Treasury, of balances standing on what are called the Books of Receipts and Expenditures in the Treasury, of balances which have remained unsettled, or appear to have been due, three years prior to the 30th of September, 1819; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the United States, from the 4th of March, 1789, to the 30th of June, 1819, with several explanatory statements, &c., rendered in obedience to the resolution of this House of the 6th ultimo; which was also ordered to lie on table.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to amend "An act to provide for certain persons engaged in the naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war;" which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill to authorize certain insane persons to be placed on the pension list, and the guardians to receive pensions.

Mr. SMITH, from the same committee, also reported a bill to amend an act making reservation of certain public lands for naval purposes, passed 1st of March, 1817; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, made a detailed report on the subject of the expenditures on the said buildings, accompanied by a bill making further appropriations for continuing the work upon the centre building of the Capitol and other public buildings; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. GROSS, of New York, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of so altering the places of holding the district court for the northern district of the State of New York, that one term thereof may be holden at the village of Sandy Hill, in the county of Washington.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills, which originated in this House, of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of William McDonald, administrator of James McDonald, deceased, late captain in the Army of the United States;" and "An act for the relief of Ether Shepley, administrator of Thomas Buckminster, late lieutenant in the 33d regiment of United States' infantry," with an amendment to each; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

THE MISSOURI BILL.

The House then resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the proposed amendment to this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: Without occupying your attention by any unnecessary apologies, I shall at once proceed to the examination of the principles involved in the question which now occupies the attention of this Committee, and which, it is said, moves the great ocean of popular feeling even to the bed on which for some time it has, with so much tranquillity, reposed. In proportion to the magnitude of the effect is the solicitude of the human mind to trace to its source the cause by which it has been produced. What then, sir, has produced this degree of excitement which gentlemen assure us exists in the nation? Is it the mere question whether the lands of Missouri shall be cultivated by freemen or by slaves? No, sir—no, sir—no. It is a question about power; power—that idol which has a charm, an irresistible fascination, for the human heart. It is a question calculated to test the powers of the Federal Government; to determine how much sovereignty or power is left to the States and to the people.

Gentlemen tell us that there is great excitement in the country, and desire us to be quiet and patient, lest we should add to the excitement. And pray, sir, by whom has this excitement been produced? From what quarter did the proposition come? Where have town and county meetings been gotten up, to manufacture resolutions of thanks to individual members of Congress, to stimulate them to go on with this choice work of excitement? Not in the slaveholding States—not in Virginia; but in the States north and east of the Potomac—in New York and in New England. Do gentlemen believe that they will be permitted to produce a state of general excitement and agitation in the country, and then to avail themselves of the state of public feeling, in order to silence opposition? Gentlemen will excuse us if we cannot imitate the meekness of the lamb, which crops the flowery food, and licks the hand just raised to shed his blood.

Before I proceed to discuss the Constitutional principles involved in this question, I beg leave to pay my respects to the few gentlemen whom I have had the opportunity to hear on this subject.

An honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. CUSHMAN,) whom I mean to treat with becoming respect, commenced by telling us that no gentleman who understood his grammar, who had become a statesman, could possibly doubt the power of Congress to impose the proposed restrictions on the people of Missouri. Have we not, said he triumphantly, by the Constitution, the power expressly given “to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States?” Before I proceed, permit me to say that no man who ever entitled himself to the character of a statesman, ever did attempt to derive from that part of the clause, from those words in the Constitution of the United States, any powers to Congress. Alexander Hamilton, the father of implied and resulting powers; the champion of federal rights; he who submitted in the Federal Convention “his ideas of a suitable plan of government for the United States;” which plan was nearly a transcript from the British Government, changing the title of King into Governor, the House of Lords into a Senate, and limiting the tenure of office to the life of the individual, instead of making it hereditary, together with some other slight changes, to render it a little more palatable; never attempted to derive to Congress any authority from these words, from this part of the clause.

I understand the worthy gentleman is not only a follower, but a teacher, of the mild precepts of the meek and lowly Jesus—peace on earth, and good will to all mankind. Yet the gentleman talked of blood and slaughter with great sang froid. He spoke of a State (without naming it) which was disposed to command, to dictate to Congress. That State, he said, must have its crest lowered. When the gentleman was manufacturing the speech which he was so kind as to read to us the day before yesterday, he must have drawn the picture which he gave us of a State in opposition to the General Government, not from fancy, but from memory—not from ideal, but real life. He must have been haunted by the image of the late Governor Strong, of Massachusetts; by the miserable faction which met in conclave at Hartford; that celebrated convention which deemed it prudent to exclude the light of Heaven from its deliberations. If we are to credit the newspaper publications, (some pieces recently published under the signature of Massachusetts,) the objects of this convention were not very disinterested, honorable, or patriotic. I will not repeat from newspapers, for I mean to say nothing in this debate for which I do not hold myself personally responsible. But, sir, what was the situation of the country when this convention of memorable existence met? Was it, as the member from Massachusetts described, all peace without, and sunshine? Was there no other evidence of a storm than that which is given in a close room, by the whispering of the wind through some cranny or key hole—merely the Æolian harp? Or did the enemy really hang on your maritime frontier, like the sable cloud of night, threatening to sweep with the besom of destruction your whole coast? Yes, sir, this was the situation of the country when the convention of famed memory met in conclave at Hartford; when the ministers of the Gospel in New England were denouncing from their pulpits the Federal Administration, and teaching their flocks that it was contrary to religion and humanity to rejoice at the victories obtained by the arms of the United States over the enemies of the country. If, however, the gentleman be right in his principles of construction, taking the clause which gives general legislation to Congress—making, as he does, the sovereignty reside in the Government—to use the words of a very great man, who now sleeps in the dust, this sweeping clause, this Constitution, has a strong squinting; it squints not only at monarchy, but at despotism—despotism as absolute as ever wielded the sceptre over a set of crouching slaves. Sir, I had always believed that the sovereign power in this country resided in the people. The very idea of responsibility on the part of the representative, proves that the sovereign power is in the people. The gentleman desires to explain, to which I certainly can have no possible objection. [Mr. CUSHMAN said he had admitted the sovereign power to be in the people.] And pray, sir, what does the gentleman’s explanation prove? That, although the people have retained in their own hands the sovereign power, and attempted to establish a Government of very limited, specified, and delegated powers, yet, by the use of the terms common defence and general welfare—terms used to point out the objects for which the specified and enumerated powers had been delegated—their whole object had been defeated; that, by the use of these terms, they had created a Government of the most indefinite and unlimited powers. I shall, in a subsequent part of the debate, take some further notice of these rules of construction.

I will now pass on to a gentleman from New York, (Mr. TAYLOR.) I shall not notice all his remarks, nor pursue them precisely in the order in which they were made. He said that he had no spirit of hostility to the people of the South—to the people of the slaveholding States. He said that we had at length fallen upon evil days. If the policy advocated by the gentleman be persisted in, the day may indeed become evil. It may lead to conflicts of the most direful character; it may blight the hopes of the most devoted friends of liberty and self-government, and clothe this nation in mourning. "This new doctrine—invasion of State rights." Does the gentleman really believe the doctrine to be new, that every act of the General Government, not authorized by the Constitution of the United States, is an invasion of the rights of the States? Or does he mean to convey the idea that this effort to preserve the States from encroachments on the part of the General Government is unprecedented? We have had five Presidents—one only of that number taken from the country north of the Potomac. That one, although from New England—that land peculiarly blessed by liberty and equality—deemed it necessary to surround his administration by the guards furnished by a sedition and an alien act: the one calculated to stifle inquiry; the other to enable him to banish as aliens all who might be hostile or inimical to the course of policy pursued by him in the administration of the Government. Were not these acts of usurpation opposed by all the States south and west of the Potomac? Did they not kindle an unextinguishable flame of opposition in all the slaveholding States? Were they not successfully opposed by the intelligence and good sense of the people, on the following grounds: that the sedition act was a violation of an express provision of the Constitution of the United States; the alien act a violation of the spirit and meaning of the instrument, by uniting in the Chief Magistrate powers which the Constitution had confided to separate departments of the Government? Has the gentleman forgotten the opposition made to the act incorporating the old Bank of the United States; particularly to the act which contemplated a renewal of the charter; the excitement produced by that question; the great division of public sentiment which existed on the subject; the division in the Senate of the United States on the question; the rejection of the unconstitutional measure, to the immortal honor of a former Vice President of the United States, (the late George Clinton,) by giving the casting vote; the general and successful opposition to the stamp act? The gentleman cannot be serious when he speaks of this doctrine about State rights as a new doctrine. This change, as he is pleased to term it, in public sentiment, he endeavored to account for, and in a manner the most courteous. He even attempted to excuse our foibles, by stating that our opinions are frequently influenced without our being sensible of it—supposed the change to result from the enhanced value of slaves. As far as I know, (and I do not profess to have much information on the subject,) there are but two legitimate modes of reasoning—one from fact, the other from analogy. As the gentleman does not presume to rely on facts, he must have arrived at his conclusion by reasoning from analogy.

Another gentleman from New York (Mr. WOOD) contended that the President and Senate had no right to negotiate the treaty by which Louisiana was ceded to the United States; no right to stipulate for the admission of a people residing beyond the limits of the United States into the Union on a footing of equality with the original States. I understand that this treaty was submitted to the Congress of the United States; that it received the sanction of the House of Representatives, as well as the President and Senate; that the Constitutional powers of the Government to negotiate such a treaty were then brought into discussion, and the right denied by Messrs. Griswold, Pickering, and Dana, who warmly opposed the treaty. But, sir, it is enough to say to the gentleman, that he has made the discovery too late; that his protest for defect of title should have been earlier made. What is the situation of the people of Missouri? What has been the conduct of the Government of the United States? This country has been held for nearly seventeen years. The people of the United States have been induced to migrate there in great numbers. The supreme law of the land guaranteed to them protection in the full and free enjoyment of their property. Land offices were established there, the public lands have been sold to them, and on terms very advantageous to the Government and people of the United States. Shall the Government, after deriving all the advantages which could result from this course of policy, say to the people that we purchased a defective title to this country; that we will take advantage of the defect in our own title, in order to impose hard and onerous conditions on you, as the price of your admission into the Union? Sir, shall the Government be permitted to do, with impunity, that which would crimson with blushes the cheeks of an individual?

The gentleman has made another discovery, which will certainly give him great illustration in the country; that the Constitution of the United States guarantees to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and that slavery is incompatible with a republican form of government. Again, the gentleman is rather unfortunate in point of time; he has made his discovery too late; experience and fact are both against him. It is something like a discovery, at this day, that Homer and Virgil were destitute of taste and talents for poetry. The question has long since been settled by the unerring standard of taste—the concurring testimony of ages. The same gentleman stated that the United States tendered to the people of Missouri a constitution with this restriction. Have they the right to impose it? This, sir, is a clear illustration of the principles of those who contend for the doctrine of restrictions—of those who talk about the Declaration of Independence, and the right of the people to self-government. Congress tender to the people of Missouri a constitution! This is a naked presentation of the doctrine. For, in effect, the same result is produced, whether the instrument be tendered ready written, or the fundamental principles dictated, which it is to contain.

FEBRUARY, 1820.

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

I will proceed to examine whether Congress possess the Constitutional power to impose on the people of Missouri, as the condition of their admission into the Union, the perpetual prohibition of slavery, or involuntary servitude. In order the more clearly to understand the Constitutional powers of Congress, in relation to this question, it will be necessary to establish some principles or rules of construction, to guide us in our future investigation. The sovereign authority, in this country, resides in the people. The Government of the United States is a Government of limited and defined powers. The attributes of sovereignty delegated to Congress are of high and most important character; they are, however, clearly defined, and carefully enumerated. By the 8th section of the 1st article, most, if not all the powers delegated to Congress, are carefully enumerated. In the first clause of that section, the objects which induced the people of the United States to intrust Congress with the exercise of such important and truly interesting powers are pointed out, to wit: "the common defence and general welfare of the United States." These are the objects which those extensive delegations of power were intended to effectuate. They are pointed out as the grand objects which Congress should ever keep steadily in view. They were designed as beacons to guide the Representatives of the people in the exercise of the high powers intrusted to their integrity and honor, and never designed to furnish to the Representatives of this defined and limited Government all power which they might desire, or be disposed to exercise. Congress can rightfully exercise no power, unless it be expressly given by the Constitution, or unless it be both necessary and proper to carry into effect some power expressly given. By the 4th article of the Constitution of the United States, section 3d, it is provided that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union." It is contended that the power under this clause to admit new States, is in its nature general; that Congress has discretionary authority as to the admission of new States into the Union, and may impose whatever conditions it pleases, as terms of that consent. I shall take the liberty of referring to some pamphlets and speeches, which have been laid on our tables with the view to guide us in the discharge of the important duties of legislation. I hope the radiance of intellect which beams on the pages of these pamphlets and speeches, although it has afforded me very little aid in the investigation of this important subject, will light the authors to happiness. The Boston Memorial, the very title of which is calculated to mislead and deceive: it is alleged to be "on the subject of restraining the increase of slavery in the new States." In the fifth page of this memorial, it is stated that "the Territories, as such, can have no rights but what are conferred by Congress." I know the gentleman first named on the committee which prepared this memorial; I served with him in Congress during the most gloomy period of the late war. He is certainly a man of talents. Can it for a moment be pretended by any man, that the people of the United States, wherever they may reside, have no rights except such as are conferred by Congress. The servants of the people—the mere creatures of the public will—to be the source from which the people derive their rights! Their rights to life, liberty, and the means of pursuing their happiness. The doctrine is too absurd to require serious refutation. In the same memorial, page 6 and 7, it is further alleged—"and if conditions may be annexed, it depends solely upon the wisdom of Congress what such conditions shall be. They may embrace every thing not incompatible with the possession of those federal rights which an admission into the Union confers upon the new States." The memorialists, in order to present a naked view of the doctrines for which they contend, in the 15th page, go on to show what they understand by rights derived exclusively from the State government. "The inhabitants shall be admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities, of citizens of the United States." The rights, advantages, and immunities, here spoken of, must, from the very force of the terms of the clause, be such as are recognised or communicated by the Constitution of the United States. The clause cannot be referred to rights, advantages, and immunities, derived exclusively from the State governments, for these do not depend upon the Federal Constitution. Besides, it would be impossible that all the rights, advantages, and immunities, of citizens of the different States, could be at the same time enjoyed by the same persons. These rights are different in different States; a right exists in one State which is denied in others, or is repugnant to other rights enjoyed in others. In some States, a freeholder alone is qualified to vote in elections; in some a qualification in personal property is sufficient; and in others, age and freedom are the sole qualifications of electors. The bare presentation of this reasoning is sufficient to prove how difficult it is to support error, even when the most ingenious volunteer their services as its advocates. It is first contended that the Territories, as such, (surely meaning the people who inhabit the Territories, and not the lands which compose the Territories,) can have no rights but what are conferred by Congress. Secondly, that conditions may be annexed to the admission of a State into the Union, which may embrace every thing not incompatible with the possession of those federal rights which an admission into the Union confers upon the new State. Thirdly, it is emphatically contended, that the right of suffrage is derived exclusively from the State governments. The Territories, as such, can have no rights but what are conferred by Congress. They may be denied all rights which are not federal. If the reasoning were true, the most important right which can be enjoyed by a freeman, in civil societies, to wit, right of suffrage, could never be enjoyed by the citizens of a Territory. How would they elect their Representatives to Congress? Such reasoning is too absurd to merit further notice.

H. OF R.

Admission of Missouri.

I will not occupy the time of the Committee by reading from the treaty of April, 1803, by which the French Republic ceded to the United States Louisiana; that clause which secured to the people of the ceded territory the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they professed, and provided for their speedy admission into the Union, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, because the clause has so often been read that it must be distinctly remembered by every member of the Committee. By the Constitution of the United States, article 6, "all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land." I beg leave to refer the Committee to the printed speech of Mr. King: he remarks, page 7, "It is further objected that 'the article of the act of admission into the Union, by which slavery should be excluded from Missouri, would be nugatory, as the new State, in virtue of its sovereignty, would be at liberty to revoke its consent, and annul the article by which slavery should be excluded. Such revocation would be contrary to the obligations of good faith, which enjoin the observance of our engagements—it would be repugnant to the principles upon which Government itself is founded. Sovereignty, in every lawful government, is a limited power, and can do only what it is lawful to do. Sovereigns, like individuals, are bound by their engagements, and have no moral power to break them. Treaties between nations repose on this principle.' This appears to be as complete a surrender of the question as could be made by any terms which belong to the language in which they are expressed. The treaty ceding Louisiana, of which Missouri was a part, expressly secured to the people their liberty, property, and religion, and provided for their speedy admission into the Union, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution.

Treaties, made under the authority of the United States, are, by the Constitution, declared to be the supreme law of the land. Mr. King places the obligations of a treaty on the same ground, and gives to them equal force in a moral point of view, with those obligations which bind the members of society to each other, and secure obedience to their Government. Let us contrast this great and distinguished statesman with himself. Let it be remembered that, at the time Louisiana was ceded to the United States, the people of that country held slaves, and that their slaves constituted a very important part of their property. Mr. King, page 7: "As all nations do not permit slavery, the term property, in its common and universal meaning, does not include or describe slaves. But, admitting that such was the intention of the parties, (to wit: to include slaves under the term property,) the stipulation is not only temporary, but extends no further than to the property actually possessed by the inhabitants of Missouri, when it was first occupied by the United States. Property since acquired by them, and property acquired or possessed by the new inhabitants of Missouri, has, in each case, been acquired under the laws of the United States, and not during or under the laws of Louisiana. Should, therefore, the future introduction of slaves into Missouri be forbidden, the feelings of the citizens would be reconciled to their exclusion; and the inconsiderable number of slaves owned by the inhabitants at the date of the cession of Louisiana, would be emancipated, or sent for sale into States where slavery exists." I know the influence which Mr. King has in certain portions of the United States, among a particular description of politicians. He is certainly a man of very great experience, and ought to be well skilled in diplomacy. I appeal to the Committee, and ask, confidently, whether a greater want of candor could be exhibited? I say candor. A treaty, solemnly entered into, the stipulations of which were peculiarly designed to extend protection to the inhabitants of the ceded territory; to secure to them the complete and absolute control over their property, which consisted, to a very large amount, in slaves; and this grave statesman affects to doubt whether the contracting parties intended to include slaves under the term property. Again, a condition submitted to by the people of Missouri, in order to obtain admission into the Union, would be perpetually binding on them and their posterity; because good faith requires an observance of engagements, and because treaties between nations repose on this principle. Yet, the stipulations contained in the treaty of cession, are utterly disregarded; stipulations which have been again and again recognised, by the Government of the United States, in the most solemn and impressive manner—not only at the period when the treaty was ratified, but at the admission of Louisiana into the Union; and in every act of legislation, for the territorial government of the whole country, ceded by France to the United States, from the date of the cession in April, 1803, to the present moment. Such inconsistencies require no further comment.

The power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States has been much relied on by Mr. King and others, as giving to Congress the power to impose the condition, or restriction, on the people of Missouri. The arguments derived from this grant of power have been so fully met and refuted, by those who have preceded me in the debate, that I shall not detain the Committee by going over the ground, but barely remark that the proposed amendment is intended to operate, not on the territory or other property of the United States, but on the citizens of the United States and their property. Property which they have held, and been induced to acquire, on the faith of the pledge, solemnly made by the Government of the United States, that the people of that territory should be protected in their civil and religious privileges, in the enjoyment of their property, and that they should be admitted into the Union as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, and to the enjoyment of all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States.

The power to regulate commerce is among the express powers delegated to Congress. This power has been resorted to, in order to prove that Congress can, constitutionally, impose on the people of Missouri the condition, or restriction, contained in the proposed amendment. This branch of the subject shall be noticed hereafter.

The political doctors of the day, not satisfied with resorting to the different clauses of the Constitution, which give to Congress power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States; to admit new States into the Union; to regulate commerce; to provide for the common defence and general welfare; have most strangely resorted to the 9th section of the 1st article of the Constitution, to derive, for Congress, this omnipotent power of fixing immutably the fundamental principle, by which the people of Missouri and their posterity are to be governed. This section, from the beginning to the end, contains nothing but prohibitions and restrictions on the powers of Congress. The first clause of this section contains the prohibition, on the power of Congress, relative to the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States shall think proper to admit prior to the year 1808. I shall not dwell on the terms migration and importation, which have been so often repeated, during this debate, as to cause them to grate on the ear as harshly and disagreeably as the chains of the convict.

I am very happy that the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. PINCKNEY,) a member of the Convention which formed the Constitution of the United States, has given an account of the understanding of the Convention, as to the true import and meaning of these terms, which corresponds completely with the definitions given of them by the most learned and the best speakers who have taken part in this debate, to wit, that migration was applied to all persons of whatever color or description, who should voluntarily remove to the United States, or any particular State—importation, to all persons who should be brought, by the will of others, into any of the States. All contracts or compacts may grant more or less than the contracting parties designed to convey. If Congress possess no other power over the subject of migration or importation, than what can be derived from this 9th section, it is, to my mind, most perfectly clear, that not a single power is possessed over the subject.

It will be recollected by the Committee that the preceding section contains an enumeration of the powers designed to be intrusted to the Congress of the United States. Would it not be a most singular inconsistency for men of very inferior perspicacity and intelligence to those who framed the Constitution of the United States, who should be engaged in a work of such deep and momentous importance as that of preparing a form of government for a free people, who were jealous and watchful of their liberties, in order to form a government of limited and defined powers which should be perfectly secure from abuse? First, to enumerate, with care and accuracy, the several powers intended to be intrusted to the representatives of the people—yielding to the well founded jealousy entertained of the propensity of man to abuse delegated powers, that the very singular mode should have been adopted to confer new and more extensive powers, by prohibiting, except under peculiar circumstances, or for a limited time, the exercise of some of the most important powers, expressly delegated, or resulting by necessary and unavoidable implication, from powers thus conferred. Sir, there is no rule of construction; no principle of reason, which is not opposed to such a mode of imparting power. I know I may be met with the objection, that it is from this clause that Congress derives the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. To which I answer, that Congress derives from this clause no power over the writ of habeas corpus; that it was designed to furnish a rule of construction, to prevent the abuse of power by suspending this writ, on which the personal security and liberty of the citizen so much depended. The people of this country had not long shaken off the yoke of a foreign tyrant. They had had many painful evidences of the abuse of power by the British Government in suspending the great and efficacious writ. But can it for a moment be doubted that Congress has the Constitutional power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus? But for the prohibition contained in this section on the exercise of this power, it might have been very much abused. Are not the powers delegated to Congress, in their nature sovereign? Is not the power to declare war a high sovereign power, confided by the people to their representatives? Is not the power to create tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court, expressly given? Is not the whole judiciary of the United States organized by an act of Congress? Are not the forms of writs, and the rules of proceeding, prescribed by Congress? Can it be at all doubtful that the power which, under the Constitution, prescribes the rule of action; in other words, gives the law to the courts and the people, when the public interest demands it, can suspend even this highly important and remedial writ? This was known to the Convention; the prohibition was wisely inserted, as a necessary guard to the liberty of the citizen.

Again, it may be contended that, from the 10th section of the same article, which contains nothing but restraints and prohibitions upon the exercise of certain powers by the States, that they, when actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay, derive the power to keep troops and ships of war, to enter into compacts with each other, with foreign Powers, and even to engage in war. Not so, sir. It serves merely as a rule of construction, as an additional evidence of the jealousy of the people of this country of their rights and liberties, and of the propensity of man to abuse power when intrusted to him. Not a right is conferred on the States by this section. The States, in relation to the General Government, and in reference to their defence, occupy the same ground as individuals. Whenever a government is unable to defend the citizen, the right of self-defence, a natural right, recurs to him; so of the States. When the General Government is unable to defend the States, the natural and inalienable right of self-defence reverts to the States, and authorizes them to defend and preserve themselves.

Shall I be permitted to invite the attention of the Committee to the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, articles first and second? These articles contain prohibitions of a very singular character, on the exercise of powers by Congress. I confess that I have never seen these articles without regret. I have considered them as disgraceful to the high and lofty character of the American people. I presume, if a convention were now called, to frame a constitution for the people of the United States, that, instead of embodying a few general and fundamental principles, contained in a little pamphlet like this, [holding the Constitution in his hand,] it would require a large folio volume to contain the necessary restrictions and prohibitions on the Government against undue and unwarrantable exercise of power. What are the prohibitions in these articles? "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. A well regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed." I ask the Committee to pause for a moment, and to reflect on the character of these prohibitions. What must have been the jealousy of those who deemed it necessary to guard against the abuse of power, by such restrictions, on a Government of limited, defined, and delegated authority? Under what pretence could Congress dare to interfere with affairs of religion—with the freedom of speech or of the press? Under what state of things could it be presumed to be necessary for the sovereign people of the United States to retain to themselves the poor privilege of assembling peaceably to petition, not their sovereign lords and masters, but their public servants and agents, for a redress of grievances? To what daring usurpations must they have looked, when it was deemed necessary to secure to freemen the privilege of keeping and bearing arms? But, sir, Constitutional securities against the abuse of power, of delegated and limited power, seem to be but beautiful and splendid illusions.

Notwithstanding these securities to the freedom of speech and of the press, we have seen the day when a sedition act was deemed both necessary and proper, (among a particular description of politicians in this country,) of course Constitutional. This act was deemed necessary to guard the individual who held the reins and guided the car of State. This illustrious Chief Magistrate, who was thus entrenched behind the protecting influence of a sedition act, was from New England—that land so peculiarly blessed by freedom and equality; that land where slavery is unknown. May the time not arrive when the science of political chemistry shall be better known; when the use of the alembic is better understood; that it will be discovered that Congress has the Constitutional power to prevent the people from assembling peaceably for any other purpose but to petition their lords and masters, the Congress of the United States, for a redress of grievances! Entertaining the opinions which I do, of the limited character of the Government of the United State, of the responsibility of the officers of this Government to their constituents; of the absolute, uncontrolled, and uncontrollable power of the people over not only their public servants, but of the Constitution and form of Government itself, those reservations of privileges, and limitations of power on the Government, appear to have resulted from infatuation or a sickly sensibility, which induced the framers of the amendments to reserve to the people, as privileges, what they held as rights; rights which, whenever invaded, ought to arouse the people to the most prompt and vigorous resistance. Yet, sir, experience may prove that they were right. If the Constitution be thus successfully invaded, and the people should tamely submit, other and more effectual limitations will be required.

But, sir, it has been triumphantly asked, if Congress possess no power, no authority on the subject of admitting new States: if no condition can be annexed: if any people who think proper to apply, have the right to admission into the Union? To which I reply, that Congress, unless bound by previous obligation to admit, has the unqualified authority to reject. That, under the fourth article of the Constitution, which guarantees a republican form of government to every State in this Union, Congress has the right to require that the State applying for admission shall adopt a republican form of government.

Permit me, Mr. Chairman, to inquire into the character of the population of Missouri. By whom has that Territory been settled? Are the inhabitants strangers, foreigners, aliens to our Government, manners, religion? Or are they native citizens of the United States? They are native citizens; many of them have fought and bled in defence of the principles of which all here so proudly boast. Many of them are the descendants of gallant men, who furnished from their own veins the cement for this our temple of liberty. I have the pleasure to know some of the citizens of Missouri. They are men who can rear their crests by the side of any gentleman in this House, from whatever section of the country he may have come, and for virtue, intelligence, patriotism, and valor, proudly challenge a comparison. I allude to the O'Fallans, the nephews of George R. Clark—a name held in sacred regard by Kentucky and Virginia. The man whose chivalic spirit and daring enterprise, conquered the finest portion of country in the Union—the country north and west of the Ohio—the country which is now represented in Congress by men who are aiding to place fetters on the nephews and relatives of this very man. Nephews who have proved themselves to be true and genuine branches of the original stock.

I beg leave to inquire into the pretensions of the people of the North and East, to form constitutions for their neighbors. Have the people of those portions of the Union been peculiarly blessed by political tranquillity, harmony, and happiness? I will not point to the political commotions which have so frequently and so violently agitated the peaceful relations of the people in our Northern and Eastern hemisphere, because they are familiar to all. I will barely refer to facts, supported by high authority. Connecticut, until very lately, never had a constitution. The Governor of Massachusetts, at the late session of the General Assembly of that State, recommended the call of a convention to revise and amend the constitution of the State. The Governor of New York recently recommended, to the Assembly of that State, the propriety of calling a convention to re-model and amend their constitution. In his speech to the two houses of the Legislature, at the opening of their session, he presents the following striking picture of the political agitations and excitements which exist in that great State: "While this State has made rapid and signal advances in prosperity, it has been more obnoxious to the excitement of party than any member of the Federal Union. Even during the gloomy periods of the Revolution, this spirit was exhibited in a variety of shapes, and since that time it has scarcely ever ceased to agitate society. After giving full weight to the operation of other assignable causes, we are forced to conclude that there is a radical defect in the constitution of our government; that it either wants some essential check against the progress of party, or that it contains in its arrangement the elements of discord and excitement." After this very strong picture of the political cabals which agitate his own State, and disturb the peace and tranquillity of its citizens, modesty would seem to require that his Excellency should remain quiet and silent about the affairs of his neighbors; that he should direct his own energies, and engage the energies of his State Legislature, exclusively to correct existing abuses at home. Not so his Excellency; although he admits that for more than forty years he and all the distinguished statesmen of his great and distinguished State, have not been able to correct the radical evils under which they have labored, he is ambitious to influence the deliberations of Congress, and extend his fostering care to the people of Missouri, by furnishing them some of the fundamental principles by which they and their posterity are to be governed.

He thus impresses, in his speech, on the Legislature, the necessity of interposing:

"Nor can I conceal, on this occasion, the deep anxiety which I feel in a subject now under the consideration of the General Government, and which is unfortunately calculated to produce geographical distinctions. Highly important as it is to allay feelings so inauspicious, and to cultivate the most friendly communion with every member of the Confederacy, yet I consider the interdiction of the extension of slavery a paramount consideration. Morally and politically speaking, slavery is an evil of the first magnitude; and, whatever may be the consequences, it is our duty to progress, in all cases where such prohibition is allowed by the Constitution. No evil can result from its inhibition, more pernicious than its toleration; and I earnestly recommend the expression of your sense on this occasion, as equally due to the character of the State, and the prosperity of the Empire."

Sir, New York is entitled to my thanks, and to the thanks of the nation, for the interesting and gallant stand which, under the auspices of her late patriotic Governor, (Daniel D. Tompkins,) she during the late war with Great Britain, made against the common enemy. But I must be permitted, after the above statement of facts, to enter, for the people of Missouri, a solemn protest against the interference of the people of the North and East with their fundamental and municipal regulations—first, for the want of capacity; and, secondly, because they have no right to interfere.

May not the people of Missouri, with great force and propriety, say to the people of New England and New York, look to your own affairs; tranquillize the political discord and excitement which agitate your own bosoms; heal the wounds which the political parties in your own States are perpetually inflicting on each other. Let us alone; permit us to manage our own affairs in our own way. We fear the constitution which you are endeavoring to impose on us will either want some essential check against the progress of party, or that it will contain in its arrangement the elements of discord and excitement. We think no evil can result from resisting with manly firmness and fortitude, this unconstitutional and unwarrantable effort which you are making to invade our sovereignty and independence, so pernicious, as would be a base and tame acquiescence on our part.

The doctrines of humanity and religion have not been much pressed into service by the restrictionists latterly. It is somewhat singular that the passion of humanity should, at the same instant of time, have seized so strongly upon New England and Old England; that this passion should have been so strongly and so singularly enlisted in favor of the black slaves in the United States. Slavery on every other portion of the globe seems to have had no effect on the sympathies of these philanthropists. They have not been excited by the condition of the white slaves of Europe; nor by the sufferings of the white, black, and party-colored slaves of the Indies. The African slave trade—the enslaved descendants of Africans in the United States—are the subjects of peculiar sensibility and interest to those who have recently engaged in proclaiming the doctrines of benevolence and humanity. The peculiar and strongly-marked hostility of Old England to the people of the Southern and Western States, the holders of black slaves, is well known. Let the people of England—of Great Britain—cast their eyes on the map of the earth, and see what a large proportion of its habitable part is covered, and by millions of human beings held in the most wretched state of bondage, by the policy of their own Government. In the West Indies, in Europe, in the East Indies, millions of human beings, presenting every shade of color, and every grade of suffering and misery, testify by their execrations that they are the victims of British policy—of British cruelty and ambition. Yet we find the pages of every public journal in Great Britain filled with exclamations and denunciations against the holders of black slaves in the United States. England, despotic and heartless as she is, still endeavors to preserve the appearance of some regard and respect for the opinions of the world. She still can blush, or appear to blush, by keeping the veil closely drawn. It would not do for her to express much sympathy for white slaves. Her half-fed and badly-clothed subjects in the highlands of Scotland; her enslaved subjects in Ireland; would attract painful attention. The miserable condition of the people in the East Indies, rendered thus miserable by her despotic policy, would intrude itself. The white slaves in every part of Europe, therefore, fail to excite her humanity. The Hungarian peasant, whose state of slavery and subjugation, according to Bright, are infinitely more oppressive than that of the black slave in America, excites no portion of her sympathy or humanity. Can England disguise the fact—can her friends conceal it—that she has done more to entail misery on the African race, and their descendants, than all the other Powers of the earth?

H. OF R.

Admission of Missouri.

Humility is said to be the most odious garb in which Pride can be dressed. This may be true, sir; but it is still more odious to see Ambition dressed out in the meek habiliments of religion, with humanity on her lips, whilst the love of power swells her heart. We need take but a glance at the history of the times that are past, to see this same Ambition, covered with the mantle of religion, profaning the God whom it affected to adore; poisoning the stream of human felicity; rioting on the sufferings of the innocent. Shall we look for examples to the land which is sometimes called the land of our ancestors—to Great Britain—to happy England? If we look to the reign of the bloody Mary or the present Regent, we shall see the spirit of ambition arrayed on the side of humanity and religion; how happily, let the blood and the tears of the Catholics of Ireland, shed by the same sabre which has been drawn in defence of the Catholics of Spain, testify. The worship of the Deity has been proscribed to the Catholics at home—to the Catholics of Ireland—whilst the Spanish Catholic has been sustained by the same authority, even at the point of the bayonet, to his altar and his God. And all this has been done in the name of humanity, and under the pretext of devotion to religion!

But, sir, it will be expected that I should say something on the power of Congress to interdict the African slave trade. The power to regulate commerce is delegated to Congress in general and comprehensive terms. The most essential attribute of the power to regulate, by law, the trade of the country, is to preserve the purity and justice of the trade. The African slave trade came properly within the power to regulate commerce. This trade, which was carried on in fraud and injustice, by kidnapping, is as completely within the power of Congress to interdict, by punishing the citizens of the United States engaged in it, as piracy, or any other fraudulent and swindling traffic. It results from the general power to regulate the commerce of the country, and not from the limitations on the exercise of the power by Congress over the migration and importation of such persons as any of the States should think proper to admit prior to the year 1808. There is no express power given to Congress to prevent the migration of foreigners to the United States; but the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization is expressly given. This power is given to enable Congress to promote the common defence and general welfare. The general power to make citizens must necessarily include the power to judge of the expediency of exercising the power, and extend to the power of excluding the applicants from settling and residing within the limits of the Union. Otherwise it would have been in the power of several Governments in Europe to have thrown into this country such a large number of persons, as not only to have influenced our deliberations, but actually to have endangered our safety. The members of the Federal Convention saw the necessity of clothing Congress with this important power; they also saw and knew how important it was to the prosperity of the country, that its population should be augmented by migration; and, as the several States had governments capable of deciding this question of policy, at least for a limited time, the exercise of the power over the subject was prohibited to Congress until 1808.

The agitation of this question, if productive of no other good consequence, must be calculated to settle a question heretofore of doubtful policy. It must convince the people of the United States that their territory is sufficiently extensive. If every accession of territory shall, when the population becomes sufficiently numerous to demand admission into the Union as a State, thus agitate the Confederacy, and threaten to reduce society to its elements, for one, I am disposed to fix the limits where they now exist; to extinguish no more Indian titles to lands beyond the acknowledged limits of the United States. I think the Florida purchase may be considered as settled. If, after so many years negotiation, if, after so many prevarications on the part of Spain, we are, in order to secure a few millions of dollars to our merchants, to procure that which is to promote the spirit of discord, hatred, and disunion among the States, it may be well to pause, and inquire whether the price will not be too high.

Sir, I am attached to the Union; but it is a rational attachment. I have no superstitious attachment, either to the Union or any thing else. I am attached to the Union, because I believe it calculated to secure the political rights, tranquillity, prosperity, and happiness, of the people of this country. The moment the Union shall fail to secure and promote these objects I shall detest it, as I would any other species of despotism.

With what propriety can those who, during the Revolution, embarked with us their fortunes and their hopes on board the same ship; who gladly clung to us during the hour of danger, after it stood the storm during the Revolutionary conflict, and rode triumphantly through the tempest during the late war with Great Britain—passing safely over the rough sea which set in from abroad, undisturbed by the ripple added by domestic faction—now that all is peace and sunshine, turn upon us, and upbraid us with the stains and spots of negro slavery; a species of slavery which existed before and during the Revolution in every State in the Union; which has always existed since the Revolution, in portions of this country, and which they bound themselves, by the most sacred of all compacts, never to disturb? Let the parties to the compact, who have been borne thus safely and happily in this old ship, but adhere to the charter-party—the Constitution—I have no doubt she will glide in safety on the wave of time to the end of the present century, prepared, at that period, still to go on with the fairest prospect of a successful voyage to the close of the next century. Permit me to borrow the dying words of the immortal Lawrence, while his eye was glazed by death: honor and glory brightened on his brow—he exclaimed, “don’t give up the ship!” I say to you, hold on to the Union—don’t give up the political ship—cling to the original charter-party—the Constitution; all will be well—the nation will be happy.

Is there a citizen of the United States who has not felt his bosom warmed and animated by the sun of our political confederacy? The sun which, on the 4th of July, 1776, rose with such unusual brightness and matchless splendor, which, for more than forty years, has warmed and animated this society, and lighted its path to glory and to happiness. Shall the political balance and harmony of our system be destroyed, and that sun be precipitated, with disastrous ruin, on the bosom of this society, which it has so often cheered and brightened into joy and felicity? I trust that Heaven will avert the sad calamity. That, under the genial influence of this sun, that flowering wreath which has so long bound in concord and harmony this Confederacy, will maintain an imperishable verdure—that its bloom will be perpetual, its fragrance immortal!

Mr. DARLINGTON, of Pennsylvania, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit a few remarks on this question; and I trust the Committee will be disposed to extend their indulgence towards me for a few moments, when they recollect that I am not in the habit of trespassing upon their patience in this way. I am very sensible that I shall not be able to do justice even to my own views of the subject; for I am utterly unpractised in the business of public speaking; yet, believing that this is a question of vital importance, not only to the character of this nation, but likewise to its safety, prosperity, and happiness; and believing also, that some erroneous impressions exist, in relation to many of those who advocate the amendments before you, I feel constrained to attempt a few observations.

I shall not presume to undertake an exposition of ambiguous Constitutional points, after the very able and learned discussions which we have had from gentlemen who have preceded me. Such an attempt would, in my opinion, be as unnecessary now, as it certainly would be presumptuous in me at any time. I shall, therefore, content myself, at this stage of the debate, with offering some of those views which present themselves to a common understanding. And here, sir, as an American, proud and jealous of our national character, I trust I may be permitted to say, that it is a source of no little mortification to me to see the Congress of these United States, in the 44th year of our independence, seriously sustaining the question whether it be rightful and expedient, without an uncontrollable necessity, to sanction human slavery in the new republics which are to be added to this Confederacy? I had once fondly hoped that such a spectacle would never have been exhibited by us, to gratify the malignant envy of the despots, and their execrable parasites, who outrage the rights of mankind in the Old World, and who sicken at the idea of their conservation here. I had hoped, that we should have persevered with unanimity, as we have hitherto done, in erecting new republics upon the true and genuine principles of our Government, excluding human slavery with the utmost care and solicitude, wherever it should be in our power to do so. The generous and predominant sentiments of the American people, as far as I have had an opportunity to be acquainted with those sentiments, seemed to me to warrant such a hope; and I cannot yet relinquish the idea.

We have been told, indeed—and I feel it my duty, as a Representative of Republican Pennsylvania, to notice the remark—we have been told, Mr. Chairman, that, however laudable may be the motives of many who are in favor of restricting slavery, yet that there are political jugglers behind the scenes, who are making use of the proposition and its advocates, as the forlorn hope, and the last desperate effort of an expiring party. Sir, where I am best known, it would be needless to say that I have nothing to do with their views, their efforts, or their hopes; that I have never had any concern or connexion with that expiring party. From my earliest youth, upwards, I have been a democratic republican; and I leave it to those who have once belonged to the aforesaid expiring party, if there be any such here, to develop the schemes of their jugglers. I have never been in their secrets; but I cannot help observing, that I see gentlemen who are avowed members of that unfortunate party, zealously engaged in the ranks of our opponents, in endeavors to defeat this amendment. Sir, I do not believe it is a question of party views with any man who loves his country, or feels an interest in its reputation and permanent welfare. But, sir, I have always been taught to believe, that it was no part of republicanism to authorize, or even to connive at, slavery, in the formation of governments, where it could possibly be prevented. I will here frankly confess, too, that it is cause of pain and regret to be opposed to gentlemen for whom I have the highest regard, and with whom it has generally been the pride and the happiness of myself and my colleagues to co-operate. But, on this occasion, I must pursue a course, however opposite to that of my Southern friends, which a solemn sense of duty renders imperative; and I ask gentlemen to exercise their accustomed liberality towards us. If they think it strange that we, who have generally acted with them, are opposed to them on this subject, we can only say, that we think it equally strange, and we do most sincerely regret, to find them in opposition to us.

What is it, Mr. Chairman, which this amendment proposes, and which seems to excite such an uncommon degree of sympathy for Missouri? What is the mighty bugbear that so alarms gentlemen? Is it proposed to bind her, hand and foot, and deliver her over to the dominion of despotism? Sir, a man of plain comprehension might well be astonished if he were to learn, for the first time, after hearing the arguments and forcible appeals of gentlemen, that the simple proposition before you is, to enable Missouri to become an independent Republican State, and to secure her from the dreadful curse of slavery! We propose to do that for her which we have already done for the States northwest of the Ohio, and for which the citizens of those States will be forever grateful. Mr. Chairman, the existence of slavery seems to be universally considered a great moral and political evil in the community. Honorable gentlemen who have an intimate knowledge of its nature and tendencies, have emphatically termed it a curse and a scourge to society. The ancient and respectable Commonwealth of Virginia perceived, at an early day, the evils which it would entail upon her, and she protested against the further increase of it. But the Government of Great Britain, regardless of the welfare of her colonies, permitted the temporary interest of a few to endanger the prosperity, the happiness, and the safety, of the countless generations who were to succeed them. We know that this tremendous evil was fastened upon our country by the mercenary, heartless policy of an arbitrary, commercial Government, not only without our agency and consent, but against our earnest protestations. But I beg to ask, sir, what it is we are about to do? I wish every member of the Committee would seriously consider this question. What is it we are about to do? Sir, unless this amendment prevail, we, the Republican Congress of the United States, are about to permit the temporary interest of a few individuals (for few they are, compared with the numbers who are hereafter to exist there) to entail this same transcendent curse upon the unborn myriads of our posterity, who will, in future times, inhabit the fertile regions of the West. Yes, sir, as we now view the conduct of Great Britain, in imposing or authorizing slavery in some of our ancient Commonwealths, so will the future citizens of these Western Republics regard this Congress, unless we interpose to stay the progress of the desolating evil. If we suffer this pernicious population to ramify and diffuse throughout the new States formed in our territories, their citizens will one day direct their agonized views to the proceedings of this body, and deplore the policy which sanctioned their dreadful destiny. They will find themselves doomed to evils, by our connivance and authority, which it will be vain and hopeless to attempt to remove. Will any gentleman of Virginia or Maryland say, that it would not have been a happy circumstance for their own States if the early settlers had been prevented from introducing slaves among them? And will it not be equally beneficial to exclude them from the Western Commonwealths? Can there be a doubt about this? No, there cannot. Then now is the time to interfere; and it is now or never. But it is objected, that we are presuming to judge for the people of Missouri. Sir, I consider that we are interested in this question as well as the people of Missouri. We are judging for ourselves as well as for them; and we are enabled, by melancholy, dear-bought experience, to judge correctly. Gentlemen have acknowledged, that they would advise an exclusion of slavery, because they know it is an inveterate and incurable evil. But, sir, although we know the future citizens of Missouri would be grateful for the restriction, it is not from an officious disposition to meddle with concerns which are foreign to us, that we urge it. No, sir. If the Missourians were to be a separate people, it would be nothing to us how many slaves they had, or what regulations they adopted. Although we might wish them to enjoy republican freedom, it would be none of our business what they were, or how they were governed. But, Mr. Chairman, they are to become a constituent part of this Confederacy; they are to be members of our political family. They are to be co-partners in our great national firm: and are not we interested in the character and condition of those who propose to join us? Have we no right to judge of the fitness of those who wish to participate in our affairs? We have embarked in the business of free government. We have recognised the sublime doctrines of the rights of man in our own States, as far as existing circumstances would permit: and do we not owe it to consistency, to our high character, and lofty pretensions, nay, to our own welfare and safety, to carry this recognition of sound principles into all the new governments erected under our authority, and which are to join us in the magnificent scheme? Do not the wise and the virtuous, the friends of freedom and mankind, in all parts of the world, anxiously expect it at our hands? Shall we blast the hopes of those philanthropists, who regard our country as the great asylum, the last and only refuge of liberty and rational government? Forbid it Heaven! We are solemnly bound not only to secure our own welfare, but to provide, as far as we can, for that of our posterity. When we know that the welfare of our descendants in Missouri, as well as in the United States generally, requires the restriction of slavery, how can we reconcile it to our sense of duty to permit the unnecessary introduction and diffusion of an evil which we are sure will be the scourge of countless generations? But, say gentlemen, the people now in Missouri may not choose to exclude slavery;

and they have a right to judge for themselves in this matter. And pray, sir, have not this Congress a right, also, to judge for themselves, whether it will be for the good of the Union to admit new members who hold mankind as slaves? If the people of this nation, or a great majority of them, believe, as I have no doubt they do, that it would be pernicious and dangerous to add new States, of this description, to the Union, have they not a right, and a discretionary power, to exclude such States? If they have not, then they are in a most deplorable condition. They are then deprived of the right of self-preservation, which is a right inherent in all bodies. Sir, we have the right of self-preservation; we have the right to judge of the means of safety; and it is our solemn duty to exercise it, and to guard against evil, whenever it is in our power to do so. It is our duty to take care that the Republic receive no detriment; and believing that it would be highly detrimental to this Union, and destructive to the first principles of our Government, to sanction the creation of new members with a power to establish human slavery where it is not absolutely necessary, I feel bound to oppose it. I should deem it a dereliction of duty, on my part, to connive at such an evil, for which I could not hope to be pardoned, either here or hereafter. I am perfectly satisfied, that the clause of the Constitution which says "new States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union," gives us the right to judge whether they ought to be admitted. We must exercise our discretion, and ascertain, to our satisfaction, whether such "new States" are of a character to increase the strength and promote the welfare of this Union; or whether they may not endanger our safety and happiness: for I contend we have a right to consult our safety and to pursue our own happiness. The Declaration of Independence is surely correct when it asserts this right; notwithstanding some of its doctrines have been ridiculed and denied on this floor, as they once were, and probably yet are, in the British Parliament. Sir, suppose the island of Cuba should become an independent State, and should apply for admission into this Union, with all her slaves and foreign habits; are we bound to admit her? No one will pretend that we are. We should judge for ourselves whether it would be for our own good to receive her: and I, for one, should very much doubt it, under any treaty stipulations; for I hold the good old Republican doctrines relative to the treaty-making power. And yet, sir, we might admit her, because Congress may admit new States. Sir, I have not the slightest doubt on the subject of our discretionary powers.

The sparse population now in Missouri may not yet perceive the evils of slavery; and may, therefore, be willing to indulge in the dangerous gratifications which it affords, until it is too late. So it was in South Carolina and Georgia. Those States wished for more slaves. They insisted on the privilege (which, unhappily for themselves, and the whole nation, was conceded to them,) of importing that description of persons for twenty years after the adoption of the Federal Constitution. But, Mr. Chairman, what do they say now?

Do they not see their error? Nay, do they not feel it, and deplore it? And are we never to profit by woful experience? Are we to go on, wilfully, and perverse, blindfold, in this fatal career, until slavery shall be extended over three-fourths of the republics in this Confederacy? I hope not. I pray to God that we may have the virtue and the firmness to restrain its progress, before we are irretrievably lost in the dreadful abyss. Some of the learned gentlemen of the bar, who oppose this amendment, have exercised their ingenuity in subtle distinctions, and technical rules of deduction, borrowed from their profession. They were, no doubt, very applicable to the subject; and, as far as I understand them, I listened with pleasure—I hope with profit. They also borrowed some of their illustrations from my profession; and there, I think, I understood them better. But, Mr. Chairman, I could by no means assent to their correctness, when they came within my province. I trust they were more correct while on their own grounds. Gentlemen compared the evil of slavery to a malignant poison; and they called upon us to dilute it, by diffusion, in order to render it more tolerable. Sir, it is a malignant poison, or rather, I would say, it is a malignant disease in the body politic, whose deleterious ravages are extended with all the certainty and inveteracy of specific contagion. It is more loathsome than the small-pox itself; and its desolating influence ought, by all means, to be confined within the smallest possible limits. Would you diffuse contagion in a community, by way of relief? Would you disseminate small-pox, with a view to dilute its malignity, or to mitigate its effects? No, sir, that would be quackery without a parallel in the darkest ages of the profession. Sir, the immortal ordinance of 1787, respecting the territories northwest of the Ohio, was the grand Jennerian discovery in relation to the malady of slavery in our country; and I trust we shall continue to avail ourselves of the blessing. The Congress of 1787 introduced a sort of political vaccination into the constitutions of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, which effectually secured those States from the evil; and I am also for extending the same salutary process to our infant sister, Missouri. And why? Is it to injure her? Is it to mutilate or disfigure her? No, sir, it is to secure her health, and to preserve her beauty! Mr. Chairman, should you deem these observations to savor unduly of the shop, I must plead, in mitigation of your censure, the precedent set by the gentlemen of the green satchel. Much has been said, Mr. Chairman, on both sides, about religion, as connected with this question. I shall not adduce religious arguments in aid of my opinions, because I am well aware that the sacred name of religion has been too often improperly used for political purposes. I have, indeed, heard the benevolent principles of Christianity urged, with unanswerable force, in my estimation, against the further extension of this crying enormity; and yet I have also recently seen, with feelings which I shall not attempt to describe, the holy scriptures cited as authority in favor of the practice of holding mankind as slaves! But I am not disposed to mingle politics with religion. I am for keeping Church and State separate, on all occasions. I cannot, however, help noticing a remark of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. PINCKNEY.) I understood him to say, that slavery could not be inconsistent with religion, because the Deity permits a large portion of the human race to be held in bondage. I am sure the gentleman did not reflect on the extent to which such an argument would go, or he would not have advanced it. Sir, if that doctrine were correct, it would go to sanction every evil that is permitted to exist in society; and we should find little reason to smile, or be surprised, at the quaint determination of the liberty-loving fathers and founders of New England, who, we are told, resolved that they would be governed by the laws of God until they could enact others better suited to their condition. But, sir, I must beg leave to say, that the religion which sanctifies the unnecessary existence of slavery, is not the religion which we profess in Pennsylvania.

It has been said, Mr. Chairman, in opposition to this amendment, that all the citizens of the United States have a right to the territory west of the Mississippi, inasmuch as it was purchased with their money; that, therefore, Congress cannot prevent citizens from removing thither with their slaves and other property. But it is admitted that the people of Missouri may, themselves, exclude slavery. Now, if it be a right which belongs to a citizen of the United States, as such, to remove there with every description of property, how comes it that his slaves may be thus excluded? Can sixty thousand people, by forming a State government in one of your territories, abridge the rights of citizens of the United States? When the public lands are thrown into the market, can these Missourians exclude all purchasers who wish to come there with their slaves? It would seem that they can; and this, to my mind, conclusively shows that the right to carry slaves into the new States is not a right of an United States' citizen, as such. But again: it is generally conceded, that Congress may prohibit slavery in a territory; and yet, if holding and carrying slaves were one of the rights of a citizen as aforesaid, such prohibition would seem to be a more direct infringement of that right, because the territory is the common property of the people of the United States. My inference, therefore, is, that the right to carry slaves into a new State, or territory, is not a federal right. I consider the right, if it may be so called, of holding mankind as slaves, to be a local one, derived from those State institutions where slavery is already permitted.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot but view this ardent desire to introduce slavery into Missouri, as somewhat analogous to the mania for banking, which lately prevailed to such an unfortunate degree in some of the States. A number of speculators were so infatuated with the prospect of gain, by banking, that no argument could prevail with them to pause, or to calculate the dangers of the scheme. They persisted in the delusion until they had well nigh ruined the country, and entailed upon it a vitiating currency, which can only be eradicated by a long period of suffering and privation. So will it be, but with consequences a thousand fold more aggravated, if slavery be permitted in Missouri. The people of that State, or their posterity, will find, when it is too late, that, by yielding to the seductions of a fallacious, temporary interest, there will be entailed upon them a perpetual curse—an evil without a remedy; and, what is more to the purpose of the present argument, an evil which will not merely affect themselves, but the whole Union. It will impair the strength and existing relations of the Union; and, therefore, Pennsylvania is deeply interested in preventing such an evil. Sir, Pennsylvania has a deep interest in the perpetuity of this Union. Her locality—her territory, stretching from the Delaware to the Ohio—and partaking partly of the character of an Atlantic, and partly that of a Western State; her habits, and her attachments, all afford a strong pledge of her devotion to the Union: and she cannot fail to be sensibly alive to every measure calculated to affect the bonds of our Confederacy. She regards the unnecessary extension of slavery in the new States as a measure of that description—as a most pernicious and dangerous measure. It is, in her estimation, subversive of the true principles of the Constitution; incompatible with the high character of our Government, and repugnant to every dictate of sound policy. Nor can these views be interpreted to the disparagement of Pennsylvania. Are they not consistent with the eternal and immutable laws of truth and justice? Do they not accord with the established character of Pennsylvania? What is her character? Gentlemen have taken occasion to eulogize their respective States, with great justice and eloquence, and I can see no reason why I may not attempt, in my humble style, to tell the simple, honest truth, of mine. Is she aspiring or ambitious? Does she assume more than becomes her as a member of this Union? The honorable Speaker has told you, and told you truly, that she is "unassuming." Is she not mild, and just, and humane, in her policy? Consult her institutions. Is she not Republican? Yes, sir, she presents to you, in her sons, a phalanx of Republicans, whose firmness and inflexible devotion to the true principles of liberty may challenge comparison with those of any of her sisters. Is she hostile to her sisters of the South? Hostile, sir! on the contrary, she entertains the warmest affection for them. She rejoices in their prosperity, and sympathizes with their adversity. When calamities overtake them, she feels and she acts as becomes her—as becomes a true and virtuous member of this political family. If proof were demanded, I need only refer you to her proceedings at this moment, in relation to a recent and dreadful calamity in the South, (the fire at Savannah.) Sir, they are worthy of her; and I take pleasure in adding, that, in the district from which I have the honor to come, every township in the respectable county where I reside has a committee now employed in procuring relief for the sufferers.

Mr. Chairman, I mention not these things vauntingly; I would disdain to do so. It would be offensive to the generous spirits engaged in the laudable work. I notice them solely to show that Pennsylvania is any thing but hostile; that she possesses and cherishes the kindest feelings towards the South. Is she hostile to Southern politics? Let the unostentatious annals of her political career furnish the answer. No, sir; it has been her pride to act with the Republicans of the Southern States. Her sons have marched with them, shoulder to shoulder, in the various struggles for political rights and national honor; and, when some of her temporarily misguided sisters have been vexed at her undeviating course, they have peevishly exclaimed—"Pennsylvania is partial to Virginia—she is devoted to the interests of the South!" Sir, those idle reproaches moved her not. She regarded them as the ebullitions of vexation and disappointment. Her object was the establishment of those great political principles in the administration of our Government, which has made it the envy and the admiration of the world. In every national contest for principles or for safety, her aid has been unceasing, her support invariable; and, amid all the difficulties which the Government has found from foreign foes, or wayward domestic factions, she has been uniformly known as "faithful Pennsylvania."

Away, then, with every insinuation that Pennsylvania may or can be cajoled or influenced on this question, by the spirit which erst displayed itself at Hartford, or any other unhallowed spirit. Sir, any imputation of that sort, from any quarter whatever, is as groundless as it is illiberal; and she repels it with scorn. She acts from the noblest motive that can animate the human breast, and from a clear and thorough conviction that the adoption of the proposition before you is essential to the welfare, the honor, and the safety of the Republic. The unanimous voice of her legislative councils on this subject, attests her deep sense of its importance; and I trust her Representatives here will respond, with fidelity, to her wishes.

Mr. WHITMAN, of Massachusetts, followed, on the same side, and advocated the restriction, in a speech of nearly two hours. When he had finished, several other gentlemen rose; but Mr. SIMKINS succeeded in obtaining the floor; and, on his motion, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 17.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of War on the petitions of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, on behalf of Captain Bigger's company of Rangers, and of Daniel D. Norton; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill to provide for paying to the State of Illinois three per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sales of the public lands within the same; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to bills from this House of the following titles, to wit:

"An act for the relief of Ether Shepley, administrator of Thomas Buckminster, late lieutenant in the 33d regiment of the United States Infantry;" and an "Act for the relief of William McDonald, deceased, late captain in the Army of the United States," were read, and severally concurred in by the House.

THE MISSOURI BILL.

The House then again proceeded, in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of this bill, and the amendment proposed thereto by Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. SIMKINS, of South Carolina, resumed the debate, and spoke more than an hour against the restriction.

Mr. DENNISON, of Pennsylvania, took the other side, and spoke some time in support of the restriction.

Mr. TYLER, of Virginia, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. T. said that he regretted that the state of his health had been such as, heretofore, to have prevented him from taking part in this debate; that, although he had not entirely recovered from that indisposition, yet, that he felt himself called on by a sense of duty to express his sentiments on this important question; important, not only as to the actors of this day; important, not only as to the present point of time, but vitally so, as to the permanency of our political institutions, and, of consequence, important to the interests of ages yet unborn. The day has not long passed, said he, in which this country was divided between two great parties; the struggle then was for office. That state of things might be considered as natural to a Republic. But party spirit has almost entirely disappeared. When at its greatest height what did it amount to? It gave to you some uneasiness, it is true, in the time of your travail and difficulty, but, under its influence, the country prospered, and our most anxious wishes were consummated. But behold now our situation! You have no longer the man of the North against the man of the North, but State against State—the North and East against the South and West—one moiety of this country arrayed against the other. Sir, the republican of the North has now turned his back on the republican of the South. I call on him to pause; I require of him to remember the days which we have seen together. In times of great peril we have been united; difficulties have vanished before us; and, by our united policy, the high destinies of our common country have been advanced. Say that you triumph on this occasion. Over whom do you triumph? I will tell you: over those who have heretofore been your friends; over those who waded with you through the perils and difficulties of your Revolutionary struggle; over men whose destinies have been united with yours since the dark period of 1798 and 1799; whom, since that period, you have met here as firm and steadfast friends. Poor is the triumph—unworthy the trophy!

Sir, said he, we have heard much of excitement, of irritation. How has it arisen, and who has produced it? Let it be set down in the tablets of your memory that it is the work of the North, and not of the South. A bill is reported in the usual form for the admission of a Territory as an independent State into this Union; and the unusual and extraordinary proposition is made to abridge it in the exercise of an essential right. We have a right to demand the reason of this innovation. Other States have been admitted without this restriction. Why is it that you now assume to yourselves the exercise of this power? Are the people of Missouri less capable of adopting measures calculated to advance their happiness than the people of the other States? Who are they? They are identified with ourselves; they are emigrants from all the States. They have carried with them the very principles which we possess; their stock of intelligence is as great, in proportion to their numbers, as is to be found elsewhere. Be sure, then, that you have the right, and that it is good policy to adopt this limitation on the powers of that people. If you doubt as to either the right or the policy, remember that, as to the first, you cannot satisfy your consciences by the exercise of doubtful power; and that, as to the last, to doubt should induce you to abstain from acting. All experience proves that they who act in obedience to the dictates of a doubtful policy may, by possibility, be right, but that they are much more often wrong than right.

Gentlemen have attempted to show the Constitutional right to impose this condition, and in what manner? They have hunted through every section of the Constitution; one fixes on one clause, another on another, and, by a course of ingenuity almost intangible, have attempted to extract this grand desideratum of powers. For one, on such an occasion, I not only require that you shall reason ingeniously, but that you shall render your power clear and manifest. Tell me not of implied and doubtful powers; against them I weigh the very nature of our Government, and the spirit of our institutions. They are founded on the great principle that man is capable of self-government; that he requires no foreign aid in regulating his domestic concerns. Our Revolution was founded on this principle; England denied to us the right to legislate, except by her special authority; nay, she proclaimed the very principle which you now proclaim as applicable to Missouri—the right to bind you by her own system of legislation. To this the American spirit did not bow. It went forth to the battle, in the majesty of its strength, and achieved the victory of our independence. But, sir, the principle which we are called on to adopt, goes, by a sightless distance, farther than England ever dared to go. Her acts of legislation were fleeting and ephemeral; liable at all times to repeal; but we are to legislate, not only for the present day, but for all ages to come. This restriction, if adopted, is unalterable and interminable in its duration. No succeeding generation have any power over it. It constitutes the very essence of the political existence of Missouri. It is the condition precedent, and must, through all future time, attach to the estate. Gentlemen have exultingly read to us the Declaration of Independence. From it they have gathered that which, as an abstract truth, I am not disposed to deny: "that all men are, by nature, equally free, sovereign, and independent." Can this proposition admit of application to a state of society? Does not its fallacy meet you in every walk of life? Distinctions will exist. Virtue and vice, wealth and poverty, industry and idleness, constitute so many barriers, which human power cannot break down, and which will ever prevent us from carrying into operation, in extenso, this great principle. Take this principle and preach it up to the monarchs of the world; will they descend from their lofty eminences, or raise mankind to a level with themselves? No, sir, the principle, although lovely and beautiful, cannot obliterate those distinctions in society which society itself engenders and gives birth to. Liberty and equality are captivating sounds; but they often captivate to destroy. England had her Jack Cades and levellers. Look, I pray you, to revolutionary France. These were the principles of that day. Mark the consequences! Murder and rapine stalked over the land, and the guillotine, the work, too, of a philanthropist of that day, was the sad monument of this fallacy. Liberty and equality was proclaimed by Robespierre and his associates, at the very moment that they were enriching the fields of France with the blood of her citizens. Nor was the doctrine confined to political institutions, but, advancing with a daring step, fought even with the Creator, and mocked at the immutable truth of religion.

Turn your eyes also to South America. The throne of the Incas was washed from under them by the tide which flowed in from Spain. The native of the forest was deprived of his freedom, and made to toil for his new master. Then, too, sprung up a philanthropist, who claimed for the Indian an equal rank in creation with the inhabitants of Spain. His claim was admitted, and Africa mourned over the mistake, and her deepest curses may still be uttered against the memory of Las Casas. But, Mr. Chairman, although I do not believe that this principle of equality can be applied to man in extenso, yet I love it, and admire it as an abstract truth, and will carry it into operation whensoever I can; and, sir, I call on gentlemen to lend me their aid in the present instance. If we cannot raise the black man up to the level with the white—and that we have not the constitutional power to do so none here have denied—let us raise, at least, the white man up to this level. Extend an equality of rights to the people of Missouri. Place them upon a footing with the people of New York, Connecticut, and of the other States. What are the rights of the people of Connecticut and the other States? They have the right to alter, to amend, to abolish their constitutions. Connecticut has lately done so. Will you deny to the people of Missouri this right? You say to the people of New York, alter your constitution as you see fit in all its parts. Will you say in the same breath to the people of Missouri, you shall not exercise this right in regard to your constitution? Is this your boasted equality? If it be, sir, "I will have none of it." It is base coin, and will not pass current. This is said, too, to be a parental care for Missouri. I am pleased with plain and simple illustrations: would a father act in the way in which you propose to act? His child has attained the age of twenty-one; by the laws of society that child is entitled to an equality of rights with himself; and what would you think of the parent who should say to the child, "Sir, you are now a man, but you shall not exercise the rights of a man, except upon conditions?" Would the child submit? Would a kind parent hold such language? No, he would resort to advice; would adopt the course which is recommended by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. Foor,) in a resolution which he has presented. If he pursued any other, he would be pronounced arbitrary and cruel. Let us avoid such an imputation. Missouri is now full grown; this, your offspring, has attained full age; attempt no longer to trammel her; let her set up for herself, and, although you may advise her, do not attempt to force her. Sir, she will not, and ought not, submit to force; she would disgrace her parent stock if she did so. The proud Roman spirit which inhabits every portion of this country, spurns control. Would you humble this spirit if you could? If you would, you cannot do it; but if you could, your country would have no cause to thank you for so doing.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) who addressed us some days since, has attempted a distinction between the old and new States; and, in the first place, he tells us that the old States are creators of the Constitution, and that the new States are its creatures. Where would this argument stop? Would it not apply with equal force to the last and present generation, as to the old and new States? And yet the gentleman would scarcely contend that one generation of men were possessed rightfully of more political power than another. Are not our rights the same as those of our predecessors, although they originated the very Constitution under which they are now assembled? But, sir, this Constitution is the creature also of the new States. They support it by their influence: they, equally with the old States, have the power to amend, to alter, to abolish it. The creature, then, is armed with power over the creator. The answer to the argument proves its fallacy. Government, whenever it may have originated, by whomsoever created, receives from each succeeding generation of men a new being; not by an open and express act, but by implication. If it remains unaltered, it is owing to the implied assent which is given to it by the community on whom it operates. So, sir, this Constitution is but the creature of the new States as well as the old, liable to their amendments, and continued only as the creature of the common will. But the same gentleman tells us that we have an interest in the soil of the new States which we have not in the old. That we have more soil in the new States than the old, is certainly true. But the powers of this Government over its dock-yards, arsenals, depots, &c. in the old States, are equally great, if not much greater, than its powers over its undisposed-of territory in the new States. Nay, by the Constitution itself, your power is absolute over the property in the old States, whereas it is but limited in regard to that in the new. In regard to the last, you are limited to "needful rules," to enable you to sell or dispose of it; in regard to the other, you are almost unlimited in your power. There is nothing, then, in these distinctions; they are but imaginary. All the States are equal in political rights. The member who shall come from Missouri will be invested with equal rights with a member coming from New York.

The honorable member from Pennsylvania has imagined, that he has found the right to impose this condition on Missouri in the supposed right to make a compact with a State, or with the people of a territory. I will not stop to inquire into the full extent of this right. For the sake of the argument let it be admitted that this right does not exist in Congress; yet what does it prove? In my opinion, nothing. What will the gentleman do with the treaty of 1803? By that treaty we have stipulated, that "inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be admitted into the Union as soon as possible." The right to admission then, on the part of Missouri, is perfect, is absolute. Can you, in any manner, destroy this perfect right? Can you, by the right which you have to enter into a compact, destroy a perfect right, on the part of Missouri, to admission? No, sir. She has a right to admittance; you cannot gainsay it, nor can you destroy it. Let her come into the Union, and then we will inquire whether you can enter into a contract for political power. She will then be a free agent, no longer in duress. The compact which you then make may be obligatory on her. Sir, I cannot withhold the expression of some astonishment at a remark made by the honorable gentleman. He told us that, sooner than admit Missouri, without restriction, he would narrow her boundaries; nay, that he would cut her in twain; that he would divide her into two small States; but that, if she accepted this condition, he had no objection to her present boundaries. What language is this to hold to Missouri? Excitement enough already prevails among her inhabitants, and this declaration, instead of appeasing, is calculated to swell it to a flood. You have given her every assurance that she should be admitted with her present limits. Last year you carved out from her the Territory of Arkansas; you marked out her limits; you held out to her every reason to believe that she should come in as one and indivisible; and now what language is held by the gentleman from Pennsylvania? These fond hopes are to become illusory. These anticipations were calculated but to deceive. Your right arm shall be lopped off from your body—your family compact be broken up, unless you yield to a dictatorial policy, and throw yourself at the foot of Congress, bound and fettered. Does this comport with magnanimous policy? Believe me, it does not. No, sir, let us resort to different means. Extend the great engine of redress. This will secure to you the affections of the people—that engine that tyrants know nothing of—that a parental government only applies. Use it, and the storm will be appeased; all will again be harmony and peace. The same gentleman has told us of the obligations under which his State labors. We have had read to us her act of emancipation. She has caused to be proud of that act. It has raised to her a monument of imperishable glory. But, suppose Pennsylvania in the attitude of Missouri—reverse the picture: Pennsylvania is asking admittance into the Union; and suppose she should be told, “the slaveholding States have now the majority, and you cannot be admitted as a member of this Confederacy, unless you will repeal this your act, and permit involuntary servitude.” What would be her course? Would she not spurn us and our propositions? Nay, would she not dash them in our teeth? What more she would do, it is not for me to say. She would demand for herself the right to decide for herself. But now that she cannot be controlled, will she overleap the principles, which, under other circumstances, would actuate her? Not satisfied with legislating for herself, shall she venture to legislate for others? I still hope not. I do still hope that we shall do equal justice, and obey that great rule of morality, and “do to others as we would that others should do unto us.” And can there be a more conclusive argument against the right to exercise this power than the case which I have supposed? This Constitution was not made for a day; nor is it composed of such flexible materials as to be warped to the purposes of a casually ascendant influence. Under the arguments of gentlemen, this, however, is not its character. If the slaveholding States have the majority here, they may annex conditions on new States the reverse of that now attempted, and such conditions would be abrogated by a majority of a different description. In this contest for power, countenanced, as has been urged, by the Constitution, what becomes of the rights of the inhabitants of the territories? I take on me to rescue the framers of the Constitution from such gross inconsistencies. They proclaimed the doctrine, that man had a right to establish such government as best suited his own ideas of happiness; and they would have overthrown that very proposition, if they had armed Congress with the power of making constitutions for the new communities, which, they obviously perceived, would spring up within our territorial limits.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) has inquired, Is the right to hold persons in bondage essential to sovereignty? I answer this question by asking others. Is the trial by jury essential to sovereignty? Is the habeas corpus, are Parliament and Congress, essentially necessary to constitute a State sovereign? No one doubts the sovereignty of Russia, or of the Ottoman Porte; and yet, no trial by jury, no habeas corpus act, no Parliaments or Congresses, are known to these empires. A State can be sovereign, and yet all the power be lodged in the hands of a single despot. In what, then, does sovereignty consist? In nothing but the right to decide whether there shall or shall not exist this or that municipal regulation. Deny to an empire the volition of deciding for itself any question of local policy, and you necessarily, so far as the prohibition extends, deprive it of its sovereignty. The State must be left complete volition, or otherwise it is a misuse, not to say abuse, of terms, to call it sovereign. So, sir, if this restriction prevail, you may call Missouri what else you please, but she is not sovereign. If she accepts this condition, she may be the menial of the other States, but she is neither equal to them, nor, like them, sovereign. Sir, the same gentleman has urged that the principles of our Government are opposed to slavery. And one reason which has led him to the adoption of this opinion is, that the word “slave” is nowhere used in the Constitution. This is a broad proposition, and, if true, none of us in the Union have any security for any article of our property. Is any other sort of property mentioned, in totidem verbis, in the instrument? And, if this argument of the gentleman be possessed of any force, where shall we look for security? Sir, although it would be rather unreasonable to suppose that a constitution should guaranty articles of property by name to those who lived under it, yet, so far as was deemed necessary, our slaves are guarantied to us in that clause which requires persons, held to service in one State and escaping into another, to be delivered up to the master. When, then, gentlemen from the North proclaim their doctrine, let them not forget themselves. Rail at slavery as much as you please; I point you to the Constitution, and say to you, that you have not only acknowledged our right to this species of property, but that you have gone much further, and have bound yourselves to rivet the chains of the slave. You not only have consented to tolerate it, but more—when the victim has fled to you for protection and countenance, you have agreed to deliver him over to his bondage. Those who framed this Constitution were sound practical men. They were not led away by idle theories. They knew how to estimate the slaveholding States. We had just then emerged from an arduous struggle for freedom, in which, without union among the whole, no part could have succeeded. Each made sacrifices to the good of the whole, and we have experienced the happy result of such sacrifices. But, can it be credited that the slaveholding States ever would have become parties to this compact, if they had not supposed themselves secured in this species of property? Thus to pronounce, would be to overlook that great and almost exclusive motive to human action, self-interest.

Gentlemen, abandoning the grounds taken by them in the opening of this debate, rely wholly on the article in the Constitution which devolves on Congress the right to admit new States. On this point I shall not dwell. I only require of them to read the whole clause, and they will find that the admission must be into “this Union.” You have already been told, by the member from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) that “this Union” is made up of equal contributions of power by all the States; and the inference would, therefore, seem irresistible, that no more than a similar contribution of power could be required of States who have been, or may hereafter be, admitted. Grant me your patience, sir, while I add one other consideration, which, to my mind, is conclusive. You have but one mode of acquiring power constitutionally, and that is, by amendments adopted by three-fourths of the States. Now, if you can impose conditions on new States, this remark is no longer true. Take the very case before you: Missouri accepts your condition, and, at a future day, thinks proper to repeal this clause in her constitution inhibiting the introduction of slaves; a man from Louisiana moves into that State with his slaves, and, immediately on getting there, the slaves apply for a writ of habeas corpus. In the States now existing, such a controversy, as well as all controversies arising between citizens of the State, are tried before the tribunals of the State. Not so in Missouri. The arm of your judiciary would be extended between the master and slave. You have, then, added to the powers of one great department of your Government, not in the Constitutional mode, but by your compact with Missouri. Can you do so? If there be any land-marks to guide us, or boundaries to our power, you cannot. The gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WHITMAN,) who, with great liberality, and much candor, addressed us on yesterday, asks whether we shall be presumed to be held to admit a new State without knowing aught of its internal police? To this I unhesitatingly answer in the negative. Our right is absolute to admit or refuse; but we may exercise this right at any time. In this case we have exercised it under the treaty of cession; nor did we do so heedlessly. Missouri was at that day a wilderness; and when we agreed that the whole of the country ceded by France should be admitted into the Union, "as soon as possible," we foresaw, what has actually occurred, that this territory would be settled by citizens of the United States. We then encountered no danger, nor should we now, by carrying into effect the stipulations of the treaty. But he contends that the treaty is not binding on us so as to compel us to admit a new State; that, if it be so, the President and Senate might, by treaty, compel us to admit St. Domingo, or any other Power, as a confederate in this Union. This argument only proves the control which this House has over the treaty-making power, and I readily concede that we are not bound by any treaty to which we have not assented. But to the treaty of 1803 we have assented in a variety of ways. This House voted money to carry it into effect; authorized the President to take possession of the country; opened land offices; established territorial governments; and, if acts can be interpreted to mean any thing, ratified and confirmed the treaty. It is too late, therefore, for gentlemen to urge such considerations. We have exercised our volition; our faith is pledged. If the faith of an individual was thus pledged, and he did not redeem his pledges—but, sir, I will say no more—the inference must be obvious to all.

We are threatened, too, with the curses of Missouri, if we do not impose this restriction. For one, I never was disposed to heap curses on the head of another, because, left a free agent, I might have involved myself in evil. Missouri has to decide for herself. The evils, if any arise, will be the offspring of her own act, and she cannot blame us. Sir, we have heard much of the evils of slavery: its evils have been exhibited in the most glowing colors. With due deference to gentlemen, I think their remarks on this subject would answer a better purpose if addressed to Missouri, assembled in convention, than addressed to us. The people of this Territory have "the bane and antidote" both before them. Let gentlemen deliver their speeches against slavery there; let them there send their pamphlets. If they have on the minds of the people to whom they should be properly addressed their desired effect, we shall submit. Yes, sir, if Missouri, in the exercise of her high attribute of sovereignty, shall speak the language of emancipation to those who are in bondage within her borders, we shall be satisfied. It is the principle alone for which we contend, and for it we shall persist in contending, "to the last syllable of recorded time." Nor can I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WHITMAN,) that those who support this restriction are the only friends to Missouri. I think (if I may be allowed so to express myself) that gentlemen have a bad way of showing their friendship. You may take up a man who is walking the streets, going in pursuit of his ordinary business, and throw him into irons, for fear lest he should fall into a gulf in the course of his walk, and then proclaim yourself his friend! He would have a right to answer as Missouri will on this occasion. He will tell you, "I am well aware of what I am about; I see the whole ground as well as yourself; and it would be as reasonable for me to throw you into chains, to prevent you from doing yourself an injury, as that you should arrogate this power over me." I shall add no more to the inquiry growing out of the constitutionality of this measure. Enough has already been said, and I will not consume your time unnecessarily. My mind is irresistibly drawn to the conclusion that, if we adopt this amendment, we shall be guilty of an unwarranted and most manifest usurpation of power.

But, even if we were invested with the Constitutional power to impose this restriction, yet to do so would be unjust and impolitic. This Territory has been purchased out of the common purse: the South and the North have contributed alike. We are then joint tenants in the estate, and, without doing an act of gross injustice, you cannot oust us of our right to an equal participation with yourselves in all its benefits. But the injustice of the measure is still more manifest in reference to individuals from the South who have made purchases of land with a view of settlement. You opened this country to bidders from all the States. The planter from the South entered the market; and now, when he is in the very act of moving on the estate thus acquired, Congress announces its determination to prevent his completing the very object of his purchase, by preventing him from carrying with him his laborers! Is this just? Will you not have "paltered with him in a double sense?" Nay, he derived assurances from the treaty; and not only so, but from the fact of Louisiana having been admitted unrestricted, that he should experience no interruption in executing his purpose. Such a course does not comport with propriety and justice. Gentlemen should have issued their proclamation before the Territory was settled—a course however which, even in regard to an unsettled territory, I should deny to be Constitutional—and distinctly announced their views and intentions, and then men would have acted with their eyes open. This usurpation then would at least have been attended with the semblance of justice; but now, when you have invited purchasers, to draw a line of distinction between them, cannot be any other than unjust and, I was about to add, grossly unjust. I might rest satisfied here, and avoid any further remarks on the policy of this measure; for, if it comport not with the principles of justice, an American Legislature surely will not entertain it. But its impolicy is rendered manifest by many other considerations. We come here to legislate for the Union. One moiety of the Union is deeply interested in opposing this restriction. Slavery has been represented on all hands as a dark cloud, and the candor of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WHITMAN) drove him to the admission that it would be well to disperse this cloud. In this sentiment, I entirely concur with him. How can you otherwise disarm it? Will you suffer it to increase in its darkness over a particular portion of this land until its horrors shall burst upon it? Will you permit the lightnings of its wrath to break upon the South, when, by the interposition of a wise system of legislation, you may reduce it to a summer's cloud? How is the North interested in pursuing such a course? The man of the North is far removed from its influence: he may smile, and experience no disquietude. But, exclude this property from Missouri, by the exercise of an arbitrary power; shut it out from the Territories; and I maintain that you do not consult the interests of this Union.

The gentleman from Massachusetts also conceded that for which we contend—that, by diffusing this population extensively, you increase the prospects of emancipation. What enabled New York, Pennsylvania, and other States, to adopt the language of universal emancipation. Rely on it, nothing but the paucity of the numbers of their slaves. That which it would have been criminal in those States not to have done, would be an act of political suicide in Georgia or South Carolina to do. By this dispersion you also ameliorate the condition of the black man; for I appeal to gentlemen who come from the South to say, whether the bettering of the condition of the slave has not been owing to the increased demand for his labor? This increased demand has made it the interest of the master, independent of other considerations, to be more tender in his treatment to his dependants. These considerations and concessions on the part of the gentleman from Massachusetts, had led me to hope that his conclusions also would have corresponded with my own; but unfortunately he saw, or fancied he saw, humanity urging him to the extinguishment of the African slave trade.

Some slaves have certainly been smuggled into the State of Georgia, and possibly into Louisiana, in opposition to our laws. The number has not been accurately ascertained. The Speaker placed us in possession of information which limits the number to something upwards of four hundred in the last ten years. This estimate may be too small. Be that as it may, the feelings and sentiments of all honorable men must be opposed to that horrid traffic. We, sir, will go to almost any extremity to put an end to it. But, what did the gentleman concede? He told us that he limited his views, as a politician, to the period of one hundred years, and that the demand for slaves in the country in which slavery now existed, would not fully be satisfied for that period. Even then, if this restriction on Missouri prevailed, and you do not abolish this trade by a bold legislation, it will measureably continue for one hundred years. But the gentleman contends that, by opening Missouri, you open a new market, and thereby increase the price of this property, and that additional temptations to smuggling will be the necessary consequence. Now let it be remembered, that smuggling can only take place on the seaboard, and that Missouri is an inland State. - In addition to this, cast your eye on the map, and you will find that Missouri is in the same, or nearly the same, latitude with Virginia; a small portion of it, if any, is a cotton country. The products of its soil are the same with those in Virginia. Now, sir, no instance falls within my recollection of slaves being brought from abroad into Virginia—and why? For the obvious reason, if for none other, that a better market is opened for them in the cotton country. That rich staple of the most Southern State has, for many years, as was well observed by the Speaker, regulated the price of slaves. There has been a constant drain from Virginia; no demand exists for them there, of any great consequence. Our corn sells for little or nothing; our flour commands no price; and our tobacco, which, like cotton now, formerly regulated the price of labor, rots in our warehouses. Open Missouri then, and you do not, by so doing, enhance the price of the slave. The great body of those who go to that State will be farmers of the South, who will carry with them their white and black families, with a view of permanent settlement. I still entertain the hope then, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Massachusetts will be convinced that he was mistaken in the view which he was induced to take of this subject. A moment's reflection will also convince us that we do not, by extending this population, add to their numbers by any ordinary means. The great rule which controls the progress of the multiplication of the human species, and accelerates it, will equally apply for the next century, if no longer, whether Missouri throw open her gates or not. The means of subsistence are abundant in the present slaveholding country, and will continue to increase with an increase of population. You subserve then the purposes of humanity by voting down this amendment to the bill on your table—you advance the interest, and secure the safety of one-half of this extended Republic; you ameliorate the condition of the slave, and you add much to the prospects of emancipation and the total extinction of slavery.

What will be the consequences, if you persist in this measure? A sectional feeling is already generated; a geographic line is drawn. Tell me not of that policy which shall divide the people of this country by local feelings and prejudices. This is the bane of a Republic—it is the rock which ought to be most cautiously avoided—sir, it is the greatest of all dangers to the union of these States. Take not my poor word for it. Nay, disregard the admonitions of him who has so often been called the Father of his Country. Forget the valedictory address of WASHINGTON. But can you, or will you, close your eyes to the lights of experience? Remember ancient Rome: she conquered mighty Powers; the world obeyed her nod; but she, in the end, conquered herself. The people divided among themselves, and these divisions led to the erection of the Throne of the Cæsars over her prostrate liberty. So, too, with the Grecian republics: united Greece stood up successfully against the mighty power of Xerxes; and the fall of Leonidas was but the precursor of the glory achieved at Marathon and Plataea. But Sparta wished to domineer over Athens, and their intestine feuds opened the channel to that flood of vandalism which deluged Greece, and obliterated all trace of freedom. Such, too, was the fate of the Achaian league. I beseech gentlemen then to pause, lest they produce a similar division of sentiment in this happy land. What else can retard our onward march? What were you fifty years ago? By Europe we were esteemed as little better than savages; nay, dozing philosophers had ventured to pronounce that all animated nature here wore a degenerate aspect. But history has refuted and thrown back this slander in the teeth of those who uttered it. We emerged with great brightness from the struggles of the Revolution. Our prosperity continued to advance. We have emerged from a second conflict, with additional radiance. We bearded the Hercules of the other hemisphere, and we lost naught by the conflict. Our proud banners floated in triumph over the waves. What now is our condition? Kings and potentates court our amity. We are lifted up to a high station among the nations of the earth. Say that our march is not impeded, who can set limits to our glory? Tyre rose a little speck above the ocean, and she was considered strong and mighty. England, with an area scarcely exceeding that of some of these States, controls the destinies of Europe. And what shall be their glory, in comparison with ours? We direct the destinies of a mighty continent. Our resources are unlimited: our means unbounded. If we be true to ourselves, the glory of other nations, in comparison with ours, shall resemble but a tale from the days of chivalry. Our mighty and refulgent sun shall almost obscure, by its radiance, the little stars of their renown. Let us, then, avoid a question like the present: disappoint not these fond hopes. Gentlemen on the opposite side may yield without dishonor. They pursue but a scheme of policy; we are differently situated; we cannot, without violation of our oaths, support this measure. We believe, in our consciences, that the Constitution confers on us no such power. For myself, I cannot, and will not, yield one inch of ground. Let me, then, adjure our brethren from the North to come and sit down once more by our side. I call on them to heal the differences which this measure has produced. Your course is palatable and plain. You have two roads before you; take this, and all is harmony and peace; over that, hang doubts and fears. I invoke the Genius of the Constitution to cover and protect us against the evils which threaten us. What if you impose the restriction, and Missouri, instead of submitting, shall form herself into a community and demand admittance, or sever from the Union? Will you then retract? How much more honorable to do it now! Or, do you mean to persist in your object at all hazards, and, if she prove refractory, reduce her to submission? Do you believe that Southern bayonets will ever be plunged in Southern hearts? I know not how this may be, but I require you to pause and deeply to reflect before you have to resort to this extremity.

But, Mr. Chairman, if no admonition will succeed, then pursue your own course. Gentlemen may return to their constituents, receive votes of thanks, have their speeches translated into foreign languages, to be dozed over and admired by those who know nothing of the principles of our Government. But if evil flows from this measure, history will be true to herself, and will record, "That the United States were most fortunate and most contented; that no speck was seen on the horizon, threatening danger; that, while marching steadily on to the fulfilment of her high destinies, a proposition was made from the North, to abridge the rights of the South, in violation of the Constitution; that a storm suddenly arose, and in its fury blasted the hopes of the patriot, and overthrew the altar and the temple." And, sir, it is not necessary to add, that, instead of the blessings, the deepest curses of posterity will be uttered against the supporters of this destructive policy.

Mr. Rich, of Vermont, rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: Whilst I consider the present question of greater interest by far than any which has been agitated since the adoption of the Constitution, or any other on which I can expect it will ever become my duty to give a vote; and, while I reflect on some circumstances in relation to it, which to me are not a little extraordinary, I feel it to be due, both to the Committee and myself, that I should occupy a small portion of your time in explaining my views upon the subject, and my reasons for the vote I am about to give. The fact that, at the last session, every member south of the State of Delaware, and of the river Ohio, gave their votes in favor of an unlimited extension of slavery, while those to the north of those limits gave almost as unanimous a vote against it, has caused me to entertain fears that, either from motives of interest or some peculiar feelings, we had, on the one hand or the other, lost sight of the great principles on which a wise and just legislation is founded.

The circumstance, too, that a large portion of those now opposed to me are the same gentlemen with whom I have acted in times the most difficult and perplexing; whose opinions I have highly approved, and with whose votes my own have been usually recorded; has induced me to give the most attentive consideration to the subject, in all the forms in which it has been presented to my mind, lest it should happen that feelings, perhaps peculiar to myself, might have betrayed my judgment into an error. I have paused—I have considered, and made up my mind upon the most mature deliberation. It is not my intention, sir, to attempt to follow gentlemen who have gone before me, on the opposite side of the question; and, except so far as may be necessary to connect my views upon the subject, I shall endeavor to avoid a repetition of the arguments employed by others on the side I have the honor to advocate. It will be my purpose to attempt to show that slavery does not proceed from the exercise of a legitimate attribute of sovereignty, and that hence, admitting all for which gentlemen contend, as to a want of power in Congress to interfere with "State rights," their Constitutional objections must fail them. If, in this part of my argument I shall be successful, I trust there are few who will object to the expediency of the proposition.

Sir, it is impossible for me to consider slavery, in any of its relations or consequences, in any other light than hostility to the first principles of our Government, and certainly so with its first official act—the Declaration of Independence—which has announced, as a self-evident proposition, "that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, amongst which is life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness: that, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." And, among the reasons assigned by the framers of the Constitution for adopting that instrument, and which will accompany it to the latest period of time, was that of "securing to themselves and their posterity the blessings of liberty." And, sir, will it be pretended, in this enlightened age, and in this country, where alone freedom has her abode, that the blessings of liberty are to be derived from the existence of slavery, or that they have any relation to each other, except what results from absolute, unavoidable necessity?

It is true that, at the time the Declaration of Independence was adopted, as well as the Constitution, and from circumstances over which our fathers had no control, slavery, unfortunately, existed in our country; and the fact of its existence, though repugnant to the noble feelings which alone gave birth to, and with the aid of Providence sustained the Revolution, and which matured and brought forth the Constitution of our country, is believed to have produced a necessity for its continued existence. But I ask gentlemen by what charter of a national character, a right to hold a human being in slavery has ever been recognised?

The fact that the word "slave" is nowhere to be found in the Constitution, or other words so employed as to convey an idea that the framers of that instrument intended to recognise slavery, has satisfied my mind that, as from a condition of things beyond their control, or that of their country, they could not prohibit it in the then "existing States," and as, for obvious reasons, they were obliged indirectly to admit the fact of its existence, they purposely, and very carefully, avoided the use of any expressions from which, by fair construction, even an argument could be derived in favor of its legitimacy. Consequently, the legality of it must be determined by a reference to the laws of nature and natural rights, and not to the Constitution; and to me it is a matter of utter astonishment, that, because the original States were recognised with their existing institutions, some of which had been under an absolute necessity to permit slavery, it should from thence be contended that, on admitting a new State, we have no power to exclude slavery from it, on the ground of its having been recognised as an attribute of sovereignty over which we have no control.

Each State had its particular institutions and laws—no two of which were alike; and can it, I demand, be pretended that we are fatally bound, regardless of all consequences, to permit in every new State whatever may, under any circumstances, have been deemed lawful in any one of the original States? If such be the case, gentlemen will search in vain for authority to require from the people of a proposed new State that they should even present us with a Constitution; for, at least one of the original States had no such instrument.

It has not escaped me, that certain powers have been "delegated to Congress," and that such as "are not delegated or prohibited to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." But it should be remembered that, whatever powers may have been prohibited or reserved, they are such as belong to the legitimate attributes of sovereignty; and in order to ascertain them, as claimed and admitted by this nation, we should do well to refer to our original charter, on which all our other institutions are based—the Declaration of Independence. In that instrument individual rights, and the objects and duties of Government, are clearly defined. It was adopted in the most formal manner by the National Representatives, and to my understanding has, to all intents and purposes, been adopted by the people themselves. It has been incorporated in all their statute books; annually read at their national festivals; and universally referred to as the proudest memorial of their national glory; and will continue to be thus referred to, while science has an advocate, or liberty a friend. I would look, then, to that charter, to ascertain the rights of the people, and the duties of Government; and to the Constitution, to learn how the attributes of sovereignty have been distributed to the General and State governments, and the manner in which the duties of each, and those of the people, are to be performed.

The solemnity with which it was adopted, and the parties to it, should never be lost sight of. In that instrument the rights of the people, which were acknowledged to have been derived from their Creator, and to be equal and inalienable, were distinctly set forth; the abuses of the parent country, to whom allegiance was acknowledged to be due, but for the abuses, and the means employed to obtain redress were enumerated; the necessity for a separation was announced; and, "appealing to the Supreme Judge of the World for the rectitude of their intentions," the separation, and the consequent right of self-government, were proclaimed to a "candid world;" and "for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on Divine Providence, the lives, the fortunes, and the sacred honor of the nation" were mutually pledged. And who, I ask, will deny that the event was recognised by the Judge to whom the appeal was made, and that his protection was not relied upon in vain, and that, finally, he condescended to become a party to that great national covenant? And, sir, after having been protected from our infancy, until we have become a great and powerful nation, does it become us to disregard our own stipulations; and have we a right to expect that the favor of the Being to whom, in our infancy, the solemn appeal was made, will be longer continued to us, when we shall have falsified the declaration by a national act, deliberately pronouncing that all men are not "created equal," and that, as a matter of convenience, one may rightfully hold another, and his posterity, in perpetual bondage? I think not; but that, on the contrary, it will be said of us, as of the people of old, "I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me;" "they have spoken words, swearing falsely in making a covenant; thus judgment springeth up, as hemlock in the furrows of the field."

The attributes of sovereignty, individual rights, and the duties of Government, have neither been enlarged, diminished, nor changed by the adoption of the Constitution. By that instrument nothing more has been done or attempted than to adjust and settle the relative rights and duties between the General and State governments, and the people; and I again repeat, that, in order to ascertain the amount of the attributes of sovereignty, individual rights, and the duties of governments, we must refer to the covenant we have made with the Judge of the Universe. And I moreover contend, that a right to hold a fellow-being in slavery, under any form of Government, does not exist. I speak, sir, of natural right; for, if it exist anywhere, there is no country or place where it does not exist; and, instead of its being a violation of our rights for the States of Barbary, and the commanders of British ships, to enslave our citizens, the former, because they are christians, and the latter, because they are of a certain profession, we have been guilty of a gross violation of their rights in making war upon them for the alleged offence; and, instead of the Declaration of Independence being an instrument honorable to our fathers, and deserving the place we have given to it upon the records of our country, it is a stain upon our national character, and reproachful to the citizens of the universe.

Both governments and people have rights which result from necessity alone—either may rightfully take the life of a citizen in cases of necessity; but, where there is no necessity, the right is denied; and there are various other cases where the existence of rights depend upon some necessity. That, when the Constitution was adopted, there was a necessity for slavery, to a certain extent, and that the necessity still exists, I do not deny; nor do I pretend that Congress has authority to judge of the necessity, or of the right, in any of the original States, or such as have since been adopted, without restrictions, either express or implied; but I utterly and absolutely deny that, because the necessity still exists in some sections of the Union, and with it the right, that hence the right is co-extensive with the limits of our country, and with any limits, which, at all future periods, may be given to it; and that we are bound to pursue a policy which will perpetuate the necessity, and with it the existence of slavery.

By the 4th section of the 3d article of the Constitution, the United States are bound to "protect" each State against "domestic violence;" and I take it for granted that none are so tenacious of "State rights" as to hold them bound to the performance of a duty, and deny to them the necessary power; and, should the power be granted, I shall not expect to hear it urged that we have no power to guard against the happening of the violence from which the States are to be protected; and, if it be admitted that we have power for this latter object, I will refer gentlemen to the last clause of the 8th section of the 1st article of the Constitution, where they will find authority given "to pass all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers."

If, then, it be true, that there is danger of domestic violence from the existence of slavery, which I am confident none will deny, I should apprehend that a law, the object and certain tendency of which is to diminish the relative number of slaves in our country, and spread a free white population over the fairest portions of it, must not only be proper, but indispensably necessary, to guard against the occurrence of violence, and preserve the United States in a condition to discharge its duties. All admit that slavery is an evil; and I contend that its extension over the boundless regions of the West, would be an extravagant and unnecessary extension of an evil which must affect every section of the Union, and every class of the community; and, if thus extended, an evil from which our innocent posterity will never escape. But we are told that, be the evil what it may, Congress has no power which it can exercise over the subject. And, sir, is it true that, in one-third of a century from the adoption of the Constitution, we have made the unfortunate discovery that an evil may threaten our existence, and one too which the people, who have not the means for making a united effort, cannot overcome, and yet Congress, which alone has power to prescribe the national policy and direct its energies, may look on and weep for the calamity, but cannot extend the arm of relief, because the wisdom of our fathers was not sufficient to provide for the exigency? Long, very long, sir, will be the period that will have elapsed before I shall have come to that conclusion.

If it can be demonstrated that a right to hold a human being in slavery beyond its necessity, is among the legitimate attributes of sovereignty, and that slavery is not an evil, I shall cheerfully yield the ground to those now opposed to me; but until this shall be made to appear, I shall adhere to my positions, and shall contend that, as in every country, a right to guard itself against impending dangers must somewhere exist; and as in this country, and upon this subject, it is impossible for it to be exercised with effect, but by the General Government, we ought, on this occasion, as does the honorable Speaker, and many others, now opposed to me, when on the subject of internal improvements, "give such an enlarged and liberal construction to the Constitution," as will enable us "to provide for the common defence and general welfare," in the best practicable manner, while no attribute of sovereignty shall be thereby infringed.

Hitherto, slavery has not been so recognised by the General Government, as to cause our national character to be materially affected by it; for, although there are States in the Union which, from the necessity of the case, may be termed slaveholding States, it cannot, with truth, be alleged that, as a nation, we have permitted slavery. But if, under present circumstances, Congress shall solemnly decide that it cannot restrain the unlimited extension of it, and that a want of power to do so results from an unqualified recognition of it by the Constitution, our national character will become identified with it; and instead of its being considered, as heretofore, a local malady, and susceptible of cure, it must henceforth be regarded as affecting the whole system, and past the hope or possibility of a remedy. Permit me then to express a hope that gentlemen will yet find it consistent with their views of the Constitution and the best interests of their country to join with us in limiting an evil which cannot at present be removed; and that we may continue our united efforts to cause the blessing which naturally results from the labors of our fathers, to be universally felt and acknowledged; while evils, which are local in their nature, and which cannot be diminished by dispersion, may be made to continue local till removed, and our national character thereby preserved.

Could I feel certain there would be no accession to the present number of slaves, other than by procreation, uninfluenced by an extraordinary demand, a question, differing very widely from the present, would be presented for my decision. But, sir, we must take men and things as they are. Permit it, then, over the boundless regions of the West, and the time will not only never arrive when slavery can be extinguished, not even with the universal consent of the masters, but the absolute certainty that the scenes which have been acted at St. Domingo will, at some period, be acted in this country—will, to my mind, be established beyond a doubt; for "the justice of the Almighty cannot sleep forever," nor has he any "attributes which could take sides with us in such a contest." And I will here remark, that, although this nation is not chargeable with the original introduction of slavery, yet, unless it shall employ all practicable means to ameliorate its condition, and finally extinguish it, we must, in the view of Heaven, of reason, and common sense, be regarded as trespassers from the beginning, and held answerable for all the direful consequences.

The increase by procreation is capable of being extended almost without limits; and, until man shall cease to make merchandise of his fellow, it will extend with the extension of demand; and you may pass what laws you will against the importation, employ, if you please, the whole Army and Navy of the country to enforce them, and yet, if the demand be great, the unfortunate Africans will be torn from their country, and, with thousands of the American free blacks, doomed to supply the demand. All our experience proves, that wherever there is a demand for a commodity, it will be supplied; and, if the demand cease, the commodity will disappear. It is by limiting the demand, then, and by that alone, that I can look with the smallest degree of confidence, to a period when slavery and its miseries and misfortunes shall cease to exist, or our country rendered safe against some dreadful catastrophe.

I admit, that to limit the demand, will affect the value of that species of property, (if such gentlemen will call it,) so far as its value depends on its convenience as an article of merchandise; and so far also, as a right of property can exist in unborn millions of the human race. But I submit to the candor and good sense of that portion of my fellow citizens who are possessed of it, whether they can reasonably require from us, that we should keep open an unlimited demand, at the expense of our national character, as we believe; in opposition to the influence of religion, and the dictates of humanity; and in a total disregard for the perpetuity of our institutions, and the happiness of all succeeding generations?

I certainly feel no disposition to confine the present slave population within so narrow limits as to render their miserable condition more miserable; and when the country between Pennsylvania on the north, the Gulf of Mexico on the south, the Atlantic on the east, and the Ohio, the Mississippi, and the western boundary of Louisiana, on the west, or so much of it as shall continue to permit slavery, a large portion of which is yet a wilderness, shall become so populous as to render an extension necessary, either for the happiness of the slave or the safety of the master, I would then, and not till then, agree to its extension. But I never can consent, under any circumstances, to give my aid in furnishing new facilities for acquiring and perpetuating a property in human beings.

I have purposely omitted to urge the expediency of the proposition, as enforced by a consideration of the agonies, the sighs, the floods of tears, which accompany even the domestic traffic in slaves; a traffic, in which the most endearing ties, incident to human nature, are broken up, and forever dissolved; a consideration which, with me, has an irresistible influence. But, gentlemen will perceive that it must be extremely unpleasant to dwell upon it here. I shall, therefore, pass it by, with simply reading a short extract from a Virginia paper, the Norfolk Herald. It is true that the article in question was not published for the purpose of informing the present or future generations, of the cruelties which accompany the traffic, but to describe such as were practised by the late enemy, in capturing and carrying away slaves; still, if they are correctly described in the one case, I apprehend a true picture is presented of such as result from the other.

"To take cattle, or other stocks, would be consistent with the usages of civilized warfare; but to take negroes, who are human beings—to tear them forever from their kindred and connexions, is what we should never expect from a Christian nation, especially one that has done so much to abolish the 'slave trade.' There are negroes in Virginia, and, we believe, in all the Southern States, who have their interests and affections as strongly engrafted in their hearts as the whites; and who feel the sacred ties of filial, parental, and conjugal affections, equally strong, and who are warmly attached to their owners and the scenes of their nativity. To those no inducements which the enemy could offer would be sufficient to tempt them away; to drag them away, then, by force, would be the greatest cruelty. Yes, it is reserved for England, who boasts of her religion and love of humanity, to practise this piece of cruelty, so repugnant to the dictates of Christianity and civilization."

And, I ask, sir, if "this piece of cruelty" is not every day practised by men claiming to be American citizens, in the prosecution of the domestic trade?

A regard for the morals, the manners, and the industry, of "endless generations proceeding from us," must also forcibly urge the expediency of the proposed measure; but I doubt whether this is a suitable time and place to enter upon the discussion of this branch of the subject. Should any gentleman wish for information in regard to it, I will refer him to one, than whom none is better qualified to give it. Let him go to our library, and consult the venerable Jefferson; there he will learn the opinion of that enlightened statesman and philosopher upon this interesting subject, and there he will behold him "trembling for his country, while he reflects that God is just, and that his justice cannot sleep forever; that, considering nature, numbers, and actual means only, a revolution in the wheel of fortune, a change of situation, is among possible events, and may become probable by supernatural interference." Let him learn from him, also, the "execrations" with which "the statesman should be loaded, who, permitting one-half of the citizens thus to trample on the rights of the other, transforms those into despots, and these into enemies; destroys the morals of the one part, and the amor patriæ of the other." And I ask him, then, to inform me, whether we can be held guiltless, if we permit a state of things, which Congress alone has the power to prevent, the undeniable tendency of which must be, to perpetuate slavery to the latest period of time, or extinguish our innocent posterity from the earth; remove from its foundations the noble edifice which has been reared by the hands of our fathers, and cemented with their blood; and annihilate the cheering prospects of the philanthropists in every quarter of the world, who have looked, with enraptured delight, to the great results anticipated from the influence of our example.

Mr. Chairman, to the remarks already offered, and to which I have been honored with the patient indulgence of the Committee, I will only add, that it is impossible for any one to regret more sincerely than myself the difference of opinion which exists upon this subject; a regret which is exceedingly augmented by the circumstance, that gentlemen, coming from nearly equal moieties of the Union, are, almost to a man, arrayed against each other; and from one, composing nearly the half of this body, it is believed without a dissentient; a circumstance calculated to induce an apprehension that one or the other of the great divisions have either lost sight of the Constitution or the best interests of the country, and possibly both. Nothing, I am sensible, can be more prejudicial to the happiness and prosperity of this nation than local, sectional jealousies, either among the people or members of the Government; jealousies which, on former occasions, the utmost of my powers have been employed to prevent, and not, as I believe, without some success. The same efforts, sir, will be continued; but, if gentlemen shall insist on a right to spread a slave population over any portion of this country, in which the few inhabitants, who may be there at a given period, will yield their assent, and if they shall continue, to the extent of their powers, to enforce their supposed rights, regardless of the will of the great majority of the free citizens of the nation, whose lives and fortunes are pledged for its safety, I cannot flatter myself that, in future, my efforts will be crowned with their usual success. For I have no reason to expect that it is possible to effect such a revolution in the minds of men unaccustomed to a belief that slavery is ordained by God, as to procure their assent to the existence of such a right, and that they are bound to submit, without a murmur, to all the evils resulting from its unlimited exercise.

If, instead of pursuing a policy which, in my judgment, will fasten slavery upon our country beyond the hope of relief, except by some dreadful convulsion, and even render that certain, and the issue doubtful, gentlemen will commence the work of providing for its gradual decline, by prescribing bounds to it, and in whatever other manner which shall be fair and practicable, they may be assured of my co-operation to the extent of my powers; and, if necessary, I would consent that the proceeds of all the public lands be applied to that object. I would even go further: I would mortgage the premises on which I live, and which have been rendered dear to me from circumstances that I have there, by the successful influence of my example, taught my sons to cultivate the earth, while my daughters have been instructed in the manufacture of clothing for themselves and brothers, extending even to those I have now the honor to wear, and in the useful labors of the kitchen.* But if, in place of this, gentlemen shall require an admission from us, that a right to impose involuntary servitude upon endless generations of the human race, has been recognised by our fathers as an attribute of sovereignty, over which we have no control; or, that we should now sanction the principle by a national act, and thus put it out of the power of our descendants to secure to themselves a safe and happy condition, we have no alternative left but to continue our efforts to preserve what we believe the best interests of our country, in the manner proposed. In default of which posterity would weep for our weakness and want of regard for their welfare.

FRIDAY, February 18.

Mr. TYLER presented a memorial of the "Virginia Society for promoting Agriculture," in opposition to the several petitions and memorials which have been presented to Congress at the present session, for additional duties upon the importation of foreign manufactured goods, by way of protection to the manufacturing interest of the country; which memorial was referred to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill regulating the payment of duties on merchandise imported, and for other purposes.

Mr. BEECHER presented petitions from sundry inhabitants of the State of Ohio, praying that provision may be made whereby a part of the money drawn from them, for the payment of their lands, may be expended among them towards the internal improvement of the country; and that an extension of credit may be allowed to those indebted to Government for the purchase of lands.—Referred.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act confirming Anthony Cavalier and Peter Petit in their claim to a tract of land," made a detailed report thereon, recommending the passage of the said bill.

Ordered, That the said bill be read a third time on Monday next.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee of Claims, also made report on the petition of Jacob Konkopot and others, of the nation of Stockbridge Indians, residing in the State of New York, accompanied with a bill for their relief; which bill was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the report of the same committee on the case of William Henderson.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of this House, entitled "An act for the admission of the State of Maine into the Union," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. SMYTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of the Reverend Aaron J. Booge, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petition of Aaron J. Booge, late a Chaplain in the Army of the United States, praying that a law may be passed for appointing Chaplains to the Army, ought not to be granted."

The resolution was read and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. SMYTH, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Berryman Green, administrator of Samuel Kerby, deceased; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. Cook submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to report a bill allowing to each of the officers and privates, or their legal representatives, of the Illinois regiment, organized by the State of Virginia, for the reduction of the British posts northwest of the river Ohio, during the Revolutionary war, who have received no share of the land set apart by that State for that regiment, a quantity of land equal to the amount already received by a part of that regiment, and according to the principles upon which that allowance was regulated by the laws of Virginia.

Some conversation took place between Messrs. COOK and CAMPBELL, on this resolution, in which the latter proposed, and the former agreed, to modify the motion, so as to direct the committee to inquire into the expediency of the object, instead of instructing them to report a bill.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In conformity with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 24th January, 1820, requesting me "to inform the House what loans (if any) have been made since the peace, to private citizens, of powder, lead, and other munitions, belonging to the Government, by officers of any department of the Army or Navy; specifying the times, terms, objects, and extent, of such loans; the names of the persons by whom, and to whom, made; the different times of repayment, and also the amount of the ultimate loss (if any) likely to be incurred by the Government in consequence thereof," I now transmit a report from the Secretary of War, which, with the accompanying documents, contains all the information that can be furnished on the subject.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, February 8, 1820.

The Message and documents were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MEIGS, of New York, moved for the consideration of a proposition submitted by him, a few days ago, for making a certain appropriation of the public lands, (for the gradual abolition of slavery;) and was proceeding to assign reasons why he thought such a proposition ought to be adopted, when the Speaker suggested to him that, in moving for the consideration of any proposition lying on the table, it was not in order to debate it.

* When this subject was under consideration at the last session, the honorable Speaker remarked to the following effect: "If gentlemen will not allow us to have black slaves, they must let us have white ones; for we cannot cut our firewood, and black our shoes, and have our wives and daughters work in the kitchen."

H. OF R.

From this decision Mr. MEIGS appealed to the House; and, the question being put, the decision of the Speaker was affirmed by a large majority. The question was then taken, on Mr. MEIGS's motion, to proceed to consider his proposition, and decided in the negative, without a division.

THE MISSOURI BILL.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on this bill.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, rose and addressed the Committee, in a speech of more than three hours, against the right and expediency of the proposed restriction.

The Committee then rose, on the motion of Mr. PLUMER, of New Hampshire; and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, February 19.

Mr. CANNON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a statement of the whole number that have been educated at the Military Academy since its first establishment, from the District of Columbia, also, from each State and territory in the Union; the number now at said academy from the District, and from each State and territory, and the number that are now in the army or navy of the United States that have been educated at said academy, and the place or appointment each fills in said army or navy; also, the number now at said academy that are orphans of those who have fallen in defence of their country, or died in its service during the late war; and the district, State, or territory (if there are any) they are from; also, to state the whole amount, including pay, subsistence, and every other expenditure made by the General Government on account of said institution, from its first establishment up to the present time.

Mr. RICH suggested that a part, if not most, of the information called for by the resolution, had already been called for by resolutions of the House, of the last and present sessions, and was in part rendered; that a further report might be expected in a few days from the War Department, and until it was seen what part of the information required by the present motion should not be reported it had better lie on the table, which he moved.

Mr. CANNON and Mr. STEVENS opposed the motion to lay the resolution on the table, because, should the resolution repeat any call heretofore made, the Secretary would report such information only as should not have been previously required and rendered, &c.

The question to lay the resolution on the table was agreed to, 67 to 42.

MAINE AND MISSOURI.

The House took up the amendments of the Senate to the bill for the admission of Maine; which amendments propose to authorize, by the same bill, the people of Missouri to form a State government, without the slave restriction, but containing a clause to exclude slavery from all the territory west of the Mississippi which lies north of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude, except the proposed State of Missouri.

Mr. TAYLOR moved that the amendments of the Senate be disagreed to by the House.

Mr. SCOTT, of Missouri, moved that they be committed to the Committee of the Whole, which at present has under consideration the Missouri bill of this House—which motion had precedence of the motion to disagree.

On these motions, and those that are subsequently mentioned, a long and animated discussion took place, of which the following is scarcely more than an enumeration of the gentlemen who spoke, and an indication of the sides they respectively took.

Mr. HOLMES hoped the amendments would not be committed. If they were, it would be some time before they could be acted on, as there were, he believed, at least thirty speeches yet to be delivered on the restrictive proposition now before that Committee; and until that proposition was decided, the Committee of the Whole would not take up the amendments of the Senate: in the mean time, the period allowed by the law of Massachusetts (the 3d of March) for the consent of Congress to the admission of Maine would arrive, and all that had been done would be lost. He hoped, therefore, that the House would act promptly on these amendments; separate the two subjects, and give its consent to the admission of Maine, to which no one had objected, or could object, &c.

Mr. CULPEPER was willing to admit Maine unconnected with Missouri; but as they had been united by the other branch of the Legislature, the amendment ought to take the usual course, and be treated with that courtesy and respect which the source of the amendments entitled them to, &c.

Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia, for the purpose of allowing time for the debate on the restriction to be brought to a close before the amendments of the Senate should be taken up, moved that they be postponed to next Monday week; which motion was lost by a large majority.

Mr. S. then moved their postponement to next Monday; which was also negatived.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, was in favor of the commitment, because they would consume no more time if they took that course, which was usual and proper, than if taken up in the House, where they would be just as much debated, &c.

Mr. STROTHER was against an immediate decision of the amendments, and in favor of their commitment. The amendments contained new features, which required reflection; that proposing a compromise, for instance. These questions the House could not be prepared to decide at once, because its attention had been exclusively taken up in considering the restrictive question. It was not proper that the House should be driven into the instant decision of questions of such immense magnitude. He wished not any long period of postponement; but was averse to acting hastily, and without deliberation. Mr. S. spoke at some length to enforce and illustrate the opinions stated here in substance only.

Mr. LIVERMORE strongly disapproved of the connexion of the bills as they came from the Senate;

H. of R.

Admission of Maine and Missouri.

FEBRUARY, 1820.

but he saw something in the amendments which seemed likely to put an end to the disagreeable subject which now occupied the House. He wished the subjects separated, and then some course might be adopted similar to the compromise proposed by the Senate, and the matter ended happily and harmoniously. He argued earnestly in favor of the claims which Maine had to admission without delay, and against a course which would, by allowing the time to which she was limited to pass by, and thus her reasonable expectations be defeated. He deprecated the feelings of irritation which such an unkind course would produce in her citizens, &c.

Mr. WHITMAN opposed the commitment with much earnestness and at considerable length. He disapproved most pointedly and emphatically the connexion of the bills, and argued in favor of a prompt decision of the question. He felt as one personally interested, (being a member from the District of Maine,) and confessed that his feelings were stronger than he could find proper language to express them in, and he could scarcely trust himself to speak on the subject of the amendments.

Mr. STORRS observed that it was well known that no man was more in favor of a compromise of the unhappy subject than himself; but even this he would not agree to on compulsion. He was opposed to the commitment of the amendments; it would be of no utility, as the question now before the Committee would be first decided before the amendments would be taken up; and then a bill would have previously passed on the same subject. The subject of the amendments was a legal one, he admitted; but the object of the connexion was to coerce this House, by operating on those members particularly interested in the admission of Maine into the Union. This course he thought was disapproved by the House, and the proper way to show it was by a prompt, a very prompt, rejection of the amendments. Such was the course taken by the House on a former occasion, when an amendment was inserted in an appropriation bill by the Senate, providing for brevet pay, which the House had previously stricken out. Mr. S. repeated that he was in favor of the compromise, but he would not give up the right of giving a distinct and unshackled vote for the admission of Maine.

Mr. SIMKINS conceived it would be extremely wrong not to allow some time to reflect on this subject. The amendments were long, and contained numerous provisions, some of them of the highest importance. How were they to be understood from the single reading of them by the Clerk? He wished them to be printed, and time allowed to examine and consider them. He trusted that the majority, because they had the power, would not force members at once to decide on so important a matter without knowing scarcely on what it was they were to vote. The Senate had deemed the two subjects compatible, and had thought proper to join them: it was not proper by any means to ascribe improper motives to the Senate for so doing. Respect for the Senate required that their amendments should not be treated with so much precipitation and so little deference. He was in favor of the commitment.

Mr. GROSS, of New York, said he was glad of an opportunity of stating, in his place, what he thought of the conduct of the Senate in this affair; and proceeded to remark that he thought it did not deserve the respect of this House, but was stopped by the Speaker, as such expressions here, applied to the other branch of the Legislature were out of order. Mr. G. then remarked, that, come from where it might, the amendment was an attempt to coerce the members of this House, and he decidedly disapproved of it, &c.

Mr. WALKER, of North Carolina, made a few remarks in favor of the commitment, which were not at all heard.

Mr. MERCER supported the right of the Senate to annex any amendment to a bill from this House, and that the House had no right to know the motives of the Senate, merely from the prima facie evidence of the amendments. It was not proper to allude to them in debate, much less to impute improper ones to that body. The course adopted by the Senate in this instance was justified by the practice of the British Parliament, from which our rules of proceeding are drawn—instances of which Mr. M. mentioned. He could imagine very strong reasons, of the most honorable character, for the amendments of the Senate, but it was not right that he should advert to them; and he could not enter into the examination of views, such as had been imputed by others. If the proposition from the Senate be, as was believed, the olive branch of peace on the most momentous question that had ever agitated the councils of the nation since the foundation of the Government, was it proper thus to treat it? As to the case stated by Mr. STORRS, the present one bore no sort of analogy to it: that was a question on the right of the Senate to originate in a money bill a clause making an appropriation. In this case, if the proposition from the Senate should happily put to rest the divisions in the House, and heal the wounds inflicted throughout the nation by this question, they would deserve immortal honor.

Mr. SERGEANT was against the commitment, and in favor of an immediate decision on these amendments. Without speaking or acting improperly towards the Senate, respect for themselves required the House to act promptly. Mr. S. opposed the amendments at some length. One reason for it was, that the bill came with too much; they did not belong to the bill; it proposed to connect with Maine all the questions belonging to the Missouri subject, and, what was more, connected with Maine the question called a compromise. Could gentlemen seriously call this an amendment? They might call it what they pleased, but it would be just as proper to annex to it a pension law or a bankrupt bill, and call it an amendment. Whatever the object of this amendment, it would appear to have an improper end in view, and such would be its effect on the public mind, &c.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina was in favor of the commitment, and (as well he could be heard) spoke to show that the amendments were not improper; that the course taken by the Senate was not unusual or unnatural; and that, whatever the decision on them here, he doubted whether that body would recede.

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, opposed the commitment as useless, and argued to show that it would not save time; that it would be attended with inconvenience, without producing any benefit, &c.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky, spoke at considerable length, and very warmly, against the proposition to force members into an instant decision of this important question. He maintained the justice and fairness of allowing time for an examination of the amendments, and for preparation for a decision; and condemned strongly the attempt to coerce the House into an immediate vote on a subject so little understood and so important.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, was in favor of committing the bill, not because he was in favor of uniting Maine and Missouri, for he was decidedly opposed to the union; and if he supposed the commitment would retard the admission of Maine, he should be opposed to it; but this could not be the effect; it would be decided as soon as the question now under consideration could be. He had opposed the union of the bills when the subject was originally before the House; he was still opposed to it, because he deemed it a dangerous mode of legislation, and would vote to disunite them, whenever the subject should come distinctly before the House. But the union of Missouri with Maine was not the only amendment the Senate had made: they had introduced another of equal, if not of greater importance—that which prohibited the introduction of slavery into the Territories. He was in favor of this proposition; he presumed all the advocates of restriction would also be in favor of it. It was an amendment of vast importance, which might as properly be introduced into the bill for the admission of Maine as in one for the admission of Missouri, or in a distinct bill. It was because this was an important subject that he wished it to be duly weighed and considered. It also embraced the basis of a compromise, which had been adjusted in the Senate, after great deliberation. Desirous as he was of quieting public excitement, on some principle of compromise, he hoped time would be afforded to test its practicability. If Missouri should be stricken from the bill, this amendment, being a distinct proposition, would remain, and deserved to be considered. If he were now forced to vote upon the rejection of the amendments of the Senate, opposed as he was to the union of Maine with Missouri, he should be compelled to vote against both provisions, and thus aid in defeating a compromise which he was so anxious to effect. He hoped, therefore, that the bill would be committed.

The question was then taken on committing the bill and amendments, and decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

Earle, Edwards of North Carolina, Ervin, Floyd, Garnett, Hall of North Carolina, Hardin, Hooks, Johnson, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Kent, Kinsey, Little, Lowndes, McCoy, McCreary, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Kentucky, Mercer, Metcalf, Neale, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Overstreet, Pindall, Quarles, Rankin, Reed, Rhea, Ringgold, Robertson, Shaw, Simkins, Slocumb, B. Smith of Virginia, A. Smyth of Virginia, Smith of North Carolina, Strother, Swearingen, Terrell, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Walker of North Carolina, Warfield, Williams of Virginia, and Williams of North Carolina—70.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Baker, Baldwin, Ball, Bateman, Beecher, Boden, Brush, Buffum, Burton, Butler of New Hampshire, Campbell, Case, Clagett, Clarke, Cook, Crafts, Cushman, Darlington, Davidson, Denison, Dewitt, Dickinson, Dowse, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Fay, Fisher, Folger, Foot, Forrest, Fuller, Fullerton, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hazard, Hemphill, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Heister, Hill, Holmes, Hostetter, Kendall, Kinsley, Lathrop, Lincoln, Linn, Livermore, Lyman, Maclay, Mallary, Marchand, Mason, Meech, Meigs, R. Moore, S. Moore, Monell, Morton, Mosceley, Murray, Nelson of Massachusetts, Parker of Massachusetts, Parker of Virginia, Patterson, Phelps, Philson, Pitcher, Plumer, Rich, Richards, Richmond, Rogers, Ross, Russ, Sampson, Sergeant, Settle, Silsbee, Sloan, Smith of New Jersey, Smith of Maryland, Southard, Stevens, Storrs, Street, Strong of Vermont, Strong of New York, Tarr, Taylor, Tomlinson, Tompkins, Tracy, Upham, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Wendover, Whitman, and Wood—107.

Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia, then moved to lay the amendments on the table, and print them, that the House might at least see what it was called on to decide; which motion was also lost—yeas 77, nays 96.

The question recurring on the motion to disagree to the amendments—

Mr. SIMKINS moved that the amendments be postponed to Tuesday, and be printed; declaring that he was wholly unprepared at present to vote on the subject; and supported his motion in a speech of some length. The motion was assented to by Mr. TAYLOR, and supported by Messrs. RHEA, CULPEPER, STEVENS, STORRS, and BALDWIN; the last named gentleman, among other remarks, denying that the amendment called a compromise, could be called so with propriety, inasmuch as it was inconsistent with the Constitution, and the whole course of legislation for thirty years.

The motion to postpone was opposed by Messrs. WHITMAN, LIVERMORE, and HOLMES, because they were opposed to any delay, as it might endanger the fate of the Maine bill, which they desired to have separated from the other subject immediately, and disposed of as justice and fairness required.

The question being taken on postponing the bill to Tuesday, and printing the amendments, was carried by a large majority; and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, February 21.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Daniel Converse, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which bill was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole, to-morrow.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill altering the place of holding the circuit and district courts in the district of Ohio; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

The bill from the Senate confirming Anthony Cavalier and Peter Pettit in their claim to a tract of land, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. McCox moved the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. COOKE, of Illinois, on the 17th instant, in relation to the bounty lands lying in Illinois, promised by the State of Virginia to Colonel Clark's regiment, in the Revolutionary war. His motion to consider was lost by a large majority.

MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia, in pursuance of instruction from the Committee on Military Affairs, moved the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to cause to be prepared and submitted to Congress a system of regulations for the government of the Military Academy at West Point.

This proposition gave rise to some conversation. Mr. ANDERSON did not conceive it to propose a usual or proper course of proceeding; it was the duty of the President to execute the law, but of this House to devise and frame it, &c. Mr. CULPEPER expressed substantially the same sentiment. Mr. S. PARKER said the President had already, in a recent case, decided that the Academy should be under the government of martial law: if the Military Committee was of a different opinion, they ought so specifically to report. Mr. CANNON suggested that it might be found necessary to abolish this Academy—he being of that opinion; and he desired therefore a particular inquiry and report upon the subject by a committee of this House. Mr. LITTLE opposed the recommitment which was proposed; but wished to modify the proposition so as to call on the Secretary of War instead of the President, to report upon the subject. Mr. FOOT was in favor of recommitment, and expressed his wish for further information and inquiry on the subject.

The result was, that, on motion of Mr. RHEA, the proposition was recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to report to this House a system of regulation for the government of the Academy.

OUR AFFAIRS WITH SPAIN.

Mr. REID, of Georgia, submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to impart to this House any communications touching the Florida Treaty, which may have been received from our Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of Spain, which have not been heretofore communicated, [and which, in his opinion, it may not be inconsistent with the public interest to communicate.]

The concluding clause was adopted with the consent of the mover, on the suggestion of Mr. TAYLOR, of New York.

Mr. COCKE moved to extend the scope of the motion to communications from any other sources than our Minister in Spain.

Mr. REID objecting to the form of the proposed amendment, rather than to its object—

Mr. COCKE moved to lay the proposition on the table; which motion was carried, 65 to 62.

MISSOURI BILL.

The House then resumed, in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of this bill and the proposed amendment.

Mr. PLUMER, of New Hampshire, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman, there are many considerations which seem to me not only to justify, but to render necessary the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. TAYLOR,) to the bill now under discussion. Some of the most important of these I shall endeavor to explain to the Committee.

It will, I fear, be hardly thought respectful, at this late period of the debate, to inquire what it is that we propose to do by the bill on your table? Yet, a correct answer to this inquiry would, in my opinion, go far to prove that very many of the objections made to the amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman from New York, have little or no bearing on the real merits of the present question. This is by no means an unusual case. It will, I believe, be generally found that we err in our opinions principally because we do not understand ourselves; and that we differ from others principally because we do not understand them. What, then, is the real nature of this transaction? The people of Missouri have applied to Congress for leave to form a constitution, and to be admitted into the Union as an independent State. By the bill now under discussion, we are about to inform them, in answer to their memorial, what are the terms and conditions on which we are willing, at this time, to grant their request. The first of these conditions is, that the new State shall consist of a certain extent of territory, different from that proposed in their memorial, and different from that embraced within their present limits, and in both these respects differing from their request; the second is, that their constitution shall be republican; and the third, which is the object of the present amendment, that they shall prevent the further introduction of slaves, and that the offspring of those already there shall be free. These three conditions are made indispensable to their becoming, at this time, a member of the federal Union. Other terms are also proposed; but these are offered only as the price of certain other stipulations, into which it is desired that Missouri should enter. They are, by the same act, authorized to call a convention, to determine whether it is expedient for them, at this time, and upon these conditions, to become a member of the Union. If so, they are permitted to form a constitution, and are to be received, without delay, into our Confederacy.

This act, then, is simply an answer to the request of Missouri; and, without her consent and acceptance, it can have no binding force or effect on either party. If, when met in convention, her delegates should deem it inexpedient to accept our terms, there is an end, at once, of our act, and of all the measures growing out of it. Either party may propose new terms, or both remain in their present condition. We do not, therefore, as has been so often asserted in this debate, undertake to form a constitution for the people of Missouri; we do not impose upon them terms and conditions which are to bind them without their consent; nor do we, by this act, say that Missouri shall never be admitted, if she does not accept our present offers. We merely inform her on what conditions we are willing, at this time, to receive her into the Union. If she does not choose to accept them, we cannot, on our part, complain of her, because she has a right to reject our offers, and to remain a Territory if she pleases; nor can she complain of us, because it is universally conceded that we are under no obligation to admit her, at the present session at least, however we may be under the treaty, (a question which I shall presently examine,) at some future period. The first inquiry, then, is, can Congress propose this condition, and can Missouri accept it?

The right of Congress to admit new States is derived from the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution. "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." The first thing to be remarked in this clause is, that it is a delegation of power merely, and not a duty imposed. It is not said that Congress shall, but that they may admit new States. The power to admit is granted, but no right is given by the Constitution to any Territory to compel Congress, against their will, to exert this power in its favor. It is not said, that, when any of our Territories shall contain a certain number of inhabitants, 60,000 for example, Congress shall, whether they deem it expedient or not, admit them into the Union; but an authority merely is given, which they are to exert or not, according to their own sound discretion. It is next to be observed, that the power here delegated, is expressed in the broadest possible terms; and, that so far as this clause is concerned, it is altogether without limitation or control. It follows, from this view of the subject, that there are three questions which Congress may discuss, whenever a Territory asks admission into our Union as a State. First, is it expedient to admit her at all? If one of the South American provinces should ask admission, we should probably reject the application as inexpedient ever to be granted. If, however, our decision should be to admit, a second question would arise, as to the time when this should be done, whether now, or at some future day? But, in these two powers, which it is conceded on all sides that we possess, is there not involved a third; that of saying on what terms, not inconsistent with other parts of the Constitution, this admission shall take place? It might be expedient to admit, on certain conditions, a State, which we should be bound otherwise finally to reject. It might also be expedient, at the present time, to admit, on certain terms, a State, which, without this power, we should be obliged to suspend, till, by the influence of our laws, or by other causes, she should become accustomed to our manners, and assimilated to our political institutions. This interpretation of the Constitution is, therefore, equally beneficial to the Union, and to the Territories applying for admission.

But let us look again at this clause: "New States may be admitted, &c.; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, &c., without the consent of the Legislature of the several States concerned, as well as of the Congress." Here, then, is a limitation on the powers of Congress. When a State is to be admitted, formed within the limits of some other State, as in the case of Kentucky, or the more recent one of Maine, the consent of the parent State, as well as of Congress, is to be obtained; and this consent may be, and in all instances has been, granted upon conditions. In the first clause, then, the power to admit is given without limitation, and may, therefore, be exercised on such terms as the party consenting shall prescribe, and the State to be admitted shall choose to accept; but in the second, this power is limited, by requiring the agreement of a third party, which, like the two former, may insist on its own conditions. The limitation in the one case, and not in the other, shows clearly, that when the Constitution intends to restrain a general delegation of power, it does so in express words; and the inference is irresistible, that where the power is distinctly given, and no limitation is expressed, none was intended. The correctness of this very obvious rule of construction will not be denied, and it appears to me strictly applicable to the present case. To show this power, if possible, still more clearly, we need only refer to the Journal of the Convention that formed the Constitution. We there find that this clause, as originally proposed, (p. 80,) stood thus: "The Legislature shall have power to admit new States into the Union on the same terms with the original States." These latter words are not now to be found in the Constitution. It was proposed then to limit the power of Congress on this subject. That proposition was rejected by the Convention, and the power given in the broadest possible terms. I can hardly conceive a stronger case, and have heard of no answer attempted to this important fact.

To Congress, then, is given the power of admission in its full extent, and with all its incidents. What, Mr. Chairman, are these incidents? Suppose the States had reserved the right of admitting new members to themselves, instead of giving it, as they have done, to Congress: Can it be doubted that they might, in that case, have received into their Confederacy new associates, upon such terms and conditions as the contracting parties might see fit mutually to adopt? They surely might. And why, sir? Merely because they possessed the power of admission. But, instead of retaining this power, they have transferred it to Congress. If we do not possess it, where does it reside? Not in the States; for they have nothing to do in the admission of new members; nor in the people, as asserted by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDES,) who last addressed you. He did not speak with his usual accuracy when he said that the people, and not Congress, possessed the power to impose conditions on States about to be admitted into the Union. The people, sir, have reserved to themselves no such power, any more than they have reserved the power, for example, of declaring war. Their power to declare war they have transferred to Congress. Their power to admit new States, they have, in like manner, transferred to Congress; and we have seen that this transfer is entire, with all its incidents, subject only to that general reservation which applies to all delegated power—that it shall be exerted in a manner not repugnant to other parts of the Constitution.

This brings me, sir, to inquire what are the limitations imposed on Congress by the Constitution in the exercise of this power? And, first, “the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government.” They cannot, therefore, if they were so absurd as to wish it, prescribe to a new State that her form of government should be anti-republican, or monarchical; because the State, when admitted, would have a right to call on Congress for its guaranty of a different form. But this clause is not, as has been argued, an enlargement of the powers of Congress, but a limitation upon those powers; a stipulation in favor of the States, and against the General Government. “To guaranty” does not mean to create, or cause to be created; but simply to defend that which already exists. Yet Congress, to secure the existence of that, which, when established, they are bound to defend, have in every case made it a condition, in admitting new States, that their form of government should be republican. In the same clause it is also provided that Congress “shall protect each of the States against domestic violence.” Now, if their being bound to protect the States in the enjoyment of a republican form of government, authorizes them to make such a form the condition of their becoming States, why may not they, upon the same ground, under the latter clause, prescribe the exclusion of slavery as a condition? Slavery is sure ultimately to produce “domestic violence” wherever it exists. Foreseeing this, might not Congress say to a new State, we will not admit you, if you allow slavery to exist among you; because we shall be obliged, under this clause, at some future period, to protect you against “domestic violence,” arising from the insurrection and rebellion of your slaves? The right to anticipate and prevent an evil which they are bound, when it comes, to remove, is, in both cases, precisely the same; and, of the two evils, “domestic violence” is certainly much more likely to occur from the toleration of slavery, than an anti-republican form of government, for want of an express stipulation to exclude it. Let me not, however, be understood as deriving any power claimed in the present instance, from this clause of the Constitution; but to those who think that they derive from this section alone their right to prescribe a republican form of government, this view of the subject cannot surely be without some degree of weight.

There is another obvious limitation on the power of Congress in admitting new States, which results from the nature of the compact. New States must be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights and privileges derived by the original States from the Constitution; otherwise they would not be admitted into the same Union with the rest. No condition can, therefore, be annexed to the admission of a State, which takes from her any Constitutional, or, as it is more frequently called, any federal right, because this would be at variance with the admission itself, and, therefore, void; as in any other case of a condition annexed to a grant, inconsistent with the grant itself.

This is a limitation on the powers of Congress in favor of the new States. There is another, which may perhaps be inferred in reference to the old. Congress can propose no condition to a new State, which, if accepted by her, would transfer to the Union any power to be exercised over other States, which had not been granted by the Constitution to the General Government; because this would be to affect the political rights of third parties, without their own consent. And here, permit me to say, that this limitation furnishes, in my view, a conclusive answer to the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDES,) who, if I rightly understood him, founded his chief objection to this measure, on the supposed inability of Congress to acquire, by compact with new States, federal powers not conferred by the Constitution on the General Government, to be exercised over the other States; and thus, in effect, to alter the Constitution in a manner not provided for by that instrument. The soundness of this principle it is not necessary here to controvert, or even to examine; since it is totally inapplicable, in my view of the subject, to the present bill. This amendment does not require the people of Missouri to transfer any portion of their sovereignty, or to invest the General Government with any new authority, which they did not before possess, applicable to other members of the Confederacy; but only that they should renounce the power claimed for them, of making slaves of their fellow men. It is a renunciation of the power merely, and not its transfer, which is asked in this case.

Subject, then, to these just and natural limitations, I can see nothing dangerous or alarming in the power claimed by Congress on this occasion. They can, on the one hand, deprive the new State of no right or privilege conferred by the Constitution on the original confederates; and, on the other, can acquire for themselves no new power or authority, to be exerted over the other States, without their consent. When to this we add, that the terms proposed must, in all cases, be accepted by the new State, before they have any binding force; and that the supreme legislature of the Union acts for and represents the only other party in interest, the people of the United States, I can perceive no weight whatever in the argument, so earnestly pressed upon us from the other side, that this is a great and indefinite power, liable to abuse, and, therefore, not to be presumed to exist. Sir, an argument from the abuse of power is totally inapplicable, when the question is, whether we possess the power or not. What powers are more liable to abuse, than those, for instance, of making war and imposing taxes? Yet, no one will deny that, under the Constitution, we possess both these dangerous and indefinite powers. I have endeavored to show that the right here claimed is neither dangerous nor indefinite; yet, if it were both of these, this would be no proof that it was not conferred upon us by the Constitution; though it might have been an argument with the framers of that instrument for withholding it from us. They did not see fit, however, so to do, and for leaving this discretion in Congress, limited, as I have shown it to be, many good reasons might, I apprehend, be given.

There is nothing, surely, in the nature of a confederated republic, which renders it necessary for each member of the confederacy to possess the same State or municipal rights, any more than the same extent of territory, wealth, or population. Nor is it true, in point of fact, that they all enjoy the same privileges, or derive equal advantages from the Union. Who does not see that Delaware and Rhode Island, for instance, gain more from their connexion with the Union, compared with what they contribute to its safety or defence, than Massachusetts or New York? But neither the large States nor the small have any just reason to complain, if they enjoy all the rights and immunities for which they stipulated on their admission into the Union. It is the same with Missouri.

Acting for herself, by her own free will and choice, she will accept or reject the terms we propose. If she accepts, and thus makes them her own, she thereby becomes a member of our Union; she acquires rights which she did not before possess; obtains privileges which we are not, at this time, obliged to grant; and if, with good faith and fidelity, the United States perform toward her all the stipulations of the contract, of what can she complain? Whom has she to condemn? What right of her's has been violated? What privilege withdrawn? What immunity withheld? It is, then, the utmost perversion of language to say, as the honorable Speaker (Mr. CLAY) does, that, if she accepts these terms she becomes a vassal and a slave; or to argue, as he has, that this restriction is unjust, because it deprives her of the rights of self-government and internal police. For, where is the State in this Union which possesses these rights in their full extent? When we are told that Missouri will not have the rights of self-government, if she renounces the power claimed for her of depriving others of their right to freedom—not to animadvert here on the odious nature of the claim—is it not equally true, that all the other States are also deprived of the rights of self-government? Is it not an attribute of sovereignty—a right of self-government—to declare war, to enter into treaty or alliance with other States, grant letters of marque and reprisal, coin money, emit bills of credit, and pass bills of attainder? Yet no State in the Union can do any of these things. Are they, therefore, degraded to the rank of vassal and slave, and deprived of the rights of self-government? Surely not. And why not, sir? Because they voluntarily surrendered these and other rights to the Union. The original States became members of the Confederacy, after mature deliberation, not because any one of them approved of every part of the Constitution, but because they thought the advantages to be derived from the Union greater, on the whole, than the sacrifices (and no two made the same) which that Union required of them. Let Missouri do the same; and whether she determines at this time to become a State, or remain a territory for the present, the act will be her own, and performed with quite as much freedom of choice as the other States enjoyed when the same question was put to them.

Having thus, Mr. Chairman, proved, as I trust, that Congress has, by the Constitution, a right to propose terms and conditions to Territories applying for admission, I ask the attention of the Committee, while I pass briefly in review the several States admitted into the Union since the present form of Government was adopted, and inquire whether the conclusions I have thus drawn from the Constitution itself, are confirmed or contradicted by the practice and the declarations of those who have gone before us on this subject. This field has been already explored by others, but it is still rich in matter, most pertinent to this occasion. If, from this examination, it should appear that the new States have been uniformly admitted, upon terms and conditions, many of them affecting the highest attributes of sovereignty, and none of them applicable to the original States, it will not be easy to persuade me that the present Congress has less power and less authority, in this respect, than its predecessors.

The first State admitted was Kentucky. It was, originally, a part of Virginia, and was allowed by her to become an independent State, upon certain "terms and conditions." By the fourth of these conditions Kentucky was required to stipulate, that she would never tax the lands of non-residents higher than those of residents. By the seventh, she was required to leave the navigation of the Ohio free to all citizens of the United States. If these and other terms were accepted by Kentucky, they were "to become a solemn compact, mutually binding on the parties, and unalterable by either, without the consent of the other." These conditions were accepted by Kentucky, and she was admitted into the Union in 1791, subject to these restrictions. Such is the history of the first State formed under the present Constitution. But, how does this agree, sir, with the doctrine maintained on the other side? Every new State, says the gentleman (Mr. LOWNDES) from South Carolina, must have the same State rights, the same authority, and the same jurisdiction in all cases whatever, within its own limits, as the original thirteen. The very word State, says the Speaker, (Mr. CLAY,) implies a political community, possessing exactly the same rights and powers, and in all respects resembling the parties to the original compact. It is also on this same definition of the word State, that nearly the whole argument of the gentleman (Mr. BARBOUR) from Virginia, against this amendment, rests. But will this definition apply to Kentucky? No matter by whom these restrictions were imposed, whether by Virginia or by the Union, it is sufficient, for my argument, that Kentucky does not possess the same State rights which belong to the old States. In New Hampshire, for example, we can tax the lands of non-residents higher than those of residents. In Kentucky they cannot. Kentucky, then, does not possess all the attributes of sovereignty, of self-government, and internal police, which belong to the original States. But is she, therefore, degraded, made a vassal and a slave? Her champion on this floor, the most distinguished of her sons, (Mr. CLAY,) has proudly answered no; has proudly told us that she stands, in all respects, unnumbered and erect. And why, sir, is she not degraded by these conditions? The answer is obvious; because she consented to them freely; because she parted voluntarily with certain rights, as the condition of obtaining certain other rights. No more will Missouri be degraded, if, with a view to similar advantages, she renounces the odious power claimed for her, of making slaves of men.

The next State admitted was Vermont. Her constitution declared all men free. No conditions were annexed by Congress to her admission.

Tennessee comes next in the list of new States. She was formed out of territory ceded to the United States by North Carolina, on various "express conditions, and subject thereto;" one of these was, that the ordinance of 1787, so often mentioned in this debate, should be extended to her, except the article relating to slavery. Another was, that the lands of non-resident proprietors should not be taxed higher than those of residents. In 1796 she was admitted into the Union "on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatsoever." As this expression here first occurs, in admitting a new State, it may not be improper to inquire into its meaning, as applied to this subject.

We have already seen that the United States acquired this territory on certain "express conditions," on which alone they could hold it; that one of these (not to mention others) deprived the future State of a right—that of taxing non-residents higher than residents—which belonged clearly to the original thirteen States. This expression could not, then, mean that Tennessee should possess all the State rights enjoyed by any other State in the Union; for this would have been to violate the contract with North Carolina. Nor did Tennessee so understand it; for she incorporated the provisions of the deed of cession into her constitution, and thus, in express terms, became a party to the compact. The "equal footing" here spoken of, is, then, an equality of Federal rights merely; and in no other sense is the expression applicable to any of the new States, except Vermont.

The next State admitted was Ohio; the fairest, the brightest, the most vigorous, of all your offspring. That she is so, that she has increased with a rapidity surpassing all example in the history of mankind, till within the short space of a single generation, (for the first settlers are still alive,) she has filled her capacious borders so that they already overflow with a race of hardy, intelligent, and virtuous cultivators of the soil, is confessedly owing to its being made a condition of her existence, both as a Territory and as a State, that she should exclude, what we now require Missouri to exclude, the foul plague of slavery from her bosom. With such an example before us, it seems almost impossible to hesitate as to the course we ought now to pursue. The Northwestern Territory, out of which Ohio was formed, was ceded to the United States principally by Virginia. In 1787 an ordinance was passed by the old Congress for its temporary government, and for its final disposition. This celebrated ordinance contained various "articles of compact between the original States and the people and States in the said Territory," which were "forever to remain unalterable, unless by common consent."

I shall have occasion hereafter to advert more particularly to these articles; I will here only add that the 6th article provided that there should be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said territory, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes. The proposed restriction on Missouri is copied verbatim from this article. In 1802, Congress authorized the people of Ohio to form a constitution, "provided that the same, when formed, shall be republican, and not repugnant to the ordinance of July 13th, 1787." The act also contained other conditions, one of which was, that the United States should be at liberty, at any future period, to extend the limits of Ohio, by adding to it certain other territory therein described. These terms, together with those contained in the ordinance, were accepted by Ohio; and she was admitted into the Union "upon an equal footing," (so says the law,) "with the original States, in all respects whatever." Here, then, is a third State, with the same federal rights, but with State rights inferior to those of the original thirteen.

The next State admitted was Louisiana. By the treaty of April 30th, 1803, the province of Louisiana was ceded to the United States, "in full sovereignty," by the French Republic. By this treaty, the United States acquired an extent of territory greater than all their former possessions. The first question naturally suggested by this important fact is, whether the President and Senate had authority, under the Constitution, to make this acquisition; to purchase for the General Government, without the consent of the several States, a territory out of which twenty new States may be formed? whether, in short, they could lawfully acquire, found, and govern, an empire, without their original limits, of such vast extent that it may, in time, become more powerful than the parent country itself, and eventually hold all the original members of the Republic in complete subjection? If we look to the Constitution for an answer to these inquiries, we shall find there no express authority given to any branch of the Government to purchase foreign territory. Do we know, sir, what are to be the effects of this mighty cession? Have we sufficiently reflected on the entire change, the total revolution, which this purchase has made, or will make, in all our relations, foreign and domestic, internal and exterior? To those who know the care and anxiety with which the delicate balance of the Constitution was adjusted, it will not seem probable that either the South or the North, jealous as they were of each other's influence, intended, incidentally, and without express terms, to confer on Congress a power to throw into the scales—not, indeed, the sword of the Gaul—but a territory larger than the Gaul ever conquered, or the Roman, in the height and arrogance of power, ever added to his empire.

But, if it be thus doubtful whether the General Government possesses, under the Constitution, a right, not expressly delegated, to add indefinitely to our empire, it is not, in my mind, at all doubtful, whether the President and Senate, under the treaty-making power, can purchase territory, with a stipulation compelling Congress (as it is contended we are now compelled) to admit that territory into the Union, whether they will or not.

The power to admit new States is given exclusively to Congress; but this would be virtually to transfer it to the President and Senate alone. The authors of this treaty did not so understand it. I have the best authority for saying, that one President at least, (Mr. Madison,) was of opinion, and so expressed himself at the time, that this part of the treaty could not be executed, without an amendment of the Constitution. This was, indeed, the general opinion of the best informed statesmen at that period. I will mention only two, both of them of the highest standing in the parts of the country to which they belonged. "I am free to confess," said the present Secretary of State, (Mr. Adams,) when this treaty came before the Senate in 1804, "that the third article contains engagements placing us in a dilemma, from which I see no possible mode of extricating ourselves but by an amendment, or rather an addition to the Constitution." This was said in answer to the objection that the treaty provided for the admission of the territory as a State into the Union, and was, therefore, unconstitutional. He admitted the objection, and proposed to avoid it, by an amendment of the Constitution. Mr. Taylor of Virginia, on the contrary, denied that the treaty contained any such stipulation. "The words of the treaty are," said he, "literally satisfied by incorporating them (the inhabitants) into the Union as a territory, and not as a State. The citizens of the Territories are citizens of the United States, and have all the rights of citizenship; but these do not include those political rights which arise from State governments, and which are dissimilar in different States." If it had been urged, as it now is, that Congress were bound to admit Louisiana or Missouri without delay, and without conditions, into the Union as a State, and that whatever might be our rights under the Constitution, they were taken away by the treaty, Mr. Adams would have answered, "you have no right to admit them at all, till you have amended the Constitution;" and Mr. Taylor would have said, that "admission as a Territory was all that the treaty required." The same opinions were, on that occasion, even more strongly expressed in the House of Representatives. I refer to these high authorities, Mr. Chairman, merely to show that, in the opinion of those who negotiated, and those who ratified this treaty, it could not have been intended to confer on the people of Missouri any peculiar rights, not possessed by other Territories of the United States, and, consequently, that they stand on no better footing, in this respect, than other Territories applying for admission. Other considerations lead us to the same conclusion.

Treaties are declared by the Constitution to be "the supreme law of the land;" but they are supreme only within the limits assigned them by that instrument. There may be an unconstitutional treaty, though regularly formed and ratified, as well as an unconstitutional law, though regularly introduced and enacted: and both would be equally void, and of no binding force or effect. The power to admit new States is given, with all its incidents, to Congress, and not to the President and Senate merely. If, therefore, Louisiana was acquired on conditions which operated, in the smallest degree, to lessen, to abridge, or to vary, the Constitutional rights of Congress, with respect to her admission or rejection, with respect to the time when, or the terms upon which, she should be admitted, the treaty, so far as it attempted to interfere with the Constitutional powers of Congress on this subject, was void in itself, and could, of course, confer no new rights on Missouri. This, however, is going upon the supposition, that the treaty is inconsistent with the proposed restriction. But, if we turn to that instrument, no such inconsistency will be found. "The inhabitants of the ceded territory," says the third article, which alone relates to this subject, "shall be incorporated in the union of the United States, and admitted, as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities, of citizens of the United States." The inhabitants then, are to be admitted "according to the principles of the Federal Constitution." If, therefore, by the Constitution, we have the right here claimed, it was not the intention of the treaty, any more than it would have been in the power of its authors, to deprive us of it. And in this point of view, also, we may lay the treaty altogether out of sight, in deciding the present question.

But let us look again, sir, to the provisions of this treaty. The inhabitants are to be admitted to all the rights, advantages, and immunities, of citizens of the United States." Now, sir, the power to hold slaves is fortunately not one of these rights, advantages, or immunities. No man can hold another in perpetual bondage by any authority derived from the Constitution of the United States. For, if he could, then might slaves be held in New Hampshire, for example, or in any of the other free States; because "the rights, advantages, and immunities, of citizens of the United States," conferred by the Constitution are the same in every part of the Union. But, none will pretend that slaves can be held in New Hampshire, or in the other free States.

It is only in consequence of an authority derived from the laws of particular States that slaves can be held in any part of the Union. There is nothing, then, in the treaty, inconsistent with the proposed restriction, because the treaty confers only federal rights, and the power to hold slaves is confessedly not one of these rights. In consequence of the nature of our Government, every man in this country has a double relation and character to sustain; first, as a citizen of the United States, and, secondly, as a citizen of some particular State. In each of these characters he enjoys rights which, in the other, do not belong to him, and has duties to perform which the other does not impose. It is federal rights only which the General Government can confer; and, by adverting to this obvious distinction, we perceive, at once, that the proposed restriction on slavery leaves the people of Missouri in "the full enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities, of citizens of the United States." Here, then, is a literal compliance with the terms of the treaty. Its intention is equally obvious. The United States could not have intended to bind themselves to any thing inconsistent with the Constitution, for they refer expressly to it for their meaning. Nor could France have intended to secure for these people any privileges not enjoyed by other territories of the United States, or to obtain an admission for them into the Union on terms more favorable than had been granted to other territories. Now, the only territory admitted before the purchase of Louisiana was Ohio; and, in that case, this very prohibition of slavery had been imposed. France, then, if she had looked to the terms on which territories had been, and were to be, admitted, must have expected that this very measure would be adopted which we now propose. I am justified, therefore, in saying, that it violates neither the terms of the treaty nor the intention of the parties.

In 1804, the province of Louisiana was divided into two territorial governments. In 1811, Congress passed an act to enable the people of the Orleans Territory, now the State of Louisiana, to form a constitution "upon the conditions hereinafter mentioned." These conditions were numerous and important. Among other things, it was provided, that their constitution should contain the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty; that their laws, records, and legislative and judicial proceedings should be kept in the English language; that lands belonging to citizens of the United States residing without the said State should never be taxed higher than those of residents. These and other conditions were accepted by the people of Louisiana, and by them incorporated in their constitution, and in an ordinance, which they declared irrevocable without the consent of Congress. In 1812, they were "admitted into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, provided," says the act, "that all the conditions and terms contained in the third section of the act of February 20th, 1811, shall be considered, deemed, and taken fundamental conditions and terms, upon which the said State is incorporated in the Union." It is impossible to believe that the "equal footing" thus spoken of could be any other than an equality of federal rights. An equality of State rights Louisiana could not possess, consistently with this act; for its conditions, which are irrevocable without the consent of Congress, must for ever prevent her from legislating on various important subjects, over which the original States have complete jurisdiction. Some of these conditions are sufficiently remarkable, and, in my opinion, such as no ingenuity can derive from any express powers given to Congress by the Constitution in relation to these particular objects. Where, for instance, are the express clauses authorizing you to make it a condition of admitting a State, that she shall establish religious freedom; that she shall use the English language in all her official acts; or that she shall not tax the lands of non-residents higher than those of residents? I know of no such clause; none such have been pointed out. No, sir; these conditions can be defended only on the ground which I have taken; namely, that Congress may admit new States upon such terms as the parties see fit mutually to adopt, provided that they leave the States, admitted, in possession of all federal rights pertaining to the old States, and do not acquire for themselves any new power to be exerted over other members of the Confederacy without their consent.

I have already, Mr. Chairman, occupied so much of your time with this branch of the inquiry, that I will only add, with respect to the remaining States, that Indiana and Illinois were admitted on conditions similar to those of Ohio; and that Mississippi and Alabama came in on the same terms, except with respect to slavery, which was unfortunately fixed on them, by the deed of cession from Georgia to the United States.

Such, sir, is the history of the formation and admission of all our new States, from Kentucky to Alabama. To each of them, the first question put, was whether they chose at that time to become a State, on the terms then proposed, which terms, if accepted, were to be irrevocable without the consent of both parties. With respect to three of these States, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, the very same restriction on slavery, proposed in this amendment, was made the condition of their being admitted. There is one condition (not to mention others) running through all the new States, which is too remarkable to be here omitted. It was made a condition, with all of them, that they should stipulate never to tax the lands of non-residents higher than those of residents. Sir, the right possessed by governments to impose taxes, and to proportion those taxes, according to their own sense of justice or of policy, among the individuals upon whom they are to operate, is among the highest and most undoubted rights of State sovereignty. All the original States possess the right (and some of them have exercised it) of taxing the lands of non-residents higher than those of residents. Yet, eight of the new States have expressly renounced this right forever, as the condition of their being admitted into the Union. Nay, sir, the same condition is to be found in the present bill with respect to Missouri. All these States, then, have been admitted with rights inferior to those of the original thirteen. With these undeniable facts before us, we shall be at no loss what to think of the position assumed by gentlemen on the other side, and which, in fact, lies at the foundation of all their arguments, that new States, when admitted into the Union, become at once possessed of all the local or municipal rights of the original States, and are, by the act of admission, placed necessarily on an equality, in all respects, both as to State and federal rights, with the original members. Sir, such a doctrine finds no support whatever in the past history of our Government. It takes, too, for its basis, this strangest of all positions, that the act of admitting a State absolves her from all former obligations, and even from the conditions on which alone she becomes a member of our Confederacy. So true is even this last inference, that it has been actually adopted on this floor; and we have been repeatedly told, that this restriction, if accepted by Missouri, will not bind her; and that, by altering her constitution, she can at any time evade its force; in other words, that she may accept a grant upon conditions which she expressly stipulates to perform, and yet, at the same moment, may disregard or violate these conditions! If this be law or justice, if it be good faith, or sound reasoning, I know not to what conduct, or to what fallacy, these terms do not equally apply.

Having thus, Mr. Chairman, established, as I conceive, the Constitutional power of Congress to impose this restriction, the only remaining inquiry is, as to the expediency of exerting that power on this occasion. If it were not known with what ingenuity men support opinions, however extravagant, which, from interest, from prejudice, or from other motives, they may have imbibed, it would seem utterly incredible to an indifferent spectator that the expediency of extending slavery over half a continent should ever come seriously to be debated in an assembly of freemen. But such is the fact; and the policy of this measure, as well as its constitutionality, is denied.

And here, sir, in the very front ground of this inquiry, as to the expediency of this restriction, I place at once the injustice of slavery; and, in reply to all that can be said in favor of its extension, I find an unanswerable argument in that great maxim of universal morality, that what is morally wrong can never be politically right. We think of slavery, sir, as if it were an evil merely, and seem almost to forget that it is also a crime; and that outrages every principle of justice and of humanity, and can rest for its defence on no grounds which do not equally support the tyrant on his throne, and the despot in his most wanton abuse of power. For what can the tyrant do more than make slaves of men? And what can the despot wish more abject than the submission of hereditary bondsmen? When I am told, then, that it is expedient to extend slavery to Missouri, I answer, that slavery is, in itself, by the laws of God and of nature, a moral offence; an act of tyranny and of injustice, and, therefore, that it cannot be wise or expedient; because sound policy and true wisdom are never inconsistent with the just and equal rights of man. On this subject, sir, let me not be misunderstood. Though slavery is in itself unjust, I do not thence accuse all slaveholders of injustice. I am willing to believe, that the toleration of slavery in the Southern States, where it has already taken deep root, is not unjust with respect to them; because it is not in their power at once to remove or avoid this great moral evil. I am willing to believe, with the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEMPHILL,) that a present qualified right may, in this instance, have grown out of an original wrong. The stream, dark and turbid in its fountain, may yet run clear as it wanders down the valley. But what is it, sir, that can thus purify even slavery from its original injustice? I answer, the necessity of the case. It is not, however, interest, convenience, ease, or comfort, under the name of necessity; but a real, dire, uncontrollable, and most fatal necessity, which can alone render it just for one man to deprive another, by the strong arm of power, of the inalienable right of freedom. I am willing to believe, that this necessity exists in the present slaveholding States: at any rate, I have no inclination, as I have no right, to inquire whether it does or not. But I cannot believe, because it is not even pretended, that this necessity exists in Missouri. Slavery has hardly yet taken root in that fruitful soil; and, therefore, what is to be tolerated in the old States, only because it cannot there be avoided, is unnecessary, and of course criminal, in Missouri; criminal alike in those who establish it, and in those who, having the power to prevent, yet suffer it to be established there. I should enlarge, sir, upon this topic, but I perceive that it is one which excites no very pleasant feelings in our Southern brethren; and I am driven from it by the stern tones and the repulsive gesture with which the honorable Speaker (Mr. CLAY) has warned us not to obtrude upon him with our New England notions. Sir, what are these notions? Liberty, equality, the rights of man. These are the notions which, if we cherish, we must cherish in secret—which, if we entertain, we must entertain by ourselves. These are the notions which we must cast aside when we leave our own happy homes, and which, if by chance they find their way into this hall, are to be repelled with the charge of folly, of fanaticism, of a negrophobia. Sir, if there be any madness in this case, it is the madness of those who hug slavery to their bosoms; if there be any infatuation, it is the infatuation of those who are willing to dissolve the Union, rather than not extend this pestiferous institution beyond the Mississippi. But I forbear to press further this branch of the inquiry, and withdraw from it with repeating my remark, that, what is unjust, must, for that reason alone, if for no other, be inexpedient. But, the injustice of slavery is not the only reason against its further extension. It is as prejudicial to the country, as it is unjust towards its victims. There is no branch of useful labor which is not better performed, and at less expense, by freemen than by slaves. Agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, are the three great sources of national wealth. With respect to manufactures, they can hardly be said to exist in countries where slavery prevails to any great extent. The great manufacturing establishments of this country are almost exclusively confined to the non-slaveholding States.

Of the injurious effects of slavery on commerce, not a word need be said. Who ever heard of a mercantile people engaging in the pursuits of commerce with the labor of servile hands?—We accordingly find that the commerce and navigation of the United States belong principally to the non-slaveholding States; and that the hardy seamen who have borne your naval thunders in triumph over every sea, and planted the stars of your Union in a sphere of glory, whence no earthly power can ever pluck them down, were not only freemen themselves, but born and nurtured in a land where slavery is unknown.

It is indeed conceded on all hands that the slaveholding States are not extensively engaged in commerce or manufactures; but it is said they are an agricultural people, and that to this their whole attention is directed. But, sir, with what success? The labor of slaves, though it costs nothing beyond their subsistence, is in effect the dearest and least profitable of all kinds of labor. Feeling no other motive than the fear of punishment, they labor slowly and with great reluctance, and seek only how they may escape with the least possible exertion from their daily, and to them, unprofitable tasks. That strongest of all principles implanted in the breast of man—the desire and the hope of improving his condition—lightens care, and renders toil sweet to him who is cheered with the constant reflection that he labors for himself, and not for a master. Give such a man the fee simple of a barren rock, and he will cover it with verdure; plant him in a desert, and fertility will spring around him. Convenience and content are the companions of his toil, and wealth follows in the train of industrious freedom. On the contrary, the slave and his task-master, placed in a land flowing with milk and honey, would convert even the garden of Eden into a desert and a waste. Whether this be truth or fiction, I appeal to those to say who have surveyed and compared the varying aspects of our common country, from Maine to Georgia, in reference to this particular object. It would be easy for me to produce the highest authorities in support of my opinion, from among the first men in the slaveholding States. The sentiments of Mr. Jefferson are well known, and have been already quoted in this debate. Those which I am about to read to the Committee are from another distinguished slaveholder, who states, in language stronger than I should have dared to use, facts which no one has denied, and which I may therefore be pardoned for repeating after him. General Harper says:

“No person who has seen the slaveholding States and those where slavery does not exist, and has compared ever so slightly their condition and situation, can have failed to be struck with the vast difference in favor of the latter.” “In population; in the general diffusion of wealth and comfort; in public and private improvements; in the education, manners, and mode of life, of the middle and laboring classes; in the face of the country; in roads, bridges, and inns; in schools and churches; in the general advancement of improvement and prosperity,—there is no comparison. The change is seen the instant you cross the line which separates the country where there are slaves from that where there are none. Whence does this arise? I answer, from this—that in one division of the country the land is cultivated by freemen, for their own benefit; and in the other almost entirely by slaves, for the benefit of their masters.”

Sir, this is the testimony of a slaveholder, who states, not opinions which he may entertain, but facts which have forced themselves upon his observation—facts which you and I, and every member of this House, have equally witnessed. If then such are the acknowledged effects of slavery wherever it exists, can it be expedient to extend these evils to the people of Missouri? No, sir. With the economy, the industry, the equal distribution of property, which prevails in free States, the South would present an aspect altogether different, and would become in every respect more prosperous and more powerful than it can ever hope to be while its generous soil yields its produce only to the reluctant and unhallowed labor of servile hands.

If, from the cultivation of the soil, we turn our attention to its means of defence, we shall find slavery equally unfavorable to the military strength, as to the wealth and improvement of the country. The space which should be occupied by freemen is filled with slaves, and from them your armies draw no recruits. But this is not all: these slaves are an oppressed race, ever ready to break out in open rebellion against their masters, and most ready, and most likely to do so, when a foreign enemy presses hardest upon the country—so that, when our whole military strength is required for defence against a foreign invader, no inconsiderable portion of your most effective force must be employed against this domestic foe, to awe into subjection the slaves within your borders. This source of weakness must increase as slavery extends, and become more dangerous in every succeeding war. It is a fact, well established, that the greater part of our regular troops, during the Revolution, were drawn from the non-slaveholding States. If any further proof were required of this, we need only refer to the statement of the number of Revolutionary pensioners laid this morning upon our tables. They amount to something more than sixteen thousand; and of these nearly thirteen thousand are from States where slavery is not established. If they are to be taken as any criterion of the whole number in service from different parts of the country, the free States must have furnished by far the greatest number of regular troops during that eventful period. I have been told by the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. FOREST,) who was himself an actor in the scene, that at the siege of York, in the heart of Virginia, there were not four hundred Virginia troops, exclusive of militia, present at the surrender of Cornwallis. Sir, the history of the late war brings us to the same conclusion. With more than one-half of the people of New England opposed to that war, we, sir, the Republicans of the North, furnished more recruits to your regular army than any other portion of the country of equal extent. For the truth of this statement I refer you to the returns in the War Office. I shall ever be the first to acknowledge, that the soldiers of the South and the West are as brave, as generous, and as patriotic, as those of any other portion of the Union. But the experience of all our wars proves that, though capable of great exertions as volunteers and militiamen, when employed for a short time on a particular service, the inhabitants of the slaveholding States do not furnish the country, either in war or in peace, with many regular soldiers.

I am aware, sir, that the topics to which I have here alluded are of a delicate nature; and I should not have adverted to this view of the subject, conclusive as it is against the extension of slavery, but to repel an assertion, often made in this debate, that, whatever may be the evils of slavery, they are confined exclusively to the slaveholding States, and are, therefore, no concern of ours. Is it nothing to us, that, in more than half the Union, a state of things exists unfavorable to commerce, to manufactures, to agricultural improvements, and which abstracts materially from the military strength and defence of our common country? And is it nothing to us, whether our new confederates bring freedom or slavery, strength or weakness, with them into our Union? This, then, is the interest, deep and lasting, which we have in the present question; and this the motive, just and honorable, which we feel, in urging with ardor the adoption of a measure calculated, as we believe, to promote all the great objects for which the Government itself was at first established.

A gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) has told us, that all the misfortunes of his life (they have, he says, been neither few nor inconsiderable) are light in the balance, when compared with the single misfortune of having been born the master of slaves. Sir, of the truth of this remark I have not the slightest doubt. It is one of the peculiar evils of this connexion, that it is alike injurious to the master and to the slave—that the one can no more avoid, than the other dares avow, or avenge the mutual misfortune and injustice of their several lots. Knowing this, and feeling daily the misery and the dangers of slavery, it is surely something more than strange, it is all but incredible, that the slaveholding States should yet wish to entail on the country west of the Mississippi this tremendous calamity. Such was not formerly the state of public feeling on this subject; on the contrary, the desire to contract the limits within which slavery might exist, was the predominant sentiment with the fathers of the Revolution, whether from the North or from the South. The ordinance of 1787 received the support of the Southern States; and the restriction on slavery, contained in its sixth article, was introduced on the motion of Virginia. We have now acquired another Territory, even more extensive than the Northwest. We wish to pursue toward it the same policy, and impose upon it the same restriction; but we find no longer a like support from the slaveholding States. The Jeffersons of the present day, if any such there be, are no longer heard to describe slavery as a crime; there is no longer a Patrick Henry in the South, to denounce it as inconsistent with christianity; no Tucker to refute, with irrefragable arguments, the miserable sophistry of its advocates; and as for the Grayson of our times, it is to my friend from New York, (Mr. TAYLOR,) the mover of this amendment, and not to any son of the South, that this humble cognomen must now be applied. All we ask of the South is, that they would do for Missouri what they have already done for Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. We say to them, if you cannot remove slavery from among yourselves, do not extend it to others; let it suffice for your justification, that you lament its existence, that you load with execrations the memory of those by whom it was fixed upon you; but do not subject yourselves to the same censure from the people of Missouri in every succeeding age. Your condemnation will indeed be greater than that of your fathers. To them the possession of slaves might, perhaps, have appeared an advantage, but with you, who have tried it, there can be no such delusion.

And who, sir, is to suffer by this measure? Not the free States. It is a point conceded, that they will gain by this restriction. Will the people of Missouri, then, be injured by it? The Speaker (Mr. CLAY) has told us, that, if asked his opinion by the people of Missouri, he would advise them not to establish slavery among them. The same has been said by others opposed to this restriction. The question of expediency, then, is abandoned, as to the free States, and as to the people of Missouri. They will both gain by this restriction. But it is said that the old slaveholding States will be injured by it, and that the country west of the Mississippi is necessary as an outlet for their redundant slave population. Slavery, it is said, becomes less dangerous by being more widely diffused. It is, we are told, a poison which, though deadly in itself, may be weakened, and diluted, and rendered less fatal, by dividing it amongst a number, and giving to each a smaller portion. If this were indeed the case, it would even then be ungenerous and unjust in us to seek relief in our sufferings at the expense of others, or to extend to our brethren (though they may be willing to share with us) the bitter ingredients of our own poisoned chalice. But, sir, this metaphor is inapplicable to the present case; and, if we must indulge in comparisons, I would rather liken slavery to some noxious plant—to some poison tree—the Bohon-Upas, if you will. And what are we now called upon to do? To lay the axe to the root of this deadly tree? No, sir; but to lop its excrescences merely, to prune its too exuberant growth, and to transfer to the fertile regions of the West new scions from the parent stock, there to flourish and increase in rank luxuriance, till their fatal branches shall overshadow and darken all the land. Never was hope more fallacious than that of lessening, permanently, the evils of slavery in the old States, by extending them to the new. The evil is, that we have already a million and a half of slaves; and the remedy proposed is to double their number. Our present misfortune is, that we have eleven slaveholding States; and we hope to alleviate this misfortune by creating as many more! It is, indeed, the hope of desperation; it is drinking for the dropsy; it is the relief, short and fatal, which the involved debtor finds in new loans upon usurious interest, which remove misfortunes for a time, that they may return again, as they are sure to do, with accumulated force upon their unhappy victim.

But we are told if this restriction is imposed it will not lessen the number of slaves in the United States, and that this is not, therefore, a question respecting the increase or diminution of slavery. Sir, I affirm that this is the precise question now to be decided. A new and extensive country is about to be settled; and it is for us to say whether it shall be inhabited by freemen or by slaves. In a few generations at the furthest, it must be filled with the one or the other; and will it be pretended that, with twenty slaveholding States, we shall then have no more slaves in them all than we should have in ten? Suppose there were but one, would there be as many slaves in Maryland, for instance, as in all the South and West? It cannot be believed. This is, then, a question of the increase of slavery.

All history proves that emigration does not, for any considerable time, diminish the number of inhabitants in the country which they leave. The stream flows, but is not exhausted; it overflows, but its banks are still full, and not the less so for what they have discharged. For two hundred years the tide of emigration has been constantly setting, with a steady current, from the old to the new world; yet no one believes that Europe is less populous now than she would have been if America had never been discovered. On the contrary, her inhabitants never doubled their numbers, within such short terms, as since the discovery of this country. In Spain, it has been often remarked, that the provinces which sent forth the most emigrants to America were, at the same time, the best peopled. The same is true of Ireland. The oppression of her rulers has driven her sons to seek an asylum in every quarter of the globe; yet no part of the British dominions in Europe has increased so fast in inhabitants for the last hundred years as Ireland. We see the same principle of population exemplified among ourselves. From New England have proceeded those hardy adventurers who have filled all the north-western States; who have settled a large portion of New York; and who are, in short, to be found in every State, and, I may almost say, in every county in the Union. Yet New England, though constantly pouring forth such swarms of emigrants, is at the same time the most populous and best settled part of our country. In short, sir, a moderate and steady emigration from old to new countries is the surest possible method of increasing the number of inhabitants in the old and new combined, if not, as I believe, in each by itself. Take the case of slaves in our own country. The States of Georgia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, and Alabama, have been supplied with slaves principally from Maryland, Virginia, and the two Carolinas. Yet the slaves have, in the meantime, increased in these latter States faster than the whites. Is not this a most instructive and alarming fact? And must we not infer that their further extension will be attended with a still more rapid increase?

Look, sir, at the country from whence, for two hundred years, these unhappy victims have been wafted to your shores, till the new world, the continent, and the isles, has become almost a second Africa, covered and cursed with the same sable race. Yet never, since the commencement of the slave trade, has Africa been more populous than she is at the present day. There, as here, slaves have been constantly in demand; there, as here, they have been a profitable article in market; there to be produced, here to be employed. Sir, there is something dreadful in the idea of making human flesh the object of human traffic; but, when it is so considered, the ordinary rules of trade apply equally to this as to other branches of commerce; and we all know that supply and demand, in the mercantile world, must always, for any given length of time, correspond very nearly with each other. If, then, there is a demand for slaves in the United States, that demand will be supplied. And will slavery be less an evil, or slaves be more easily managed, when you have five millions, than now that you have only one or two? When you have twenty, than now that you have eleven slaveholding States? No, sir; time, instead of removing, constantly aggravates the evils of slavery wherever it exists. As well might you hope to save your own house in flames, by setting fire to your neighbor's; to remove disease already contracted, by infecting others with your disorder; in a word, to avoid any other misfortune, by involving all your friends in the same calamity, as hope to escape the plague of slavery by extending it to the States west of the Mississippi. This, then, is my conclusion: the slaveholding States will eventually suffer nothing by this restriction; the people of Missouri will gain every thing by it; and the free States, it is universally acknowledged, are most deeply interested in its success.

Let us examine this measure, Mr. Chairman, in another point of view. We are all united in our detestation of the slave trade. Gentlemen from the South and the Southwest seem, indeed, emulous of each others' eloquence, in denouncing this disgraceful traffic. But, what is it, sir, that constitutes the guilt and the cruelty of the slave trade? I answer, it is the breach of every tender and every domestic tie—the separation of parents from their children, of husbands from their wives, and of friends and connexions from those with whom, from infancy, they have been united; it is this: it is carrying them strangers to a strange land—which constitutes the bitter pill in the cup of slavery. And yet all this, and worse, occurs in the domestic slave trade, carried on, for many years past, to a very great extent, between Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia, on the one hand, and the slaveholding States further South and West, on the other. It may well be doubted whether the African, poor and ignorant, and oppressed in his native country, suffers more by becoming a slave in Maryland and Virginia, than the native black, not always a slave, does, by being transported from this temperate climate, and the mild usage he may here receive, to toil and perish in the rice fields of Georgia, in the cypress swamps of Louisiana, or in turning up new grounds, and piercing the deep forests, the interminable wilderness of Mississippi and Alabama, or the yet more remote prairies of the Missouri and the Kansas. We have already established a slave trade at home, among ourselves, carried on even here, under the eye of power, in this seat and centre of federal authority, and within sight of this legislative hall; and it is, Mr. Chairman, among the questions involved in this restriction, whether this domestic slave trade shall be increased to a tenfold extent, by creating an insatiable demand for slaves beyond the Mississippi; or whether, by confining slavery within its present limits, this disgraceful traffic ceasing to be profitable, shall likewise cease to exist?

FEBRUARY, 1820.

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

Nor is this measure less important in reference to the foreign slave trade. It is certain that many slaves are annually smuggled into the United States in direct violation of our laws. We have, indeed, been told that their number is small; and the Speaker (MR. CLAY) has exhibited to us a statement of some three or four hundred slaves, reported to the Government as having been illicitly introduced. But, does he suppose that this is all? or would he have us infer from this statement, that the slave smugglers regularly inform the Government of their criminal proceedings? No, sir; of the unhappy beings, thus in violation of all laws transported to our shores, and thrown by force into the mass of our black population, scarcely one in a hundred is ever detected by the officers of the General Government, in a part of the country, where, if we are to believe the statement of Governor Rabun, "an officer who would perform his duty, by attempting to enforce the law, (against the slave trade) is, by many, considered as an officious meddler, and treated with derision and contempt;" treated with derision and contempt, sir, for endeavoring to restrain the slave trade! And this is the testimony of the Governor of Georgia, with respect to the people of his own State. I have been told by a gentleman, who has attended particularly to this subject, that ten thousand slaves were in one year smuggled into the United States; and that, even for the last year, we must count the number not by hundreds, but by thousands. If this be true, is even the foreign slave trade abolished amongst us? Our laws declare that it is; but our conduct is in opposition to those laws. We prohibit the slave trade, and yet daily create new demands for slaves; thus, holding out the strongest inducements to violate our own laws. All the armies of Napoleon could not prevent the introduction and use of British goods on the Continent of Europe. And why not, sir? Because those goods were cheap at Dover, and dear at Calais. No more can your laws and your fleets prevent the introduction of slaves in the United States, while those slaves are cheap in Cuba, and dear at New Orleans. If you would destroy the slave trade, begin with shutting up the slave markets which you have opened beyond the Mississippi. If you will not do this, repeal your laws against the slave trade altogether; and do not compel the dealer in human flesh to add to the many crimes which he must daily commit, the needless one of violating your laws, since you mean not that those laws shall be enforced. Sir, there is no one who hears me that would not revolt at such a course; and yet this also is one of the questions we have to decide, whether we shall discountenance the slave trade or do all in our power, short of repealing our laws against it, to extend its range, by creating a new demand for slaves in the West.

But, say gentlemen on the other side, Missouri will not submit to your restriction. Are you statesmen, says the Speaker, and have you not looked forward to consequences? Suppose Missouri resists, what are to be your ulterior measures? Sir, this objection, like many others urged in this debate, is, in my opinion, founded upon a misapprehension of the character and the consequences of this measure. The law we are about to pass, is not an ordinary act of legislation. It is not an authority vested in the Executive, to be enforced by him, like other laws, with the arm of the civil, and, if necessary, of the military power. The people of Missouri, when met in convention, may determine that it is inexpedient for them, at this time, and upon these terms, to become a State; and if they do so determine, there is, as I have already shown, an end of our present act. This single fact, which no one will deny, appears to me to furnish a conclusive answer to all that has been said on this part of the subject. It proves at once the true nature of this transaction, which is, in effect, nothing more than a proposition to treat with Missouri, as to her admission into the Union. This act contains our first proposals; if they are rejected by Missouri (and she has a perfect right to reject any or all of them) we may then propose any other terms, more or less favorable to her, provided they are not inconsistent with the Constitutional limitations which I have already noticed.

But, we are told Missouri will form a constitution for herself, and demand admission, and that we dare not refuse her. It is a sufficient answer to this threat of consequences, to say, that Missouri has no right to do so; that she is a Territory, and can never become a State without our consent. But she will throw off her allegiance, and erect an independent government of her own. And has it come to this? And are we in such want of new confederates, that we must abandon our just rights for fear of giving offence to our foreign Territories? Are the good old thirteen, who in their infancy would brook no insult, even from the parent State, already reduced so low as to be threatened with disunion by a people of whose existence they are hardly yet informed? Is this the orphan of the West, described by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. HOLMES) as coming by the way of the wilderness, with her locks wet with the dews of night, asking shelter and seeking protection beneath the arm of our power? Or is it rather an armed warrior, knocking, sword in hand, at our gate, and threatening fiercely to demolish the portal if not instantly thrown open, that he may enter? We have been told by the Speaker that the people of Missouri are ready to shoulder their muskets, to march en masse, and force their way into this hall. Sir, if this be indeed so, it is time to barricade the doors. If it be an enemy that is advancing, let us bar our gates, and prepare for our defence; and for doing this, too, there is more and better reason, if within the fortress itself there be those who would throw down the barriers and welcome in the invader.

But, not only will Missouri revolt from our authority: the slaveholding States will join with her, and, if this restriction passes, the Union will be dissolved. Such, sir, is the language which I have heard, with infinite regret, upon this floor, not from two or three members merely, but from almost all those who have spoken against this amendment. In my mind, Mr. Chairman, there would be much more of terror in this threat, (or, if a milder term be preferred,) in this prediction, of disunion, if it were now for the first time employed. But it has been often used before. The first threats of disunion which I now remember in our history came from Kentucky, where, some thirty years ago, certain persons threatened to join the Spaniards of Louisiana if their wishes were not granted. It is not now thought, I believe, that there was much real danger to the Union in that case. In 1798-9, the Union was again said to be in danger. The sound then came from Virginia, and was loudly echoed back by her daughter of the West. Yet no division followed. I, for one, applaud, sir, the Constitutional opposition which Virginia then made to certain measures of the General Government; but I at the same time as decidedly condemn the threats of disunion, and those ulterior designs of armed resistance, which some ardent minds were supposed then to entertain. In 1814-15 disunion was again threatened; and I am sorry to say that the threat then came from the North. But mark the result. When the people of New England began to suspect that certain leading men among them were in favor of a dissolution of the Union, they abandoned those leaders. The great body even of the Federalists said, we disapprove of the war, indeed, but you mistake us altogether if you think us unfriendly to the Union, or that we wish to destroy the Constitution. The idea of a division of the States met nowhere with more pointed disapprobation than in New England; and I hazard nothing in saying, that if armed resistance to the laws had, even in the darkest period of the late war, been attempted amongst us, we sir, the republicans of the North, without aid from our Southern brethren, should at once have put down insurrection, and by our own strength alone driven treason and rebellion out of the land. But the enemies of the Government did not dare to go the length of open resistance.

In the same manner, I have no doubt that a convention in the South, having for its object the extension of slavery to Missouri, would be equally unsuccessful as the convention at the North. Our malcontents, whatever might have been their real objects, had some popular topics to urge: they were the friends of commerce and of peace—objects dear to every wise and enlightened mind. But what would the founders of the Southern and Western empire have to urge in their defence? Why, sir, the author of their new declaration of independence would have to say, not as our fathers said against the King of England, that the slave trade had been continued contrary to their wishes, but that Congress had endeavored to restrain slavery within its ancient limits; that it had proposed its inhibition to Missouri, and therefore that they, the South and the West, no longer owed allegiance to the Union. Believe me, sir, this will not be their course. I think too well of them to believe that, in such a cause, they would resort to arms against their brethren. If, unhappily, a dissolution of the Union should ever take place, it will not be for the sake of extending slavery beyond the Mississippi. If the Southern and Western States should ever abandon the stars and stripes of our national Union, it will not be to unfurl for themselves a standard bearing on its field a slave manacled. No, sir, this is not a cause in which to enlist the feelings of a generous and enlightened people, such as I esteem them to be. They may, indeed, think the course we are pursuing impolitic and unwise, but they are not prepared, with armed force, to resist the measures of Congress, and, least of all, when those measures have for their object the diminution of slavery, the extension of freedom, and the secure enjoyment of the equal rights of man. When, therefore, disunion is predicted as the consequence of our measures, I listen to it with regret, indeed, but also with incredulity; and therefore without dismay. Sir, our Confederacy is not so easily destroyed; it is cemented by the mutual interests of all its members; and the understandings, the affections, and the hearts, of the people are knit together in one common bond of indissoluble union.

Much has been said, Mr. Chairman, in this debate, respecting the motives of the friends of this restriction; and an appeal has been made to vulgar prejudices by calling it a federal measure, as if its merits could depend upon its authors. Yet I am willing to try it even by this test, since it is well known that it originated with Republicans; that it is supported by Republicans throughout the free States; and that the Federalists of the South are its warm opponents. The question, then, is not between Federalists and Republicans, but between slaveholders and those who hold no slaves. It is a knowledge of this fact which has induced the free States, usually so much divided among themselves, to advance on this occasion with so much ardor and unanimity to the attainment of their object. And well might they, in such a cause, throw aside their local jealousies, their petty feuds, and their temporary strifes, when the best hopes of man are all involved in the issue; when the lasting prosperity of the Union is at stake, and their own peculiar interests all cast upon the die. With us, disunion would be suicide; for we stand here merely on the defensive; and most untruly and unjustly is it said, that we are seeking to injure or degrade the Southern States, while we wish only to defend ourselves. Whether with or without slaves, Missouri will still be a Southern State—Southern in her position, in her character, in her interests, and in her political connexions. To all this we have nothing to object. We only wish that she should not be a slaveholding State. It is not Southern influence or Southern representation to which we are unfriendly—but slave influence and slave representation which we wish to confine within the limits of the present States, and, in so doing, we only fulfil the wishes and expectations of the people, when the Constitution itself was first adopted.

If we look back to the debates of the State conventions, we shall find that the Constitution was universally considered as leading to the gradual abolition of slavery, even in the old States, and as furnishing no excuse for its extension to the new. Of this fact it would be easy to produce the fullest proof. In Massachusetts convention, Judge Dawes said, in defending the Constitution even for tolerating slavery, "the convention did all they could in this case; and we may say that, though slavery is not smitten by an apoplexy, yet it has received a deadly wound, and will die of consumption." What, sir, would have been the astonishment of men who adopted the Constitution under this belief, if they had been told that, within the first generation, slavery would extend over twice its ancient limits, and that, instead of being smitten by an apoplexy, or dying of a consumption, it was to receive fresh strength under the new Government, and have infused into it, by this very Constitution, new life and vigor? "The migration and importation," said General Heath, in the same assembly, "is confined to the States now existing only; new States cannot claim it. But whether those in slavery, in the Southern States, will be emancipated after 1808, I do not pretend to determine—I rather doubt it." An opinion it seems prevailed, that Congress might abolish slavery, even there, after 1808; this he rather doubted, but said that slavery could not be extended to the new States. No one can read these debates without perceiving, that the Constitution would never have been adopted in Massachusetts, had it not been considered as unfavorable to slavery, even within its ancient limits! The same may be said of all the New England States. The like sentiments were also expressed in the New York convention and were urged with equal confidence in Pennsylvania. "The new States," said Judge Wilson, who was himself one of the framers of the Constitution, "will be under the control of Congress in this particular, and slaves will never be introduced among them." "Yet a few years," he adds, "and Congress will have the power to exterminate slavery from within our borders." We find the same opinions expressed even in the slaveholding States: "There is no clause," said George Mason, in the Virginia convention, "that will prevent the Northern and Eastern States from meddling with our whole property of this kind." Patrick Henry went even further—"Congress," said he, "may liberate every one of your slaves, if they please. They have the power in clear unequivocal terms, and will clearly and certainly exercise it."

It is surely unnecessary to quote further authorities. I have not produced these, as containing my own views of the Constitution; for, in some respects, they are certainly incorrect; but merely to show, what the whole history of the times proves, that the framers of the Constitution, and those by whom it was adopted, both its friends and its enemies, in every part of the country, considered it as leading gradually to the abolition of slavery in the old States, and as guarding effectually against its introduction into the new States. In proposing the present measure, then, we are only doing what was expected from us by the founders of our Republic; and it is, therefore, not on us, but on our opponents, that the imputation rests, of introducing new and alarming doctrines, unknown to our fathers, and unsanctioned by the Constitution. The free States, sir, would never have come into this Union, had they supposed it possible that, within the first generation, they would become a minority in the Government. There wants but one, on the other side, to make them so at present in the Senate; and, at this moment, the representation of slaves alone, on this floor, exclusive of the whites, exceeds in number, and, on this very question, out-votes all the Representatives from six out of eleven of the non-slaveholding States.

Feeling the weight of this slave representation, and knowing with what fatal activity it increases, is it strange that the free States, believing they possess authority under the Constitution, should wish to prevent its existence in States hereafter to be admitted, as they have already prevented it in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois? No, sir, in such a cause it would be strange indeed if the best hearts and the best minds of our country, its wisdom and its virtue, were not all engaged on this occasion. Nor, in truth, have the free States been wanting to themselves on this great day of their trial; and if we, their representatives on this floor, have but firmness to perform, painful as it may be, the duties of our station, all will be well with them—all will yet be well, if we are but true to our constituents, and true to ourselves. And, what, let me ask, have we seen or heard, on this occasion, that we, above all others, should shrink from this duty, or hesitate and falter in its performance? Is it the conduct of the Senate in connecting Maine with Missouri; or the declaration that, in future, no free State shall be admitted till a slaveholding State can be found to form a balance to it in the Senate?

Is it the doctrine, now advanced, that, instead of three-fifths, all the slaves ought to be represented? Or is it the assertion, that slavery is the natural state of man, and that slaves are happier than their masters; or, at any rate, that their condition is better than that of soldiers and seamen; and that slavery is not only established in practice among all nations, but is agreeable to the laws of nature, and expressly sanctioned by our religion? Are these the arguments by which we are to be persuaded to forego our just rights on this occasion? Sir, on my mind they produce an effect directly the reverse of that intended by their authors.

When I hear slavery in the Southern States lamented as an evil, which they cannot immediately remove, I acquiesce in the justice of this defence. But when gentlemen go further, and not merely excuse slavery, but pronounce its eulogium; when they tell us that, however bad it may be for the slave, it is no injury to the master; that he gains by it, that his ease and convenience are promoted, and, therefore, that it ought not to be touched, I tremble for the stability of our republican institutions. For on what does this defence of slavery, in the abstract, rest, but on this—that by the decrees of providence, one man is born to labor, and another to enjoy the fruits of that labor; that one is born with a right to govern, and another bound to obey; the one a master, the other a slave? And what is this but the very essence of kingly government—the doctrine of tyrants, in every age—the enormous faith of millions made for one.”

These, then, are the motives of our conduct: we find slavery unjust in itself; adverse to all the great branches of national industry; a source of danger in time of war; repugnant to the first principles of our Republican Government; and, in all these ways, extending its injurious effects to the States where its existence is not even tolerated. We believe that we possess, under the Constitution, the power necessary to arrest the further progress of this great and acknowledged evil; and the measure now proposed is the joint result of all these motives, acting upon this belief, and guided by our most mature judgments and our best reflections. As such, we present it to the people of Missouri, in the firm persuasion that we shall be found, in the end, to have consulted their wishes not less than their interests by this measure. For what, sir, is Missouri? Not the comparatively few inhabitants who now possess the country; but a State, large and powerful, capable of containing, and destined, I trust, to contain half a million of virtuous and intelligent freemen. It is to their wishes and their interest that I look, and not to the temporary blindness or the lamentable delusions of the present moment. If this restriction is imposed, in twenty years we shall have the people of Missouri thanking us for the measure, as Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois now thank the Old Congress for the ordinance of 1787. The existence of a State is not limited to a single generation. Its inhabitants, yet unborn, have claims upon our wisdom and our care; and it is for us to determine what shall be their character and their fortunes. It is in the first formation of societies alone, that individuals have any considerable influence upon governments; and that few persons have it sometimes in their power to fix the permanent character and enduring policy of States and nations; to say whether their institutions shall be free or slavish, framed for the benefit of a few, or securing equal rights to all. But, after a government is once formed, and the institutions of the country become fairly settled, though at first but the mere creatures of man's power, they act, in turn, as the masters of his will; and form and fashion, to their own likeness, the national character of the people. Never was this remark more applicable than to the present case. It is in our power, by a single act, to determine the character and the policy of Missouri in this important subject, connected, as it is, with so many others, for all succeeding times; and to say, whether the people whom we admit into our Union shall bring to it a system of equal rights, extending the blessings of freedom alike to all, or introduce with them an odious monopoly of power and of wealth, unjust to its victims, and injurious to its authors. As we may this day decide, posterity will bless us for laying broad and deep the foundations of an equal government, or load our memories with the malediction of ages, for mistaking or neglecting their interests, and forging chains for them, which we, the freemen of America, disdained ourselves to wear. It is not often that legislators have it in their power to do so much good, or inflict so much evil on mankind; and fortunate indeed will be our lots, if we are but found equal to the glorious task—if we are but wise, according to the measure of our duties, and firm and faithful to the end, in the discharge of this mighty trust.

Mr. EDWARDS, of Connecticut, spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman: After the very able discussion this subject has undergone, it may be considered an evidence of vanity for me to suppose I shall be able to communicate any thing new. But there are some views in which this subject has presented itself to my mind, which I do not recollect, as yet, to have heard distinctly stated. If I should be unable to add any thing to the stock of information, the importance of the subject and its interesting nature will be a sufficient apology for my occupying a small portion of the time of the Committee.

This subject is important, not only on account of its effects upon the future prosperity and welfare of the nation, but on account of the extreme interest felt in it by almost every portion of this community. The local and sectional feelings involved in this question are, of themselves, sufficient to attach to it no ordinary degree of importance. This is, perhaps, the first instance in which a question has arisen, since the organization of our Government, where the division of sentiment could be traced on the map of our country.

The first subject presented for our consideration is the constitutionality of the proposed amendment. Several parts of the Constitution have been resorted to. I shall avail myself of one only, not because this is the only part which has a bearing upon this subject, but because this is sufficient; a resort to any other is unnecessary; and there are some expressions in that instrument upon which the charges have been so often rung, in the course of this discussion, that the sound of them has become unpleasant to me, and I presume it is so to every member of this Committee.

By the Constitution, Congress is vested with the power of admitting new States into this Union. This vests Congress not merely with the power of admission, but gives them the power of doing all acts necessary to carry this power into effect. This, it is presumed, will not be denied; it has not yet been, and, until it is, I shall consider it as admitted. It also vests Congress with the power of doing all acts necessary to execute this power, in such a manner as will effect the object for which the power was granted. The latter proposition is considered equally evident with the first. No one would doubt, in a case of this kind in the ordinary concerns of life, (and there can be no reason why there should be any doubt in this,) the principles which govern both instances are the same. Where the manner of doing a thing is not pointed out, it is left to the discretion of the person or body authorized to act, and the only rule by which their conduct is or can be regulated is, the object for which the power of acting was conferred.

To ascertain the object for which the power of admitting new States was vested, we must resort to the preamble of the Constitution. The objects contemplated by the framers of that instrument, and by the people of the United States, are there specified; it is unnecessary to recapitulate the whole; they are, perhaps, all embraced and included in this one, the promotion of the "general welfare." It is not claimed by me that this preamble confers power; I consider it merely as a direction as to the manner in which the powers conferred in the instrument are to be exercised. The preamble, perhaps, expresses nothing more than would have been implied without it. But the wise men who framed that instrument have relieved us from the necessity of resorting to implication.

I ask, whose welfare is here contemplated? To this only one answer can be given: the welfare of those who framed and adopted this instrument—the welfare of the parties to the Confederation. We are not, nor have we ever been, Quixotes in the cause of liberty. We wish well to the human race, but hitherto have deemed it sufficient to take care of ourselves, and leave other nations to take care of themselves. Notwithstanding, in the course of this discussion, we have been reminded of France, and of the horrors which in that country, resulted from the doctrines of liberty and equality; and it has been intimated that we are pursuing the same course, and that it may lead to as desperate results. I humbly conceive the charge and the prediction are equally groundless. The fervor of revolution with us is past. Liberty is not to us a new theme; it did not, even in the infancy and extreme youth of our nation, so fire our brain as to make us forget that we are men, and subject to the frailties of human nature; and we are in no danger, at the present day, when nearly arrived at manhood, of being hurried to extremes upon this, or, I trust, any other subject.

16th Con. 1st Sess.—46

It is conceived that it will not be for the interest of the United States that Missouri should be admitted into the Union, unless the further introduction of slavery there should be interdicted. How is this object to be accomplished? It is to be accomplished in this way, and perhaps in this way only. Independent of this law, if the people of Missouri should form a constitution, and the further introduction of slavery should be prohibited, what security should we have? they might alter their constitution at pleasure. This is the only way in which the object contemplated can be secured, and, if this mode cannot be taken, and the same views continue to be entertained, Missouri can never be admitted into the Union; she may write mene tekul upon her claims.

We have heard much upon this occasion of State rights. When we talk of State rights what rights do we mean, and whose rights? We must mean the rights of our own States—those States we represent. These are the rights we are bound to guard and protect, and it is enough for us that we do guard and protect these. The people of Missouri will take care of their rights; and I know not why we should be apprehensive that they will improvidently sacrifice them. From some remarks which have been made, I should infer the present States had no rights, or next to none; that is, collectively taken; for we are denied, it seems, the poorest privilege possessed, not merely by the smallest community, but by the meanest individual of our species, the privilege of choosing our company; or, I might rather say, the privilege of determining with whom we will not associate. For, the principles which have been advanced upon this occasion, go the length of asserting that we are bound to admit Missouri, that we have no option or volition upon the subject, and that we are bound to take her as she is—

"Unappointed, unanel'd,
"With all her imperfections on her head."

And who or what is Missouri? She is, as to us, on the present occasion, an independent power. We, at her request, meet her, and treat with her as such. We accord to her all the attributes of this character, and we merely claim for ourselves the same rights and privileges.

The admission of a new State is not an ordinary act of legislation: it is the most solemn act Congress can perform. Other acts are temporary, this is perpetual; for although Congress may admit a State into the Union, yet Congress possesses no power of getting a State out of the Union; nor is there a power of this kind vested anywhere. A State once admitted, is admitted forever; and shall it be said that in this case, of all others, our hands are tied, that we are vested with no discretion? Is it possible that the framers of our Constitution could have been so mad, as to divest themselves, in this the most important of all our concerns as a nation, of the means of self-defence? Were they afraid to trust themselves with this power lest it should be abused to the prejudice of themselves? This is presuming a distrust which is altogether at variance with those principles by which man is ordinarily actuated. We often distrust others, but we never distrust ourselves. It is presuming too much, to presume a jealousy, which, by withholding a power from a fear that it might be abused, makes inevitable as great, or perhaps greater evils, than any abuse of this power could possibly have produced.

H. OF R.

Admission of Missouri.

Let us, however, take the gentlemen upon their own grounds. It is allowed we have the power to admit or refuse admission, but it is claimed our power extends not in the least degree beyond this. We will suppose that we are now considering whether Missouri shall be admitted or not, and this condition is out of the question. In the discussion of this subject her admission is objected to, because slavery exists there, and because its further introduction and extension is not prohibited. When the vote is finally taken, it appears there is a majority opposed to her admission. How are the people of that country to be informed why their request is not granted? They are to learn it as well as they can from the discussion which has taken place in Congress, and from what may be picked up in conversation with the members. The people of Missouri, then, obviate this objection, and renew their application. In determining upon her admission, it is not necessary that every subject connected with it should be brought up, considered, and examined. If there be one insuperable objection to her admission at the time she applies, those who are to decide will not consider themselves required to go further: at that time this will govern their votes. When she applies a second time, her situation in other respects will be examined—her boundaries will come under consideration; and on the subject of boundaries I conceive we are in a peculiar manner entitled to a voice. It will be borne in mind, that a considerable part of that district of country which is now proposed to be included in Missouri is exclusively the property of the United States, both as to soil and jurisdiction. We therefore have an interest, not merely in the size of the State, as a constituent branch of this Confederacy, but as owners of a considerable portion of the territory it embraces, and nearly the whole of the contiguous country. We have therefore a pecuniary as well as a political interest. The present inhabitants of Missouri cannot, upon any pretext whatever, claim either territorial or juridical rights beyond the soil over which they have an ownership as individuals. The boundaries of the State are, therefore, a proper subject of arrangement between them and us.

We might not be satisfied with the boundaries they proposed. They might conform to what they supposed to be our wishes in this respect, and apply a third time. Possibly some other objection might then be made, and finally we come to precisely the same result we should by the present course. Is it not better, both for us and the people of Missouri, that we should speak to her at once—speak to her in an authentic and official form, and in the only way in which we can so speak—by a legislative act, sanctioned by all the branches of the Government. In substance, I cannot possibly discover any difference in the two courses, and, in point of form, the one now proposed has infinitely the advantage.

Upon the Constitutional question, therefore, there is not in my mind the shadow of a doubt. This opinion is not one into which I have fought myself: I did not enter upon the examination of this subject to find arguments to fortify a preconceived impression, but with a mind as free from prejudice as it ever was in any instance whatever. My present conviction is one which has in fact forced itself upon me, and to which I have been compelled to yield.

But we are told of a treaty, and that by this our hands are tied. That part of the treaty which relates to this subject is in these words: "The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States." It is to be regretted that those who made the treaty did not make use of expressions known to our Constitution and our laws, or I might say to our language.

When the "Union" is spoken of we know what is meant; it is a word with which we are familiar, it is in common use. We also know and understand what is meant by the "United States," this term is known to our Constitution; but the "Union of the United States," to say the least of it, is a very uncommon phrase. It is one I do not recollect ever to have heard or met with in any way, until I saw it in this treaty. It is presumed, however, that this phrase was merely meant and intended to describe us as a nation. Has not the first part of this treaty already been complied with? Are not the inhabitants of this Territory already incorporated with us? We have assumed jurisdiction in this country; we have taken its inhabitants under our care and protection; we have established a territorial government there, and given the inhabitants rights and privileges, very little short of those the inhabitants of the States possess. They are incorporated with us, certainly as much so as the inhabitants of the District of Columbia; and will any one say they are not incorporated with us; that they are not incorporated in the Union, or, if you please, "in the Union of the United States?" By this treaty the inhabitants of the ceded territory are also to be admitted "to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States." If you look at our naturalization law you will find, that a residence in any one of the States or the Territories of the United States, entitles a person to be admitted a citizen of the United States, upon compliance with certain forms prescribed by the law. The inhabitants of the ceded territory, therefore, are now, or may be, in possession of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States. The treaty I consider, therefore, has already been complied with.

But there is another consideration which is, with me, conclusive, even if I am wrong in this construction, and every thing asked by those who claim and advocate a different construction is conceded. It will be recollected, that whatever is done under this article of the treaty, is to be done "according to the principles of the Federal Constitution;" those who made this treaty had no right, in any event, to promise more than this. If I am right in my construction of the Constitution, our powers, as to the manner in which we shall perform the act now required of us, are not limited or restrained in the least. All that we are bound to do, is to admit Missouri when the interest, or, in other words, the "general welfare" of the United States will be promoted by her admission. This act we are now ready and willing to perform. We are willing to admit her; and all we ask is, that her condition may be so modified that she may be an efficient and useful member of this Confederacy, and that she should not be instrumental in the extension and perpetuation of an evil which all deplore.

FEBRUARY, 1820.

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

There is another answer which may be given to this claim set up under the treaty. This treaty respects only the inhabitants of the ceded territory, at the time the treaty was made. It is understood that this embraces but a small portion of those who are now inhabitants of Missouri. When these men come before us, it will be time enough to consider their claim; the present application is not made by them; the present applicants are the inhabitants of Missouri, a very different body of men. No, sir, the present applicants cannot claim under the treaty; their best and only claim is as our children; and I hope they will prove themselves children indeed, worthy of our care, and worthy of our regard, and that we shall act towards them the part of a kind parent; for myself, at least, I shall neither do or claim any thing with respect to them I deem inconsistent with that relation. If they were my children, in fact, I should act towards them the same part I now do, and, in doing so, should consider myself as conferring upon them the richest legacy in my power to bestow—one far more valuable than either money or lands.

We have been told, if this application is not granted, the people of Missouri will form a constitution for themselves, whether we consent to it or not; and that hereafter they will present themselves before us with this constitution in one hand, and the treaty in the other, and demand admission into the Union; and we have had an intimation of the train of consequences which will probably result from a persistence in our refusal. In what light, I ask, are the people of Missouri exhibited to us by these suppositions? They are owners of the soil they have purchased, and over this they have a right to exercise certain powers; but by what law, or what principle, does their power extend beyond this? Are they about to assume dominion over the soil of the United States? Are they about to divest us, not merely of our sovereignty, but of our property? Is this the penalty of our refusal? I will not, without further evidence, believe that the inhabitants of this Territory have had justice done them by these representations; but I will rather consider them as springing from the heated imaginations of those who call themselves her friends. If I really believed these representations, I should say, that Missouri ought never to be admitted into this Union, but that, with respect to her, our door should be ever closed.

It has been said that the Cabinet is divided upon this question. I know not what the divisions are in the Cabinet, or what influence those divisions ought to have upon our deliberations or decisions. Whatever those divisions may be, I presume there are none upon one branch of this subject—as to the rights of the present applicants under the treaty, I apprehend there is no division in the Cabinet; for I understand the Cabinet have uniformly claimed that the province of Texas was included in the Louisiana treaty; yet, if we look at the Florida treaty, we shall find that this province has been abandoned, relinquished, given up to Spain, with as little ceremony as any article of merchandise would have been; and this treaty has received the sanction of the Senate of the United States. Could these things have taken place if the Cabinet or the Senate had supposed that, by the Louisiana treaty, we were bound to erect the territory ceded to us into independent States, and admit them as members of the American Union?

An attempt has been made to derive an argument from the citizenship of the applicants. It is said they are citizens of the United States, and, as such, are entitled to self-government; and the Declaration of Independence has been quoted. That instrument, it is said, recognises the right of the people to alter or abolish their form of government, and institute new ones. These are natural rights. The rights conferred by citizenship are based, it is true, upon those which are natural; but they are all dependent upon the positive institutions of society, and the nature of them depends much upon the location of the individual; they vary as he varies his residence, and are different in every State in the Union, and, in many instances, in the different parts of the same State. In the State of New York they are one thing, in the State of Pennsylvania another. In the country they are of a certain kind; in the city of a different kind; in every situation, and under all circumstances, they derive their character from the institutions of society. When a man leaves the United States, he carries none of them with him; that is, none of those which are peculiar. He is entitled, to a certain extent, to the protection of his country, as the citizen or subject of any other country is, when separated from that country; but his rights, as a citizen of the United States, extend no further.

If a resort is to be had to Revolutionary principles, pray, gentlemen, take the whole of these principles; do not select that part which happens to comport with your views, and reject the remainder; extend to all the enjoyment of those, the inalienable rights, "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." We do not claim that you should go this length—"the condition and civil rights" of those who are now inhabitants of Missouri, are not interfered with by us. We only claim that those who hereafter become inhabitants there, should be permitted to enjoy these blessings. It is with an ill grace, indeed, that you clamor for rights for yourselves, and, at the same time, are equally clamorous for a denial of those rights to others.

It is admitted by all, that slavery is an evil; even the ardor of debate, and the excitement naturally produced by opposition, has not yet caused a denial of this proposition; but, it has been contended that diffusion will mitigate this evil. It has been compared to poison, the evil effects of which are said to be lessened by dilution. If this evil could not be increased in quantity, the comparison might be just; but the extent to which it may be increased is unlimited. In this respect it may, with more propriety, be compared to fire. This extends itself as long as it finds materials to feed upon, and that species of population which is the subject of the present discussion, will extend as long as space and the means of subsistence are furnished. As well might it be said that this evil of fire is mitigated by diffusion, and that the individual whose house is burning lessens his calamity by setting a city in a blaze, as that the evil of slavery, in that portion of the country where it exists, will be lessened by extending it over the uninhabited territory of the United States.

Slavery is a great evil at the present time; but if we look into futurity, its character becomes alarming. There is one fact which speaks volumes upon this subject. It is this: that the black population in the slaveholding States increases faster than the white. This fact is considered as clearly established, by the different enumerations which have been made of the inhabitants of the United States. It is not difficult to assign a reason for this. White people are restrained from marriage by prudential considerations; there are but few who will think of burdening themselves with a wife and family, without some rational prospect at least of subsistence, if not of comfort and respectability. The slave experiences no check or restraint of this nature. He fears no degradation, either of himself or his offspring. What is called the preventive check to population, operates with much greater force upon the white man than the slave, in all situations; but this check operates more powerfully in the slaveholding States than in those where there are no slaves, and for this reason, that labor is less reputable. The character of any employment is affected by the character of the individuals by whom it is exercised. That labor which we are in the habit of seeing performed by slaves, we are apt to consider as the appropriate labor of slaves, and no freeman can engage in it without, in some measure, degrading himself to the level of slaves. Poverty is, for this reason, more distressing and more irksome in those countries where there are slaves, than in those where there are none.

Where is this evil to end? No one can contemplate this state of things, and carry his ideas forward to its inevitable tendency, without emotion. I need not pursue it; the imagination of every individual who hears me, will at once anticipate every thing I could urge upon this subject. That this state of things, if suffered to progress, will lead to some dreadful result, no one can for a moment doubt. A surrounding white population will, then, be found useful. Extending slavery is only postponing the evil day for a short period; but exactly in proportion as this postponement takes place, will the evil be increased in magnitude. While it is confined within narrow limits, it may be controlled; but, when extended over an immense space, it will be uncontrollable.

It has been intimated that the Northern States are unfriendly to the Southern, and that the present measure originates from a disposition to gratify this hostility. The suspicion is unfounded, certainly, as respects the body of the people; there may be individuals who, from political or other considerations, may entertain a spirit of this kind, but it is not general: nor do I believe, at the present day, it is sufficiently extensive in any portion of the Northern section of the country to give life and being to any public measure. We have taken each other to have and to hold, for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, in sickness and in health; and our present wish is, that the connexion should continue, and that it should only terminate with the final dissolution of all things. It is true, jealousies have arisen; there may have been moments of pique and alienation of feelings; there may have been neglect of the true interests of the Union; there may have been periods when a portion of our citizens have been more gratified with our adversity than our prosperity, as a nation; but I trust that the day of these things has gone: that those who have thus wandered, if any such there be, have returned, like the prodigal, never to wander again; that they have strayed far enough from the path of duty to realize the evil and the danger of that course, and to be satisfied that their only chance of happiness is in a faithful performance of their covenants.

It is true, we lament this evil of slavery—we deplore it; yet for this we consider you not as enemies, but you must allow us to remonstrate with you as brethren. If its remedy is undertaken in a spirit of friendship, I have no doubt it may speedily be mitigated, and I entertain the hope that it may eventually be eradicated; and, among the means of its mitigation and eradication, I look, with no small degree of complacency, to colonization. This we cannot expect to do every thing, but it may do much.

The pride and jealousy of our Southern brethren appear to be alarmed. What! it is asked, are we unable to take care of ourselves? Do we not know our own interest? The part we have taken, upon the present occasion, appears to be regarded as an intrusion, an officious intermeddling. But, is this a subject in which we have no interest? Are we so far disconnected, that one part of this community can experience calamity, and the other suffer no inconvenience? Whatever tends to lessen the growth and prosperity, the strength and efficiency, of any part of our country, must, in its consequences, be injurious to the rest. Every portion of our country must participate, in a greater or less degree, in the evil consequences of an unprofitable or dangerous population. Those evils which are present, and those which are unfolded to our view, in futurity, from this source, are of too alarming a character, even as respects the most remote parts of the United States, to admit of indifference. Those in the midst of this population are most interested, but, possibly, supposed immediate advantage may have its effect in drawing their attention from remote consequences.

It has been intimated, that we concern ourselves too much about posterity, and that our attention ought to be confined more closely to ourselves. No man who has experienced parental feelings, can be indifferent about posterity. It is in vain to reason on this subject; it is enough for us that it is so. It arises from a law of our nature—a law written in the heart of man by the finger of the Almighty, and one which he cannot disobey.

It is said, the condition of the slaves is not so bad as has been supposed; that they are better off than the lowest class of white people. One thing is certain, that is, the lowest class of white people would be very unwilling to exchange conditions with them; and notwithstanding all the mitigations and ameliorations of their condition, which have taken place, or which may take place hereafter, the observation of a writer who knew the avenues to the human heart as well as any man that ever wrote, still remains true: "Disguise thyself 'as thou wilt, still, slavery, thou art a bitter draught,' and, though thousands are made to drink of thee, 'thou art no less bitter on that account.'"

Why is it that so much pains are taken to create an impression, that the emancipation of the slaves in the old States is aimed at, and that this is merely the commencement of a system which has that for its end? That our country should be rid of this class of people, is devoutly to be wished; but, that there is a wish or an intention to effect their emancipation by coercive, or, in fact, any other means, inconsistent with the rights of those who now hold dominion over them, is not to be inferred from any thing which has yet taken place. The intemperate effusions of individuals, or the unguarded language of either individuals or private associations, do not justify these suspicions. When any public measure is attempted, bearing these marks, then may these apprehensions be indulged, and the feelings appertaining to them properly have existence; but until then they are unauthorized. But, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding all the alarm, agitation, and opposition we have witnessed on the present occasion, I am fully satisfied that if, in consequence of the stand which has now been taken, the further introduction of slavery into Missouri should be prevented, whatever may be the present feelings of the inhabitants of that territory, we shall hereafter receive their thanks, and that they will look back upon the transactions of this day with joy and gratitude; and that the time is not far distant when even our Southern brethren will regard us as their benefactors, rather than their enemies.

There are several other observations, Mr. Chairman, which I intended to have made, but, aware of the fatigue and impatience of the Committee, from this lengthy and protracted discussion, I will omit them. It has been my endeavor to communicate what I had to say in as concise a manner as possible, and to avoid repeating any thing I have heard advanced by others, any further than absolutely necessary to make myself intelligible. I will, therefore, take my seat, with a tender of my sincere acknowledgments to you and the Committee for the indulgence that has been manifested.

When Mr. EDWARDS had concluded, the Committee rose; and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 22.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, enclosing a report on the petition of James Simpson, Consul of the United States at Tangier, in the kingdom of Morocco; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Commissioners of the Navy Pension Fund, upon the subject of the resolution of this House of the 2d of March, 1819, instructing them to use all the means in their power to coerce payment of the balances due to the fund, from all persons who may be found indebted to the same, &c.; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOLMES presented a representation, signed by "John Holmes, Martin Kinsley, Mark Langdon Hill, James Parker, Joshua Cushman, and Ezekiel Whitman," members of this House from that part of the State of Massachusetts hitherto known as "the District of Maine," respectfully urging Congress, for the reasons therein stated, as speedily as possible to decide the question of the admission of the said district into the Union as a separate, sovereign, and independent State; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KENT presented a petition of Robert Young, judge of the orphans' court of the county of Alexandria, and of Richard Bland Lee, judge of the orphans' court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, praying that Congress will be pleased to cause an inquiry to be made into the present organization and condition of the said courts, and that such alterations and amendments may be made in the existing system, as to the wisdom of Congress may seem meet and proper; which petition was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. KENT also presented a petition of the Corporation of the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, stating that they have perceived that, by the 12th section of the bill now pending before this House, "concerning the banks of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," the issue, or re-issue, of the notes of the corporation are prohibited from and after the 1st of January, 1821, and alleging that the said corporation is not able or prepared to redeem and pay off their notes by the time specified in the said section, and praying for an extension of the time for the liquidation of their said notes; which petition was referred to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill aforesaid.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the appointment of a separate surveyor for the public lands within the State of Illinois, made a report thereon; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House, as follows :

Resolved, That it is not expedient that a separate surveyor should be appointed for the public lands within the State of Illinois.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the same committee, who were also instructed to inquire into the expediency of limiting the quantity of public lands hereafter to be exposed to sale, made a report thereon ; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House, as follows :

Resolved, That it is not expedient to pass any law limiting the quantity of public lands hereafter exposed for sale at the different land offices.

The SPEAKER presented to the House a letter addressed to him by the trustees of the town of Saint Charles, in the Territory of Missouri, in relation to the right of the inhabitants of that town to the commons adjacent thereto.—Referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. STORRS, the Secretary of the War Department was directed to transmit to this House copies of the respective contracts heretofore made with James Johnson, Alexander McRae, Elias Earle, and Peter Townsend, for the delivery of powder, arms, cannon, or shot, together with an account of the moneys advanced on the said contracts, respectively, and at what periods, and whether, and how far, the said contracts have been respectively fulfilled on the part of the contractors.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit : "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of John O'Connor, deceased ;" and "An act further to extend the charter of the City of Washington ;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

FLORIDA TREATY.

On motion of Mr. REID, the House agreed, by a vote of 77 to 59, to consider the following resolution offered by him yesterday :

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to impart to this House any communications touching the Florida Treaty, which may have been received from our Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of Spain, which have not been heretofore communicated, and which, in his opinion, it may not be inconsistent with the public interest to communicate.

Mr. RANDOLPH, presuming that the object of the resolution was to obtain generally such information as the Executive had received touching the treaty, (with the reservation expressed in the last part of it,) he suggested to the mover the propriety of omitting that part of the motion which confined the call to information received from our Minister at Madrid.

Mr. REID acquiesced in the suggestion ; and, thus modified, the resolution was adopted, and a committee of three appointed to present it to the President.

WESTERN COURTS.

The engrossed bill to alter the place of holding the circuit and district courts of Ohio, from Chilcothe to Columbus, the seat of government of the State, was read the third time.

Mr. BEECHER explained the motives for this bill, the unanimous wish of the Legislature, the public convenience, &c.

Mr. BRUSH replied to Mr. BEECHER, and argued to show that the bill was inexpedient, at this time, at least ; that it would be a burden to suitors, witnesses, &c., and would increase the labor of the judges by extending their journey, &c., without benefiting the community. To give time to produce information to the House on the subject, he moved that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. ROSS and Mr. CAMPBELL replied and supported the bill ; after which, the question was taken on laying the bill on the table, and negatived ; and the bill was then passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

COMMODORE PERRY.

Mr. LOWNDES offered the following resolution for consideration :

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending to the widow of Captain Oliver H. Perry the provision which is now made by law for the widows and children of naval officers who die from wounds received in action.

Mr. L. observed that it was conceived that the family of Commodore Perry was embraced by the existing laws which provide for pensions, as it was not to be supposed the generosity or magnanimity of Congress did not intend to comprehend such a case ; but as this appeared to be doubted, he had deemed it proper to propose the inquiry which he had submitted.

The resolution was adopted nem. con.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose to offer a motion. He believed it would be very difficult for any member of this House—certainly it was not possible for him—to keep pace with the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDES,) in the race of honor and public utility. That gentleman had, by the motion which had just been adopted, anticipated him, in part, in a proposition which he (Mr. R.) had intended on this particular day, for reasons which would suggest themselves to the mind of every one, to offer to the House. When he had this morning heard the tower-guns announcing the return of the birthday of WASHINGTON, Mr. R. said the thought had come across his mind—in reference to certain proceedings in this House and elsewhere—"this people draw nigh unto me with their lips, and honor me with their mouth, but their hearts are far from me." His purpose, Mr. R. stated, was to make a motion in relation to the wife and children of the late Oliver Hazard Perry, of the United States Navy. It was his opinion, Mr. R. said, whether correct or not, that the country owed more to that man, in its late contest with Great Britain, than to any other whatever, always excepting Isaac Hull—that man who had first broken the prestige, the cuirass of British invincibility. He had frequently, Mr. R. said, heard persons of that country speak in terms of admiration of the achievement of Captain Hull, in his escape from a fleet of the enemy in the Constitution frigate; of the admirable seamanship which he had displayed; of his professional skill; but he had never heard any of them speak with cordial applause of his achievement with the Guerriere, that proud frigate of the first class which had carried her name, in defiance, emblazoned in large letters on her foretopsail, that the American pica-rooms might beware of His Majesty's ship, and make no mistakes. That was an event on which they were generally silent, or their praise very faint. Mr. R. believed that old England would consent that forty Pakenhams, with all their legions, should have been buried in the alluvial lands of the Mississippi, to take back the single action of the Guerriere; because that action had done more than any thing else to open the eyes of Europe, and dispel the illusion of British supremacy on the ocean. Next in glory to the victory over the Guerriere, was that on Lake Erie, by the gallant Perry; and this, Mr. R. said, was not inferior in lustre to any event in the naval history of England, from that of La Hogue, under Admiral Russell. One, said Mr. R., has shown us the way to victory with single ships, the other with fleets. Shall we suffer his family to melt up the plate that was given to him by his countrymen, by corporate and legislative bodies, in compliment to his gallantry, to buy bread? He would say no more, but at once offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That provision be made by law for the support of the family of the late Oliver Hazard Perry, Esq., of the United States Navy, and for the education of his children.

Mr. LOWNDES concurred with great cordiality in Mr. R.'s resolution. He felt in its fullest force the sentiment of gratitude to the man who had first taught his country to hope for victory by fleets, as well as by single ships; and Mr. L. said it was only because he had supposed that the House would not at this time give its approbation to a proposition such as Mr. RANDOLPH had offered, that he had contented himself with the very inferior one which he had submitted.

Mr. HAZARD, of Rhode Island, did not rise to say much on a subject which he said he could scarcely trust himself to speak on at all. But he rose to offer his thanks to the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from South Carolina, in behalf of the name of Perry—to thank them in behalf of the State which gave him birth—to thank them in the name of his amiable widow—to thank them in the name of their common country.

The resolution was adopted; and, on motion of Mr. RANDOLPH, a committee of three was appointed to bring in a bill in pursuance thereto.

MAINE AND MISSOURI.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the Maine bill (proposing to incorporate therein the Missouri bill, embracing the amendment called the compromise.)

The amendments having been read—

Mr. RANDOLPH delivered a speech of more than two hours length, against the feature of the amendments of the Senate, which proposes to exclude the further migration or transportation of slaves into any of the Territories of the United States north of 36° 30' north latitude.

Mr. RHEA commenced a speech; but, from the lateness of the hour, after two or three unsuccessful divisions on motions for the purpose, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 23.

Mr. KENT presented a petition of three hundred and sixty inhabitants of Georgetown, and that part of the county of Washington lying west of Rock Creek, in the District of Columbia, praying for certain alterations in the judicial system of the said District, which are therein described.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the support of the Government for the year 1820; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill to authorize the President of the United States to appoint a receiver of the public moneys and register of the land office for the district of Lawrence county, in the Arkansas Territory; which was read twice and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That the Committee on Manufactures be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of a company of Swiss emigrants, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. BRUSH submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for surveying, marking, and permanently establishing, the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio, beginning at a point north of the most northerly cape of the Miami Bay; running thence, due west, to intersect the western line of said State.

The resolution was read, when Mr. Cook moved to amend the same, by adding, as follows: "And, also, of running the boundary line between Indiana and Illinois."

The resolution and amendment were laid on the table.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of John O'Conner, deceased," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act further to extend the charter of the City of Washington," was read three times and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury, stating that in the list of balances due to the Government more than three years, or which remained unsettled on the books of the Register of the Treasury on the 1st of October last, and transmitted by him (the Comptroller) to this House, at the present session of Congress, he has perceived that Thomas Worthington, a collector of internal revenue, stands charged with four thousand four hundred and sixty-four dollars, when, in fact, the balance against him is only forty-four dollars and sixty-four cents; which letter was ordered to lie on the table.

MAINE AND MISSOURI.

The House then resumed the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill for the admission of Maine into the Union.

Mr. RHEA spoke about an hour on the subject, particularly on the inapplicability of the ordinance of 1787 to the territory west of the Mississippi.

A division of the question was called for; and, on the question, Will the House disagree to so much of the said amendments as is comprised in the words following, to wit:

"And to enable the people of Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States:

"Sec 2. And be it further enacted, That the inhabitants of that portion of the Missouri Territory included within the boundaries hereinafter designated, be, and they are hereby, authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government, and to assume such name as they shall deem proper."

It passed in the affirmative—yeas 93, nays 72, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Beecher, Boden, Brush, Buffum, Butler of New Hampshire, Campbell, Case, Clagett, Cook, Crafts, Cushman, Darlington, Dennison, Dewitt, Dickinson, Dowse, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Fay, Folger, Forrest, Fuller, Fullerton, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hazard, Hemphill, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Hill, Holmes, Hostetter, Kendall, Kinsey, Kinsley, Lathrop, Lincoln, Linn, Livermore, Lyman, Maclay, McLane of Delaware, Mallary, Marchand, Mason, Meech, R. Moore, S. NAYS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour, Bayly, Bloomfield, Brevard, Brown, Bryan, Burton, Burwell, Butler of Louisiana, Cannon, Cobb, Cocke, Crawford, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davidson, Earle, Edwards of North Carolina, Ervin, Fisher, Floyd, Garnett, Hardin, Hooks, Johnson, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Kent, Little, Lowndes, McCoy, McCreary, McLean of Kentucky, Meigs, Mercer, Metcalf, Neale, Newton, Overstreet, Parker of Virginia, Pinckney, Rankin, Reed, Rhea, Ringgold, Settle, Shaw, Simkins, Slocumb, Smith of Maryland, B. Smith of Virginia, A. Smyth of Virginia, Smith of North Carolina, Strother, Swearingen, Terrell, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Walker of North Carolina, Warfield, Williams of Virginia, and Williams of North Carolina.

So the House disagreed to the amendment of the Senate which proposed to annex the Missouri bill to the Maine bill.

The question was then taken on disagreeing to the residue of the amendments of the Senate, (the details of the Missouri bill) with the exception of that which embraces what is familiarly called the compromise amendment, and decided also by yeas and nays, in the affirmative—for disagreeing 102, against it 68, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Anderson, Baldwin, Beecher, Bloomfield, Boden, Brown, Brush, Buffum, Butler of New Hampshire, Campbell, Case, Clagett, Clark, Crafts, Cushman, Darlington, Dennison, Dewitt, Dickinson, Dowse, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Fay, Folger, Ford, Forrest, Fuller, Fullerton, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hazard, Hemphill, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Hill, Holmes, Hostetter, Kendall, Kinsey, Kinsley, Lathrop, Lincoln, Linn, Livermore, Lyman, Maclay, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Kentucky, Mallary, Marchand, Mason, Meech, Meigs, R. The question was then taken, Will the House disagree to the said ninth section, (being the last of the said amendments,) contained in the words following, to wit:

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That, in all that territory ceded by France to the United States, under the name of Louisiana, which lies north of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes north latitude, excepting only such part thereof as is included within the limits of the State contemplated by this act, slavery and involuntary servitude, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall be, and is hereby, forever prohibited: Provided, always, That any person escaping into the same, from whom labor or service is lawfully claimed, in any State or Territory of the United States, such fugitive may be lawfully reclaimed, and conveyed to the person claiming his or her labor or service, as aforesaid:

Thus the House rejected all the amendments of the Senate to the Maine bill.

THE MISSOURI BILL.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on this bill. The proposed restriction being still under consideration,

Mr. EDWARDS, of Connecticut, resumed the argument which he commenced on Monday in favor of the restriction, and spoke about half an hour in continuation. His speech is given entire in preceding pages.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, said that, after the consumption of so much time, and the exercise of so great talents upon this subject, he would relieve the committee by stating that he did not rise to make a speech, but merely to give an opinion; that it was not with a vain desire of mingling in debate, nor even with the pleasing hope of effecting conviction, that he ventured to approach this momentous subject. But, sir, my desire is (for what reasons I will leave to the Committee to judge) to state the ground upon which I am willing to meet these pamphleteers; those very great men who direct the movements of town meetings,

(of which, thank Heaven, there has yet been none in the State which I have, in part, the honor to represent; the people there seem disposed first to hear what Congress has to say upon the subject;) and, sir, so far as in me lies, to answer the more respected arguments of members of this Committee. I said, sir, that this question was a momentous one; and, indeed, if upon any question involving in it any degree of national importance, one half the Representatives of the people should differ in opinion with the other, it could be viewed as no other than a question of that description. But, sir, when, on a question acknowledged by the gentlemen themselves to be a mere question of expediency, one geographical half of the Union is arrayed against the other; and when we see a disposition manifested to proceed at all hazards; when a determination is avowed to sever the people of Missouri; to drive a line through the centre of her population, and to say to those on the right, you shall enjoy your property, and to those on the left, you shall not; and to both, that neither of you shall come into the Union; no man who regards the interest of his country can view this as any other than a question of the last importance. Freedom and slavery, we are told, are the parties now before us, and we are reminded of the blessings of liberty, of the voice of humanity and religion, and of the miseries of slavery; and, indeed, it would seem, by the use, or rather abuse, of those broad and comprehensive terms, that by some revolution in human affairs, or rather by some beneficent dispensation of Divine Providence, an opportunity had been afforded to this nation to make all men equal, or at least to make all men free. Would to Heaven this were the fact. For, sir, without hesitation I declare, that, if any gentleman shall propose a Constitutional and practicable scheme of general emancipation, he shall not be without a second. I would break every fetter which binds those unfortunate beings to absolute obedience; I would loose every chain, save those which bind man to his fellow man; but, sir, I at once say, I have not the power. The Constitution which I hold in my hand is about my own age; but, sir, which of us shall die first, I think very problematical. So soon as my mind was sufficiently expanded to read, and in some degree to understand, this instrument, I found that at the same time, nay, almost in the same sentence, that it recognised me as a freeman, as a son of the Confederacy, it recognised the existence of slavery. This same instrument has placed me on this floor a creature, in my present character, of its own formation. This instrument I have sworn to support, and to it I will look for authority to act.

And, sir, permit me to observe to gentlemen who talk about the law of God and the law of Nature, that their speeches would much better suit a convention about to form a Constitution than they do a Congress convened under a Constitution which they have sworn to support. To say that slavery is an evil, that it is contrary to the laws of nature and of nature's God, does not prove that the Constitution has not recognised its existence; neither does it prove that the power to remedy the evil has, by the States, been surrendered to the General Government, believing themselves (as they must have done) incompetent to the management of their slaves, or to their emancipation. When gentlemen talk of the exercise of power, we ask them to show us the grant; for we well remember that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." We call upon them for their charter, and it is a most unfortunate circumstance that, in attempting to comply with our request, gentlemen cannot agree among themselves as to the source of this power. Some gentlemen have been so sagacious as to ascertain that it is to be found in the preamble to the Constitution, which declares the object of its formation to be, in part, "to provide for the common defence and general welfare." Sir, I did hope that not more than one gentleman would have resorted to this as a source of power; and I will only say to those gentlemen, that their arguments speak but little in favor of the good sense of the framers of the Constitution. If in the preamble a power be granted to do whatever, in the estimation of humanity, of religion, of conscience, may be calculated to promote the general welfare, the preamble itself would have been a sufficient Constitution; it gives them unbounded powers, and there the framers of the Constitution ought then to have stopped.

Sir, although this argument is not worthy of refutation, it proves, incontestably, to what alarming lengths we may be carried by misguided zeal in the cause of humanity, of religion, of our conscience, as we are taught to believe by those whose interest it may be to drive us forward in such unwarrantable measures. Several other sources of the power about to be exercised, were discovered at the commencement of this debate; all of which, I believe, have been abandoned, with the exception of two, the first of which, they tell us, is to be found in the 3d section of the 4th article of the Constitution. The particular clause to which we are referred is in these words: "The Congress 'shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory 'or other property belonging to the United States.'" Let us for a moment inquire by what this territory has been acquired? The answer is easy; it was acquired by the joint funds of all. And for whose benefit? For the common benefit of all. When the territory thus acquired is ready to be populated, and emigration is invited, how may we, who have purchased it with the common fund, for the common benefit, remove there? The answer, to a plain unlettered man, of common sense and common honesty, would seem to be, that we may go there, taking with us whatever, by the Constitution, is recognised as being ours. It is here unnecessary to attempt to prove a right in our slaves. Gentlemen admit it; that is, so long as we keep them in the old States. But, sir, it is stated in a speech which I have read, being the substance, as was stated, of two speeches delivered in the Senate on this subject, that the right to make all needful rules and regulations includes within it the right to determine what rules and regulations are needful; and, therefore, I take the conclusion to be, that if, in our conscience, (for we must always keep our conscience at ease upon matters of this kind,) we believe it to be needful, we may set at liberty every slave we may happen to find there. If, sir, the Constitution consisted of that part of the section which has been quoted only, this argument might be (and I am disposed to think would only be) a specious one. It is a species of the same kind of argument as that to which I have before alluded, which was founded on the preamble to the Constitution. It ought to be remembered that the same instrument by which Congress have acquired a right to make rules and regulations for the Territory, has guaranteed to the master a right to his slave; and if your rule or regulation be inconsistent with, or is calculated even in its effects to deprive him of this right, your rule or regulation is unconstitutional. But we are told of the ordinance of 1787, which may be called a condition upon which the United States purchased the country northwest of the Ohio river, from the State of Virginia. The condition was, that slavery should not there be tolerated. It is not necessary here to stop to inquire whether the United States can purchase territory, and, if they can, whether they cannot purchase it on conditions. I am willing to concede to gentlemen the validity of this celebrated ordinance; and what does it prove? It proves that the United States purchased a tract of country from Virginia, on condition that slaves should not be permitted to go there. Now, sir, I am ready to ask, why was this proviso in the contract? Why was it necessary for Virginia, or why was it necessary for the United States, by this ordinance, to prevent their citizens from emigrating with their slaves to that country? Does it not pre-suppose a right in every American citizen to have removed there with their slaves, had it not been for this ordinance? It certainly does. When we come hereafter to speak of the purchase of Louisiana, we shall see the difference between the two cases. I shall now call your attention to the only remaining source which I shall notice, from which gentlemen derive the power to restrict Missouri; that is, they say, to be found in the first clause of the section last mentioned, "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." And it is conceded that this clause is not imperative, but that Congress may exercise its discretion whether to admit at all, or upon what conditions a State shall be admitted. It will not be denied that, when Congress is under no obligations other than those imposed by the Constitution, it may admit or reject a State, as in the case of a new State formed out of an old State, where there has been no contract, either express or implied, between Congress and such new State, as to its admission. But I deny that Congress can impose this restriction, or any other, upon a State, as a condition upon which it shall be admitted; but, on the contrary, I think I shall be able to show clearly, that the framers of the Constitution contemplated new States coming into this Union, with or without this description of property, as the case might be; and to do this, sir, I beg leave to refer you to the third clause of the second section of the first article of the Constitution. It is in these words: "Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons." What other persons? Slaves, it is admitted. But, say gentlemen, this is only applicable to the good old thirteen States, and not to new States or Territories. Well, sir, let us proceed with the same clause, and see what further is to be done within "the several States which may be included within this Union." "The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct." The enumeration, within every subsequent term of ten years, of what States, I demand to know? Of the good old thirteen States? I suppose so; for, most assuredly, Mr. Chairman, if the first mentioned part of the clause only relates to old States, the latter part cannot relate to new ones. Then, sir, by what authority do you take the census of any State which has been admitted into this Union since the formation of the Constitution?

This is a dilemma in which we shall always be found, when we attempt to exercise powers which have been retained by the people. But, sir, if, notwithstanding what has been stated, it be yet contended that Congress has the power to impose conditions upon Missouri, let us see whether, by the treaty of 1803, by which Louisiana was acquired, the right to impose this condition has not been surrendered. By this treaty Louisiana was ceded to the United States in full sovereignty. There was no condition (as in the case of the cession of the Northwestern Territory) that slavery should not exist there; but, on the contrary, by the third article of said treaty it is declared, "That the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted, as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities, of citizens of the United States; and, in the meantime, they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess."

Now, sir, it is a fact, which cannot be denied, that there were slaves in Louisiana at the date of this treaty, and that the property of the master in his slaves had not only been recognised by the Government of France, but by the Governments of Spain and England, and maintained by each of them. Slaves, then, were a species of property existing in the country at the time of its purchase; and can any man suppose that the contracting parties were ignorant of this fact? They knew that this description of property did exist there, and with this knowledge they did agree to maintain the inhabitants in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, &c. They are to be admitted into the Union as soon as possible. And when is it possible to admit a State into this Union? It certainly is possible to admit a State without this condition; it was possible long since to admit her; and we have not done it, and we still refuse to do it, unless she will agree to set at liberty her slaves. But, say gentlemen, this condition which we propose is in the nature of a compact; we do not, say they, attempt to set at liberty her slaves, we only say to her that this is the condition upon which she shall come into the Union. It amounts, then, to this: we have made one contract with Missouri, which is found in the third article of the treaty of 1802; we now tell her that we do not like that contract much, that we are not exactly willing to comply with it, but that, if she will make another contract with us, we will fulfil our first mentioned engagement. Sir, this is a method of fulfilling contracts which cannot be understood by the honest and unsophisticated yeomanry of Missouri, or of any other country.

But, sir, suppose we yield to gentlemen the Constitutional power—the question will then arise, ought it now, under existing circumstances, to be exercised? I put this question to those who contend for restriction. Is it possible for you to effect your object? Suppose you have in this House a majority of votes—what then? Do not the Journals of the Senate show us what there has been the fate of this measure? If you persevere in your present course, Maine and Missouri must both sink. What then will you have effected? Will you have prevented, as you propose to do, the extension of slavery? No, Missouri will still be left open for the reception of slaves. She will continue rapidly to increase every description of her population. And do gentlemen suppose that she is to be kept in a state of vassalage forever, because she will not submit to the imperial dictates of their consciences? Sir, we have been asked, during this debate, what will Missouri do, if we refuse to admit her; will she resist the Government? Sir, gentlemen ought to remember, that, although Missouri be an infant, she reposes upon the laps of eleven mothers. And, let me tell you, sir, that, if ever Missouri subscribes to this humiliating condition, her name will be written in characters of blood.

Sir, I hope Missouri, let her fate be what it may, will continue to act (as she has heretofore done) with moderation. I know, sir, that she will not, driven by anger or despair, appeal to the last resort of men or nations. She will not, she cannot war with you. But, sir, push these measures; convince her that upon this condition alone can she be received, and, with all the calmness, but with all the majesty, of insulted justice, she may tell you that she will govern herself. Sir, the day will come when the people of this country will coolly and fairly investigate this question. Then, sir, will be demanded of their representatives, why for naught they have sacrificed Maine and Missouri both. Then, sir, will you be required to lay your finger on that part of the charter of the liberties of the people from which you derive this power Then, sir, shall we be asked, if we cannot be bound by a solemn treaty, by what we can be bound? Then, sir, shall we be reminded that all powers, not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

THURSDAY, February 24.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, enclosing a report of the Third Auditor of the Treasury, and of the Commissary General of Subsistence, in relation to "the expense of furnishing the Army with rations for one year, ending on the 14th of April, 1818, exhibiting the average cost per ration, and also the average cost per ration for one year, under the provisions of the act of the 14th of April, 1818, entitled 'An act to regulate the staff of the Army,' rendered in obedience to the resolution of this House of the 17th day of December last; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, made in obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 1st of March, 1819, "directing him to transmit to Congress, at an early period in the next session, a general statement of the condition of the Bank of the United States and its offices, similar to the return made to him by the bank; and a statement exhibiting, as nearly as may be practicable, the amount of capital invested in the different chartered banks in the several States, and the District of Columbia; the amount of notes issued by those banks, and in circulation; the public and private deposits in them; the amount of loans and discounts made by them, and remaining unpaid; and the total quantity of specie they possess; and also to report such measures as, in his opinion, may be expedient to procure and retain a sufficient quantity of gold and silver coin in the United States, or to supply a circulating medium in the place of specie, adapted to the exigencies of the country, and within the power of the Government;" which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported a bill designating the ports within which, only, foreign armed vessels shall be permitted to enter; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. STORRS, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of the Muhheconnuck, or Stockbridge nation of Indians, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill, confirming the title of the Mohican, or Stockbridge nation of Indians, to certain lands; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill for the establishment of additional land offices in the State of Illinois.

On motion of Mr. CRAWFORD, it was Resolved, That an act of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, entitled "An act to grant certain powers to the commissioners of pilotage for the port of Darien, and to authorize them to collect tonnage duty on vessels," be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and that said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of giving the consent of Congress to the operation of said act.

On motion of Mr. STROTHER, a committee was appointed to inquire into the circumstances under which powder and lead have been loaned by the War Department, or by any officers of the United States Army, to certain individuals, and into the causes and extent of delinquencies in the Paymaster's and Quartermaster's departments, and that they be authorized to report by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. STROTHER, TRACY, HOLMES, JONES, of Tennessee, and ROBERTSON, were appointed the said committee.

On motion of Mr. TRACY, the Secretary of the War Department was directed to communicate to this House copies of any agreements which may have been made with the firm of Stull and Williams, or their surety or sureties, relative to the loan to the said Stull and Williams, of powder, by the War Department, or the repayment thereof; and also to inform this House whether any moneys, and what sums, have been advanced to the said Stull and Williams, or to their surety or sureties, on any contract or contracts made with them, or either of them, relative thereto; and also to state the funds from which said advances have been made.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose to make a motion, which, he said, he should very much prefer to have made by any other member than himself, but which he felt it to be his duty to bring forward; and he trusted that, whatever others might think, or however others might act, he should never feel a disposition to shrink from the discharge of his duty. It was impossible, Mr. R. continued, for any man to see what was going on here—abuse heaped upon abuse, like Pelion upon Ossa, until it was impossible to tell where it would end—it threatened to reach the skies. This House, he said, was emphatically intrusted with the purse-strings of the nation. He hoped it would not prove to be the case that the people had, according to a well known maxim of law, trusted the lamb to the custody of the wolf. He had said that this House was intrusted with the purse-strings of the nation; and it behooved it, as the grand inquest of the nation, also, to inquire into abuses of every description, but first, to pluck the beam from its own eye, before it attempted to take out the mote from its brother's eye. It had been his misfortune, Mr. R. said, especially since the agitation of this Missouri question, not to be "able to sleep o' nights," and he consequently often rose before daybreak. These early risings had been the means of putting him on the scent—he was not sure of the true game—but of something like speculation or abuses, in a very small way, in the contingent expenses of this House. It behooves us, said Mr. R., as the guardians of this imperium in imperio, if we are arraigned at the public bar—much more if we arraign others—that we appear with clean hands—that there be no blot or stain upon them. In the course of my lucubrations, I have sometimes started a question which, although we may approximate to the truth, is as impossible to be ascertained as the quadrature of the circle; and will, no doubt, be discovered with the solution of that opprobrium of geometry, with the philosopher's stone, the perpetual motion, or the grand arcanum—the elixir vite itself—when men shall quaff immortality and joy—or rather misery—for death, sir, with all his terrors, is our best friend, if we know how to use life, and comes to deliver us from the vexation and strife of this trumpery world. I have, continued Mr. R., endeavored to ascertain the pay of a member of Congress; but, with all the means I have used, it has eluded my search, and will continue so to do, I have no doubt, to the end. Those who write circular letters, and keep up a voluminous correspondence, and those who receive more letters than others receive, through the privilege of franking and stationery, a greater compensation than others. He would mention one fact to show how it is the nature of abuse to grow on what it feeds on—and it may be ominous; it may “cut love”—they had made him, for the first time in twenty years, a present, at this session, of a knife; and he believed he should carry it home as a spolia optima, and hand it down as a trophy of his public service of some twenty years, nearly fourteen of which—just double the time, Mr. R. said, that Jacob had served for Rachel—had been spent in opposition to what is called Government—for he commenced his political apprenticeship in the ranks of opposition; and, could he add fourteen more to them, he supposed some political Laban would double his servitude, and condemn him to toil in the barren field of opposition; for he despaired of seeing any man elected President whose conduct he should entirely approve—he should never be in favor at Court, as he had, somehow, as great an alacrity at getting into a minority as honest Jack Falstaff had at sinking. It was, perhaps, the place he was best fitted for, Mr. R., said, as he had not strength to encounter the details and drudgery of business; habit had rendered it familiar to him; and, after all, it was not without its sweets as well as its biters, since it involved the glorious privilege of finding fault—one very dear to the depraved condition of poor human nature.

But in relation to the contingent fund of this House, said Mr. R., when he had the honor of belonging to the Committee of Ways and Means, they were so incessantly pestered with accounts for candles, and wood, and molasses, and water, and what not, that at last, at his suggestion, a committee was raised expressly to audit and settle the accounts of the contingent expenses of this House. People were constantly coming to that committee and complaining that they could not get paid, although the clerk showed their receipts in full. They were asked how was this? And were answered by these men, that they were obliged to give receipts in full to the clerk, before they could get their contracts, and then he would not pay them, it being a personal engagement of his own. They were told by the committee that it was an affair between themselves and the clerk—that they had bought the contracts by letting the clerk have the use of their money, and that if their sweet turned out sour, they must make the best of a bargain creditable to neither party, and made at our as well as their expense. Whether or not they ever got paid, Mr. R. did not know. He knew that that clerk was a public defaulter, and he was not sure the balance due by him had been paid. Mr. R. cast no imputation on the present clerk. The abuse to which he referred, was not under his control. Mr. R. then read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk do prepare and lay before this House, a statement of the annual amount of the contingent expenses thereof, from the commencement of the present Government, to the 30th of November last; distinguishing the expense of stationery, printing, fuel, lights, furniture, attendants, and their assistants; with a statement of the amount and nature of the perquisites of each.

Mr. R. wished the accounts of the present session kept separate, for they would, he thought, constitute a curiosity, a volume in themselves. This, it would be observed, was not a joint resolution. He deemed too reverently of the honor of the other body, and knew too well what was due to comity and courtesy between the two Houses, to meddle with their affairs. Let them manage their affairs in their own way, said Mr. R.: it is a maxim very dear to me on other subjects, [meaning the Missouri question, it was understood] as well as this.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE MISSOURI BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the Missouri bill—

Mr. FULLER, of Massachusetts, spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, since the establishment of our Constitution, a more interesting subject than the question now before the Committee has never been debated in the Legislature of the nation. The interests and character of our country may be involved in the issue “whether a new State, beyond the original limits of the United States and their dependent Territories, shall be admitted into the Union, without providing by her constitution, and as a condition precedent, that the further introduction of slavery shall be forever prohibited?” It is in vain, sir, that gentlemen would confine the discussion of such a question as this to the hall of legislation. It is vain to attempt to stifle the public feeling and the public voice. The freemen of our country can never be insensible, when the rights of a numerous portion of their fellow-creatures, natives of the same soil, are in controversy; they will never be silent, when the victims of oppression require an advocate. Instead of censure, which some gentlemen have so lavishly bestowed on the press for its wide diffusion of the public opinion, I rejoice that such an organ exists, which inspires and communicates, with the rapidity of lightning, a simultaneous sentiment in various and remote sections of our country. Public opinion, Mr. Chairman, is the real sovereignty of the people. This is the potent talisman which must forever hold in check the projects of intriguers, and arrest the enterprises of ambition. The unprincipled sycophant, who would willingly enlist himself under the banner of power and patronage, cannot forget that he is amenable to this tribunal. He dares not encounter the contempt and odium of an enlightened public, and reluctantly does his duty. Nor is it unimportant to remark, that, without such a salutary influence of the people, through the primary assemblies, their petitions, and the press, as well as by the frequent recurrence of the election of their rulers, neither our Constitution nor any free Government could long exist. The intelligent and patriotic statesmen who framed our great national compact were fully sensible of this. The elective franchise is the pivot on which the instrument turns, and the liberty of the press and the right of petition are strongly guarded. Surely, then, the gentlemen who complain that the "press groans with pamphlets," and that "towns, cities, and even obscure villages, teem with politicians," who are "loading our table with memorials, petitions, and remonstrances," have no reason to consider legislative rights as invaded. It is even to be hoped, that those who disregard the wishes of their constituents will at least condescend to listen to their reasons. And let it be remembered that many of these memorials emanate from statesmen by no means inferior to the members of this or any other legislative body.

But, sir, it is not merely the American public that takes cognizance of, and will pass judgment upon our decision of the present controversy. All Europe, the whole civilized world, are spectators of the scene. Our Declaration of Independence, our Revolution, our State institutions, and, above all, the great principles of our Federal Constitution, are arrayed on one side, and our legislative acts and national measures, the practical specification of our real principles and character, on the other. If we proclaim the glorious truth, that "all men are born free and equal" in our constitutions, and, while acting under them, forge the chains of millions of our unoffending species, can we expect to escape derision and contempt? Despots and their minions may justly despise, while the wise and good of every nation must pity our infatuation, or execrate our hypocrisy.

Some gentlemen have affected to treat these memorials as the ebullitions of passion; of unenlightened mobs, wrought up to angry hostility against the Southern States. Nothing is more unfounded. The materials of which mobs are created are not to be found in those parts of the Union from whence these memorials come. Even in times of national distress, assemblages of the most suffering classes, though zealous, and sometimes tumultuous, are never outrageous. Their keenest resentment can seldom be hurried, by cunning and misrepresentation, into violation of law. On the present occasion, their proceedings were generally as cool and dispassionate as their Representatives can exhibit on this floor. The Legislatures themselves, in many of the States, with the usual deliberation of such bodies, passed resolutions of similar import. And, so far from hostility to the South having any share in those proceedings, it will be found that sentiments of respect for the Southern States, and a strong explicit recognition of their Constitutional rights to hold their slaves, subject only to their State regulations, are fully and clearly avowed.

In determining on the right of Congress, by the Constitution, to require the restriction of slavery as a condition on which a new State shall be admitted into the Union, it may be useful to consider the general objects of the union or confederation of the States; and the Constitution, as the instrument, by which those objects were to be effected. To preserve the citizens of the United States in all their rights against foreign and domestic violence, was the general object; to all this its provisions were intended to be subservient. The interpretation of any section or clause must always keep this paramount purpose in view. The municipal concerns of the particular States were to be regulated by themselves so far as should be compatible with the exercise of the powers conferred on the National Government. As a general line of demarcation, it may be sufficient to say, that the General Government have the direction of the external, and the States of the internal, regulations. It is obvious, however, that the faithful and effectual performance of the high duties assigned to the Federal Government, must often require the exercise of important functions within the limits of the particular States; such as laying and collecting taxes and duties, levying armies, establishing roads and other communications with the frontier, essential to defence against invasion. The power to admit new States, given to Congress by the third section of the fourth article, whether it related to those which might be formed by dismemberment of the original States, or to those to be formed in territories, could not but include a power and a duty in Congress to ascertain whether the proposed State possessed the character and interior qualities, which should entitle her to admission. The power to ascertain and determine could not imply less than a power to refuse, in case the requisite character and qualities were wanting. If this be established, though I am aware it has been often denied, but, as I think, with little plausibility, it is unnecessary to explore the other articles of the Constitution on the present occasion. Our only inquiry then is, whether a system of interior regulation in the proposed State, by which slaves are to be admitted and indefinitely multiplied, is of such an objectionable character, as to warrant a refusal by Congress to admit; or what is exactly equivalent, to announce, as an indispensable condition of being admitted, that the new State must provide by her Constitution against the further extension of the offensive system. Our opponents seem to admit these principles in part; but to confine the attention of Congress to the population, and so far only to the constitution of the candidate for admission, as to see that it is republican. Even from this concession it would not be difficult to show, that enough is admitted to authorize the restriction of slavery by the Constitution, as nothing is more easily demonstrated, than that the establishment of slavery is a direct violation of the very first principle of republican government—political equality. Some of the adversaries of restriction have said, that, if Congress possess the right to inhibit slavery from the new States, why require their consent to the measure? We ought, say they, to enact at once the prohibition, and our asking their consent is an acknowledgment that we have no right to enforce it. While they remain territories, I would reply, we may prohibit slavery by an act of legislation; our power being equivalent, by the third section, fourth article, to that of the State Legislatures within their respective jurisdiction. This power, however, on their becoming States, would be transferred to their own legislatures, unless restrained by a fundamental article of their constitutions, founded on compact. This is the only way in which the National Government can insure a continuance of the prohibition.

Individual States are not restricted by the Constitution from making treaties or compacts with the General Government, though they are so restricted as to foreign nations, and also without the consent of Congress for making such compacts with each other. The act of Congress itself imparts to the territory, which is proposed to be made a State, a sort of corporate existence, by which it is enabled to choose delegates for a convention, to form a constitution, and to perform all the acts of individuality necessary to a consummation of the object. Among those acts is the making of fundamental compacts, and engrafting them upon its Constitution. An instance of this sort is the agreement of most of the new States, stipulated in their several constitutions, to exempt the lands of the United States, within their limits, from taxation. By the same authority they may stipulate to exclude slavery, and any other reasonable condition. The States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, accordingly, stipulated to prohibit slavery, in compliance with the famous ordinance of 13th July, 1787, an ordinance which alone will consecrate to posterity the virtuous and enlightened members of the last Congress under the old Confederation. It was not the venerable individuals who composed that body, but the feeble powers of the system under which they were constituted, which had lost the confidence of the nation.

In supposing the contrary, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. PINCKNEY) must allow me to differ from him. He will find the names of those patriots foremost in the service and confidence of their country for many years after the period in question, and, indeed, during the remainder of their active lives. The admission of a new State into the Union is no act of legislation, but a compact merely. The parties are, Congress, in behalf of the United States, on the one hand, and the new State on the other. The compact contains the stipulation of the latter to support the burdens, and to perform the duties of a member of the political family; and of the former to admit her to share the legislative power and the common protection. The Federal Constitution itself was merely a compact between the thirteen original members of the Union.

It has been earnestly contended, however, that, when the word State is used in the Constitution, it has a well defined meaning, and that a body politic, possessing other powers and attributes, whether more or less, cannot be called a State in that instrument; and another gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWMEDE,) has endeavored to show, that, if Congress should admit into the Union a body politic, possessing powers or attributes different from those possessed by the original States, it would be an assumption of power not conferred by the Constitution. The power to admit States, given by the section above-mentioned, means, he argues, to admit other bodies politic with political powers exactly commensurate with those of the States then existing, and consequently, to admit other and different bodies politic, must be a usurpation. Hence, he proceeded to show that such an innovation might lead to the most dangerous consequences; to compromises and conditions on the part of the new States, which might keep them in a state of vassalage and dependence on the General Government, and make them ready instruments to subjugate and oppress the original members of the Confederacy. Such consequences may, indeed, excite alarm, but they are utterly chimerical.

The authority of the General Government over the Territories, while they remain such, is very extensive; "to make all needful rules and regulations respecting them, comprehending legislative and executive jurisdiction. As these territories can never demand admission into the Union as of right, it is apparent that any approximation by them towards the full enjoyment of the attributes and powers of the original States, must diminish the danger of their becoming instruments of ambition or tyranny in the hands of the General Government. And, if Congress have discretionary power to continue them in their territorial and dependent condition, or to admit them as a States, with all the rights and attributes, it would be extraordinary if this full consummation of rights as States could not be attained by degrees, but must, of necessity, be the effect of a single act. And, unless it is contended that the expression, Congress "may admit," means Congress shall admit, by which all discretion is taken away, and the power of admission a mere mockery, it must be conceded, that the Territories are to remain such, until Congress shall consider a change of their condition consistent with the spirit of the original confederacy, and the well being of the existing States. The gradual advancement of the Territories to the condition of the original States, is not only prudent and reasonable, but has been the common mode in regard to them. They are first invested with powers of local legislation, subject always to the revision of Congress; a revision not unfrequently exercised, and thus they are trained to a knowledge of the functions of independent members of the national family.

The last mentioned gentleman has earnestly contended that, as the original States are all politically equal, so the new States already admitted, and all hereafter to be admitted, must necessarily be so; that the inequality of the political rights of any State with her sister States, must disturb the balance of the Constitution, and endanger the existence of the Union. To this objection, somewhat differently stated, I have already attempted to reply, by showing that the Constitution contemplated the existence of territories, whose continuance as such must depend on the discretion of Congress, in the sound exercise of their legitimate powers. But let us approach the argument more nearly, and see how far this political equality of the States is essential to our national Union; how far, in that view, it is established by the Constitution itself, and has been maintained in admitting new States.

The population, wealth, and physical advantages of some States, are very far superior to those of others. The civil institutions, the system of education, and the moral character and habits of industry in some States, give them a decisive superiority in those respects; all which create an actual and unavoidable inequality among the several members of the Union, which no theoretical principle of equal political rights established by the Constitution, if it were even attempted, could effectually counteract. Thus, the Southern States possess the great staples of agriculture; the Eastern and Middle are distinguished by their industry and commercial enterprise, and by their civil and literary institutions; while the States in the West possess, in different degrees, all these advantages. In the event of internal dissensions, and of actual hostility, between the different sections of our country, these physical and moral inequalities, and not an imaginary or real difference in the rights of the several States under the Constitution, would lead to fatal consequences, and endanger our existence as a free and united people. In truth, the political equality of the States is nowhere preserved, since the old confederation expired, but in the Senate. In the other branch of the Legislature, the difference between the largest and smallest States, is more than twenty to one. Even the principle itself, which is the basis of representation in that branch, is clearly unequal, and was at the time when the Constitution was established. In many of the States, the black population was, at that time, in a condition of slavery; in others slavery was not tolerated; now slaves are either persons or property; if the former, then the States which contained them were entitled to include them in their census, and to send representatives to Congress in proportion to their whole number. On the other hand, if slaves, having no political rights or influence in the States, are mere property, the States ought not to send any representatives whatever, in consequence of possessing any amount of such a commodity. I do not mention this for the purpose of complaint, but merely to show that a fundamental principle of political inequality is to be found in the Constitution itself, by which the slaveholding States have either twenty-five representatives too many, or about sixteen too few. The gentlemen may choose either branch of the dilemma.

But, sir, I cannot forbear expressing my surprise, that the honorable gentleman, and several others, who have insisted on the same argument, should have shut their eyes on the palpable fact, that all the new States admitted since the Constitution was formed, have been required to establish a fundamental article in their several constitutions, which not merely abridges, but absolutely mutilates their sovereignty. In all the thirteen original States the vacant lands within their limits were the property of the States, respectively; in the new States, all lands are retained in fee simple, as the property of the United States; and each State expressly stipulates and provides, by its constitution, never to levy any tax on the lands of the United States within its limits, until five years after it shall be alienated. If any attribute of sovereign power is more precious than all others, it is the right of taxation; of providing means for the support of Government; for internal improvement, and external protection. Yet this concession has invariably been required on the one part, and yielded on the other; nor has the vigilance of the guardians of State rights, and of the political equality and sovereignty of the States, ever sounded the alarm for this gigantic usurpation. Let these gentlemen, too, who treat this right of taxation as a matter of slight concern, reflect for a moment on the power it gives to the National Government, to raise up within the limits of any or all the new States, an adverse influence, capable of controlling their measures. These lands, so held, in the bosom of the new States, in most instances, constitute above three-fourths of their territory. The National Government, instead of selling them in the market, as it has hitherto done, may give leases for ninety-nine, or nine hundred and ninety-nine years, either of which would produce as high a price as the alienation of the fee itself. They would in that case, however, remain still the property of the United States, and consequently, by the articles of agreement between the United States and the new States, and by the constitution of the latter, they could never be taxed by the State. The burdens of the taxation must, in that case, fall on the other portion of the citizens, and the tenants and lessees of the United States would be exempted. Does not the existence of such a power in the United States impair the sovereign authority of the new States, and, therefore, produce on their part "political inequality," a vast inferiority? That the National Government may probably never abuse the power, and may even employ it with a paternal view to the welfare of new States themselves, as well as for the advantage of the United States, has no tendency to weaken the force of the argument. It is probable, however, that the United States will not, for many years, or perhaps for centuries, alienate all the national domains in the new States, and such as are not alienated must be exempted from taxation.

The right of taxation, I have already remarked, is one of the indisputable attributes of a sovereign Power. Of those retained by the States from the National Government, scarcely one is more indispensable to their existence, as bodies politic. Gentlemen who are so jealous, when the least approach is made, that may bring the nation in contact with the bulwarks of State sovereignty, ought surely to admit, that a State, which is interdicted from touching, for public purposes, one half the territory within her limits, is shorn of half her beams. Instead of this, however, they seem to consider it a trifling restriction, while the restriction of slavery, now proposed to Missouri, as the condition of her becoming a State, is an all-devouring monster, which is to swallow up the liberties of a continent! The right of legitimate taxation is nothing; the right of establishing and perpetuating slavery is every thing—the dearest of all rights; without which, a new State is degraded to vassalage, unworthy to hold her lofty station in this confederated empire!

And how does it appear that the right to establish slavery is an attribute of sovereignty? Whence is it derived, and how is it proved? A nation possessing sovereign power is not amenable to any human tribunal for its acts, in relation to its own citizens or subjects; but it does not follow from thence, that it has a legitimate right, though it has the power, to do justice! It cannot take the property of one, and bestow it arbitrarily on another; it cannot punish the innocent, or deprive them of their property or liberty. If a sovereign State were to establish the condition of slavery, it must do it by the grossest usurpation; and it might as well fix on any other distinction between the free-man and the slave, as that of color. A difference of stature, or of strength, would be much more natural. No gentleman, that I have heard, has denied that slavery was an usurpation as well as an evil; and yet it is contended that we have no right to require the State of Missouri to prevent its further existence there.

A gentleman from Virginia, who spoke early in the debate, asserted, that the question was not, whether slavery was an evil, or whether it was within the legitimate exercise of sovereignty to establish it; but, whether the other States, Virginia for instance, not being prohibited from acting freely to establish or abolish it, the State of Missouri, and other new States, could be restricted or controlled in relation to it. Virginia, said he, and Pennsylvania, and the other original States, exercised their sovereign right to judge whether the establishment of the condition of slavery was an attribute of sovereignty or not; therefore Missouri cannot, without usurpation, be deprived of the same right. The argument from the power permitted to the original States, being founded on the dogma that the new States must have the same powers, has been already proved to be fallacious, and the restriction of taxes upon the public lands has been adduced as a refutation in practice. But, as the gentleman last alluded to placed great stress on this refined argument, and exerted his ingenuity to show that the "terms and conditions" prescribed by Virginia, and agreed to by Kentucky, as the price of her admission into the Union, did not impair the sovereign rights of either, I shall devote a moment's attention to prove, that those "terms and conditions" did, in fact, restrict both Virginia and Kentucky in the exercise of an attribute of sovereign power much more clear than the right of establishing slavery. Passing over the stipulations in relation to taxing the lands of non-residents, I shall confine my observations to the seventh condition, which provides, that the navigation of the river Ohio shall be free to all the citizens of the two States, and of the United States, and that the jurisdiction of the river shall be concurrent only with the States on the opposite shore. Now, it may be said, that the navigation of the river between Kentucky and Virginia on one side, and Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, on the other, would have been common to the citizens of the States bordering on the river, and perhaps even to all the citizens of the United States, without this stipulation. But here I turn the gentleman's argument against him. The States bounding on the Connecticut river, for instance, have never stipulated that the navigation of that river shall be free to all the citizens of the United States. They are permitted to "judge for themselves," whether they have a sovereign right to exclude the citizens of other States from that river or not; therefore, the stipulation in question between Virginia and Kentucky deprives both those States of the right of judging, which the States on Connecticut river possess. Vermont bounds on the Connecticut river on one side, and Lake Champlain on the other. She was admitted into the Union without making any stipulation with regard to the navigation or jurisdiction of either of those waters; the States of Virginia and Kentucky, in a case exactly parallel, have both submitted to a restriction by compact. They can no longer "judge" on that subject for themselves, and, consequently, are deprived of one of the attributes of sovereignty in the same manner that Missouri, by consenting to prohibit slavery, will be deprived of one of her's. The right of navigating public rivers, by citizens of other than adjoining States, may be questionable; the right of a sovereign State to tax all lands within its limits is undoubted; but the right to hold human beings in perpetual and hopeless slavery is only found in the codes of barbarians and despots.

As far as precedents (some of them nearly contemporaneous with the Constitution itself) contribute to disclose its true interpretation, it may be remarked, that not only Ohio, but every new State, has been required to stipulate sundry articles, as the conditions on which alone they were admitted. The exemption of the public lands from taxation was one of the most prominent; and the restriction of slavery, in the very words proposed to Missouri by the amendment now under consideration, was required of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. The ordinance of 1787, before referred to, framed almost at the same moment with the Constitution, and recognised among the first acts of the first Congress under it, may fairly be considered as a formal and practical adoption of the principles for which we contend, by a legislative body composed in part of the framers of that instrument and their intimate associates. No opposition to this interpretation is known to have been made by the slaveholding States; and there is no reason to believe that the ordinance was not considered as perfectly consistent with the new form of Government. Those who now call in question the right of restriction are obliged to contend, as a consequence of their new doctrine, that the ordinance was unconstitutional, and that the restriction of slavery by the States northwest of the river Ohio being stipulated and enacted on such a basis is therefore a mere nullity, and may be rightfully dispensed with at the pleasure of those States. There is no reason to fear that those happy, flourishing, and enlightened States, would now introduce the deleterious poison of slavery into their civil code, to wither their energies and burlesque their principles of liberty, even if no stipulation to the contrary existed. But we ought to note the pernicious tendency of an innovation in the established construction of our national compact, which, after forty years' uniform practice, now threatens, like a tempest, to sweep away our fairest institutions, and to prostrate the bulwarks of our prosperity.

But, say gentlemen, if Congress can prescribe one condition—such as the restriction of slavery—what are the limits of this restricting power; where will the impositions on the new States find a check? The power given to admit new States, with the single exception of States formed by dismemberment of the existing States, is in the same unlimited terms as are employed in vesting in Congress various other important powers—to levy taxes, raise armies, and declare war. If Congress were to levy unnecessary taxes, to raise useless armies, or make war for slight causes or no cause, would the nation tamely submit to the abuse of power, because the letter of the Constitution was not violated? Sir, the indignation of the people would quickly annihilate the “brief authority” which was become an instrument of oppression. Congress may indeed mistake the interests of the nation in the exercise of those important powers; and even a mistake—frequently unavoidable from the nature of human affairs, must be fatal to the popularity of its authors. How then can they hope to escape who voluntarily wrest the power intrusted to them to the purposes of ambition or tyranny? Such a disregard of public opinion and official duty can never be apprehended under color of unlimited Constitutional powers. So, in the admission of new States, the power intrusted to Congress is, from its very nature, limited only by sound discretion and official responsibility. In one respect, however, the remote possibility of an unreasonable exercise of this discretion is subject to an effectual check: the conditions required cannot be imposed on the new State without its consent. The terms of the compact are mutually proposed and considered, and there is not a shadow of ground to apprehend that the vigilance of the new State will be cheated into a concession against its interests. A further check is to be found in the real interests of the United States being generally identified with those of the proposed State. The condition now required of Missouri is even more evidently conducive to her interest and prosperity than to that of the nation.

The only exception to this remark may perhaps be found in the exemption of the public lands from taxation; but even this may be shown under the existing regulations, in the sale of those lands, to facilitate their sale and settlement by a temporary alleviation from public exactions in favor of industrious settlers. It is also manifest that Congress cannot prescribe a condition which may be contrary to the spirit and tenor of the Federal Constitution, or which shall impair the right of the State to her share in the National Government; or a condition which shall contravene the republican principles of all our institutions.

I proceed to consider, Mr. Chairman, the argument of those who contend that we are bound by the treaty (1 U. S. Laws, p. 134) by which the province of Louisiana was ceded to the United States, to admit Missouri as a State without restricting her on the subject of slavery. The third article of the treaty stipulates, “that the inhabitants shall be incorporated in the Union, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to all the rights, advantages, and immunities, of citizens of the United States, and shall be protected, in the meantime, in their liberty, property, and religion.”

Our Constitution was formed with a view to the then existing States, and to the territory within our limits and jurisdiction, as established by our treaty with Great Britain. The power conferred on Congress to admit new States, cannot be construed to extend beyond those limits. Accordingly, when the Louisiana treaty was before the Senate for its approbation and concurrence, both its friends and its opponents agreed, that neither the treaty-making power, nor even Congress itself could stipulate with a foreign nation to admit one of its provinces, beyond the original limits of the United States, into the Union as a new State. The present Secretary of State was then a member of that body, and expressed his opinion to that effect. He was, however, so decisively in favor of the treaty, that he suggested an amendment of the Constitution itself, to give effect to so important an acquisition as Louisiana. Mr. Taylor, who is still respected as one of the most eminent statesmen of Virginia, declared, he considered that the article in question did not intend to stipulate to admit the province as a State, but that “the words were literally satisfied by admitting it as a Territory,” and not as a State, and by naturalizing the inhabitants, and protecting their property, as in other Territories. When the treaty came before the House of Representatives, for the purpose of making the necessary appropriation to comply with the conditions, or for the establishment of a Territorial government, a similar construction was given to the third article; and, among others, a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Randolph,) who at that time strongly supported the treaty and the Administration, said “there was no stipulation that they should ever be formed into one or more States.” It is also well known that President Madison, then Secretary of State, maintained the same doctrine. Had the stipulation provided to admit Louisiana, as a State or States, into the Union, it must unquestionably have been rejected, or have awaited the consent of the people by an amendment to the Constitution.

Notwithstanding this sentiment, so generally concurred in at the time, a portion of the new territory was formed into a State, and admitted in 1812 into the Union. From what source the powers of Congress were deduced, or what new discovery on that subject was made in the intervening time, I have never been informed. It is probable, however, that the attention of the statesmen then in Congress was wholly engrossed by the imminent dangers that beset our country, then on the verge of war with the most powerful empire of the European world. We have some consolation, however, in observing, that the internal character and institutions of the proposed State, inhabited chiefly by a population so lately governed by the laws and usages of despotic countries, were not disregarded; and she was expressly required to provide by her constitution for the establishment of "civil and religious liberty, trial by jury, and the writ of habeas corpus," with other salutary principles.

Louisiana being thus admitted, I shall not now contest her right to that high privilege; but, while I consent to consider her admission as a precedent to guide our decision in the admission of Missouri, I must also require that the whole proceedings, comprehending the terms and conditions which formed their basis, must be equally recognised, or the whole must be abandoned together. If all doubt of the right of Congress, by the Constitution, to admit Louisiana, is waived in favor of the present applicant, it is no more than reasonable that all the bearings and conditions of the precedent should be equally considered and allowed. Our opponents, however, are not satisfied with the effect of the precedent, and allege that the ratification of the treaty, and the acts of Congress making the appropriations necessary to its execution, have given it such a sanction, that the national faith is pledged for its complete fulfilment. I agree that a treaty made and ratified by the President and Senate, agreeably to the provisions of the Constitution, is morally binding on Congress and the nation. It is, indeed, a doctrine strenuously supported by some, that Congress may decide upon the merits of a treaty previously ratified by the competent authorities, and either grant or withhold the appropriations necessary to its execution. This doctrine, if true, involves the necessary consequence, that Congress may not only annul a treaty constitutionally made, but that any subsequent Congress may virtually rescind it, so far as its provisions remain executory, and depend on appropriations or other acts, to be passed by all the branches of the Government. In other words, no power exists in the Government of the United States to make a treaty which shall be obligatory on the nation or its Legislature. This dangerous and absurd doctrine has been ably resisted, and, in my opinion, refuted, many years since. The power to make treaties, conferred on the President in concurrence with the Senate, is as general as language can make it. They have, then, by the ordinary rules of interpretation, the same power on that subject which exists rightfully in other governments as a necessary attribute of sovereign power. The British Parliament, with its boasted "omnipotence," never pretended to arrest the execution of a treaty by withholding supplies; yet the relation of the House of Representatives to the Executive of the United States is precisely analogous in this respect—it holds the purse-strings of the National treasury. Thus, the Louisiana treaty, being made by competent authority, derived no additional obligation from the acts of Congress at that time, or at any subsequent period. If that Congress could refuse to provide for paying the price, the present may withhold the balance, if any remains unpaid. If the Congress of 1812 admitted a State, carved out of the new province, it must have done so, either because it deemed the admission Constitutional, without reference to the treaty, or because, in addition to its Constitutional right to admit, it considered the treaty as stipulating for such admission. Whether the former alone, or both considerations, produced the act in favor of the new State, it was the mere exercise of discretionary power; and, though we cannot disfranchise Louisiana, since her admission was a compact mutually binding, yet we are at liberty to interpret the treaty for ourselves, and if we find that it does not require the making of States in the ceded province, we may refuse to admit any more, without resorting to a denial of our power to admit by the Constitution.

I have already adverted to the unanimous concurrence of the friends and enemies of the treaty, as far as my information extends, that the article in question contained no stipulation ever to form the territory into States; and the phrase to admit "as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution," beyond all question was introduced with a guarded circumspection, and with a view to the Constitutional right of Congress to admit or refuse, according to its discretion. Hence, it results, that the treaty was obligatory on Congress and the nation; that the acts of Congress in relation to it, could not increase the obligation, and that the admission of Louisiana was an independent act, not a treaty stipulation, and, consequently, is to be regarded as a precedent merely, when considered with respect to the application of Missouri for a similar act in her behalf. To concede that the Executive and Senate can make a treaty, which shall devolve on Congress a moral obligation to admit new States into this Confederacy, would suppose the treaty-making power might extend to annexing to this Union all the Southern Continent, from Mexico to Buenos Ayres and Chili: it would leave no check in Congress to ambition or imbecility of the co-ordinate branches of the Government: and though the power of making treaties is in general terms, and is open to the same great checks which constitute the safety of a free government, yet it can never be maintained, for a moment, that it can annex foreign territories without a limit, composed of heterogeneous and discordant masses of population.

A single treaty, formed by an aspiring President, and such, within our own recollection, have approached very near that high distinction, might soon reduce our original republic to insignificance, and the principles of our free Constitution to an empty name. However we may confide in the virtue of future Senates, we ought not to forget the potency of intrigue and corruption, always within reach of an unprincipled man in possession of executive power. In other countries the remedy of intolerable evils involves a civil war, and either a dissolution of the government or an aggravation of the enormity. In our well balanced system, the errors of weakness, and treachery of ambition, are quickly discerned amid the cloud of mock-patriotism and intrigue in which they are shrouded; the public indignation dispels the disguise and confounds the betrayers of the national interests. Notwithstanding the remote possibility of treachery in the power of making treaties, the admission of States into the Union being distinctly intrusted to Congress, it is evident that no treaty can be made in derogation of that power. And, even if such a treaty were ratified, the Congress would not merely have power, but would be bound on its responsibility to the nation, to admit no new States, but in circumstances compatible with the interests of the existing States. The discretion must be distinctly exercised in each particular case, and the admission of a new State by one Congress can never involve an obligation upon a subsequent Congress to admit any other State, though its force as a precedent may be allowed as far as the cases are parallel.

We are now brought to consider the actual state of things, under which the application of Missouri is presented. Her population is probably sufficient, and the boundary she asks, though not perfectly satisfactory, is not strongly objected to. But we are informed that she has a considerable number of slaves already, and, from various indications of public sentiment there, it is evident that the existence and indefinite extension of that hapless and pernicious condition of the human species will be made a feature of their civil code. While Congress retained its legislative control over the territory, the subject of slavery escaped attention; and the present slaveholders contend, with some reason, that they ought not to be divested of a property in their slaves, which they acquired by at least the tacit assent of the legislative authority. Their condition, in this respect, seems nearly analogous to that of slave owners in the original States at the time of the Revolution, and perhaps also at the time of forming the present Constitution. The fault in the latter case is thrown on Great Britain alone, and we have been so complaisant and charitable in this debate as to admit the plea. Great Britain was undoubtedly wrong in protecting the abominable traffic; but I must remind the worthy gentlemen who would so easily shake off the odious imputation, that this, like all traffic, supposes purchasers, a market, and mercantile profits, as well as venders. If the virtuous inhabitants of the slaveholding States had refused to receive and pay good prices for the miserable victims, Great Britain would never have compelled them. The attempts of the Virginia provincial assembly to obtain an interdiction of the slave trade, were, however, highly honorable to them; and I shall not stop here to lament so great a departure from the same humane system as is at present exhibited.

It may not be reasonable, therefore, to require of Missouri the abolition of her existing slavery. The same forbearance ought to be exercised with respect to it, as the Constitution of the United States indulges to that of the original States. It was left to the prudence and humanity of the States themselves to continue or to abolish it by degrees, and by means most conformable to their views of public good and private virtue. The latter, it was expected, would do much in preparing the victims of servitude for a capacity of enjoying a better condition, and would receive all proper countenance from the enlightened measures of legislative bodies. Such, I do not hesitate to say, was the prevalent sentiment of the non-slaveholding States, and such their confidence in the magnanimous principles of the champions of freedom in the South, who had so lately been associated with themselves in vindicating the rights of mankind. The restriction proposed secures the owners of slaves in Missouri against any encroachment upon the rights they possess. I would even go further, though with great reluctance, and consent to an article in the Constitution which should guaranty them against any act of their own Legislature tending to a similar encroachment.

Can Missouri, or those who support her application, complain of such a reasonable condition? If she does, let her explain her objections. Will she allege that her interests are sacrificed? It is clearly the interest of Missouri to encourage an active and industrious population. The labor of freemen will produce double the labor of slaves. Instead of extensive plantations, each inhabited by a single proprietor, together with an overseer and their families, in the midst of a horde of ignorant, degraded, and miserable slaves, the eye will be gratified with farms of moderate extent, and the families of an intelligent, industrious, and patriotic yeomanry. If she aspires at political power and relative influence in the national councils, let her banish slavery from her borders, and all her myriads of people, and not three-fifths only of the scattered clans of domestic despotism, will send their Representatives to this Hall. If she would be strong in war, let her invite only freemen, who will defend their property, their families, and their freedom: not slaves, who can only seek their own happiness by withering the arm that holds them in bondage. But she alleges that we invade her right—her sovereign right—to hold slaves, or not to hold them, at her pleasure. I have already shown, that it is no legitimate exercise of sovereign power, to make a portion of our species bondmen. Instead of a right, it is the grossest abuse of right that was ever tolerated by a civilized country.

If Missouri would exercise her power by extending over her extensive border the noisome pestilence, which already has poisoned the atmosphere of half this goodly land, she has little claim to the intelligence and moral characteristics which should entitle her to become a member of the Union. If she would not so abuse her power, she can have no reasonable wish to enjoy an empty prerogative never to be exerted. Not only the moral wrong, but the physical evil, and blasting curse of slavery, as now experienced in the slaveholding States, where it exists in its mildest form, are painted in lively colors by the gentlemen themselves; who cannot be induced to suppress the melancholy fact, though it presents an irresistible argument against adding Missouri to the miserable victims of an infatuated policy. And is it to this Moloch that Missouri insists on her right to become a voluntary sacrifice! The right to desolate her fields, and poison the fountains of prosperity; to commit political suicide! Surely the pride, the phrensy, must be incurable, which can persist in grasping such a destructive power. Let us resist its momentary violence, reason, prudence, and virtue, must soon predominate. The power to do good may well be coveted by mortals—to do evil never.

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

It may be proper here to advert to another argument of the gentleman from South Carolina. We have long since divested Congress, he says, of its right to interpose on this subject in Missouri, by bestowing on her a territorial legislature, competent to all municipal regulations, and this power cannot, therefore, be resumed by the National Legislature. Let me ask that gentleman, how the "compromise," which was first suggested by himself to a committee, of which we were both members, in the early part of the present session, could have been executed by Congress, in his present view of the legislative power of the territories, is correct? That compromise proposed to exclude slavery from all that portion of the Arkansas Territory north of a certain latitude. We have already invested Arkansas with a temporary legislature, and, upon his present principle, have no longer any control in this or any of her internal concerns, [Mr. LOWNDES explained—The lines proposed by him would comprehend none of the settlements of our citizens; he considered such settlements as having vested rights beyond our control, but that Congress might exercise the right of excluding slavery where no such settlements existed.] When the suggestion was made in the committee, Mr. Chairman, I do not remember to have heard the honorable gentleman take this distinction. Certainly it is an important one; it leaves the effect of the excluding principle to be exerted only on a wilderness—it leaves the compromise a shadow. I had really supposed before, that something must be conceded on both sides, to make the transaction a compromise; where all is yielded by one party and nothing by the other, by whatever name it may be called, it is no compromise, but submission. The honorable gentleman is not in fault; he concedes us all which his principle will allow—the privilege of an empty name. Vox et præterea nihil.

I must, however, call in question the doctrine, that Congress has parted with all legislative control of the territories, by the mere organization of a territorial government. The acts of Congress are, in their very terms, merely "temporary." Take, for example, the act providing for the government of Missouri; by the 1st section it is enacted, "that the temporary government," &c. This is in the exact words of the acts in relation to the other territories. These acts are frequently revised or modified, as appears by the statute. The territory itself is divided, subdivided, and newly organized, at the pleasure of Congress. Nothing less than the power of entire revocation of the original act would warrant these various subsequent modifications. The right in Congress to prohibit slavery must, therefore, remain in that body, and may be exercised over the territories notwithstanding the existence of the temporary governments.

But it is not to be concealed, that the stern and resolute hostility to the restriction of slavery is not confined to Missouri alone—it did not even originate there. Her interest and true policy demand the salutary measure; her pride alone could never have kindled such a flame of opposition. The jealousy of the Western States is alarmed; they are warned to resist the encroachments of the Middle and Eastern States, who envy their growing importance and political influence. These, too, are the suggestions of men who are loudly deprecating local prejudices. Let not the West listen readily to the insidious charge. It is without foundation. There is no collision of interests between the various sections of the Union. They are in perfect harmony. The rapid increase of Western population, formed, as it is, of emigrants from the shores of the Atlantic, and their descendants, is beheld with pride by their kindred and brethren in the elder States. Their welfare is our welfare—their strength our strength—and their principles, except in the partial admission of slavery, are our principles. We may defy the ministers of disunion to name a single point of contact, where the interests, prosperity, and happiness, of the middle and eastern sections are not in perfect harmony with the western. What better evidence can be given by the non-slaveholding States of their disinterested regard to Missouri, than the efforts now made by them to banish forever from her system the canker which has corroded and enfeebled our less fortunate neighbors in the South? If we were unfriendly or jealous of the new States, a different course might be pursued. No, sir, to confer benefits is not the dictate of hatred. Malignity, alone, can distort deeds of kindness into tokens of envy. A gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. HOLMES) has thought proper to ascribe the effort now made against the extension of slavery to the same principles which produced the Hartford Convention. But can it be believed that those principles, which, even in the darkest hours of adversity, had but a momentary influence, are now completely triumphant, not only in New England, but in the mighty States of New York and Pennsylvania; that they have crossed the Alleghany Mountains, and embrace in their vortex all the States north of the river Ohio? This extravagant suggestion is unworthy of a moment's attention. The same gentleman takes exception to an expression in the able memorial of the citizens of Boston and the vicinity, that Congress may require such conditions of the new States "as its wisdom, its justice, or its policy, may dictate." As it is to be presumed that the gentleman does not include "wisdom and justice" among the suspected virtues, it can only be the word policy, to which his censure applies; and he seems to understand it only in the Italian or sinister sense. But he will probably withdraw his objection, on being reminded of the old-fashioned maxim, which I trust he was taught in his childhood, that "honesty is the best policy."

In regarding, however, the effects of slavery, the views of Congress must always extend to the good of the whole community. While the exclusion of slavery from Missouri will insure her a more numerous population, more industry, more wealth, and, consequently, a greater representation in the National Legislature, it makes her also a more formidable barrier in war, a more efficient pillar of the national edifice. These advantages require the paternal care of the Government of the Union; they are equally participated by every member; by the slaveholding States in at least their due proportion. It is, then, unjust to represent the restriction proposed to Missouri as a sacrifice on her part, or a reservation of power by Congress, by which the former pays the latter a "price" for admission. No mercenary concession is required, but an honorable and salutary condition, beneficial indeed to the nation, but to the new State the vital principle of future greatness. A benign interposition, the dictate of wisdom and beneficence.

It is proper, however, in considering this great question—great in its consequences to our rising nation, and destined to mark our character to future ages—that we should not overlook the invisible spring that puts the machine in action, and imparts its tremendous force to the opposition. The States of the South, replete with slavery, are tenacious of the privilege of "diffusing" the evil. To diffuse, not to extend, the mischief, is their object; a distinction far too refined for my comprehension. If diffusion, or any mode of depletion, would reduce the residuum of the article, it might be an office of kindness in Missouri, or even in Pennsylvania or Massachusetts, to facilitate so worthy an object. But it is the unfortunate character of slavery to admit no remedy but compression. The flame is harmless when confined, but once allowed to pass its boundary, and the conflagration defies all human power. The efforts of reason, religion, philanthropy, are impotent, indeed, against the cravings of avarice.

When we hear it said by a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH,) that this land (Missouri) "was bought with our money," it is not to be supposed he means that the money of Virginia, or of all the slaveholding States, was alone employed in the purchase. But such language implies that those States had at least their share in the transaction, and are entitled to the advantages. The fair and honorable advantages are, indeed, to be enjoyed by them, in common with the nation; but does this require that the new States should be open as a slave market, to enhance the value, to encourage the slaveholder in growing the commodity? The "high-minded" gentlemen who oppose the restriction, will certainly disclaim such a motive. They contend, however, that the prohibition of slavery is an interdiction to slaveholders from removing with their slaves to the new States. This may, indeed, be an inconvenience not easily obviated. The extensive States of Mississippi, Alabama, and Louisiana, however, are still in their infancy, and their vast territory invites the planters of cotton and the sugar cane to bring their surplus slaves from the Atlantic States to those new regions. But to those who insist on their rights to all, it is in vain to urge that less than all may be enough. Let us listen, however, a moment to the other side. If slaveholders cannot remove with their slaves, in case the restriction is adopted, so also, if it is not adopted, the industrious citizens in the non-slaveholding States are proscribed, in a great degree, from the benefits of emigration. Where a system of slavery throws all the wealth and all the political influence into the hands of a few, and where labor is disgraceful, as the proper occupation of slaves alone, the independent spirit which is found among citizens in moderate circumstances, in the non-slaveholding States, will never brook the inevitable consequence of emigration. Freemen, proud of their rights; proud even of their industry, as the basis of their independent condition, will never consent to be ranked by the opulent slaveholder, living by their side, on a level with his slaves. Where slavery prevails, the industry of freemen is degrading, and those who are obliged to earn their subsistence by their own exertions and labor, are in a state of hopeless insignificance. Is it not then equal and just, since so many States have lately been added in the South, where slaveholders can remove, with the advantages they require, that Missouri should be left open to a population which cannot breathe in the atmosphere of slavery? Louisiana is the only State yet established beyond the Mississippi. Slavery exists, and must continue to exist, in that State. If then it were a subject of mere mercantile arrangement between the slaveholding and non-slaveholding States, Missouri ought to interdict slavery. Thank Heaven! we do not adduce this as our principal argument, but only to answer an objection raised by our opponents. No, sir, we would exclude slavery, because we have the power by the Constitution; because it is the dictate of reason, of expediency, of moral right, and consequently of duty. Gentlemen from the slaveholding States offer another argument, which indeed has great weight, and merits a distinct consideration. If, say they, slavery is to be confined to its present limits, and no more States or Territories are to afford it shelter, what is to become of the increasing slave population in the Atlantic States? In those States the slaves have increased in a far greater ratio than the free population: are they to be "pent up" and starved, or to be turned loose to steal, rob, and murder: the certain consequence of emancipation? To escape the distressing scenes which gentlemen have so feelingly depicted, and for the reality of which they point us to St. Domingo, and other islands in the West Indies, they require the extensive Territories and States of the West to receive the supernumerary slaves; and, while they fill their coffers with the price, they rid them of all inconvenience, and of the dread of insurrection. This sale of human flesh may indeed rend asunder forever the ties of parents and children, brothers and sisters, husband and wife, which those gentlemen declare to be the objects of their tenderest solicitude; for a slave, removed a thousand miles, or even much less, must never again behold the beings with whom he has spent his life, to whom alone he is known and united, whose affection is the only sweet he has tasted in the bitter draught of servitude. These consequences, however, are considered slight and trivial, when weighed against the superior claims, the right, the profit, and the safety of his owner. But gentlemen seem to have limited their views to an expedient merely temporal, and to lose sight of the inevitable and fatal catastrophe that must await at least their favorite system.

In the rapid progress of emigration in the settlement of our new States and Territories, the time is at hand when all will be replete with inhabitants; when the tide can no longer roll onward, but must recede, and mingle with its kindred waters. Then where will the statesmen of the day transfer the myriads of slavery, to rescue their country from destruction? No new provinces can be purchased; Mexico will be full to overflowing on the south; the Pacific before them, on the west, and on the north a population to whom slavery is abhorrent. Will they apply to the National Government for a law permitting them to export slaves? If Americans could ever resort to this abominable traffic for relief, where could they find a nation, a province, or even an island, which would receive the victims? All Europe, long ere then, will have denounced and interdicted the odious trade, and there is no doubt that the islands and new republics of the South must adopt the same humane policy. In no distant age, I trust, the monstrous institution of slavery, and the horrors of the traffic, will be alike exploded. The history of the present times will be read with incredulity or with disgust. Some better remedy must be devised for the enormous evil, which will then threaten insurrection, massacre, and wide desolation.

The honorable Speaker has turned his attention to the condition of our country, which we are now considering; but he seems to be unaware of the dangers which must then beset the free population, from the superincumbent mass of slavery. He cheers the friends of African emancipation by assuring them, that, in such a state of things, the labor of slaves will be more expensive than that of freemen, and that consequently the owner will give them liberty, to discharge himself from the burden of their maintenance. But will the safety of the free population then permit the emancipation of such countless hordes of ignorant and destitute beings, whose very necessities must impel them to war upon society? It would be madness; it would be giving them a commission to plunder, ravage, and destroy. I will not say, sir, that, in such a state of the relative numbers of free citizens and slaves, it would be utterly impossible to rescue the former; yet certainly nothing but powerful and hazardous measures could arrest the march of ruin. Even now, and for years past, the slaveholding States have adopted a code of laws, making emancipation more and more difficult. Indeed, in many it is entirely prohibited. This harsh measure is justified by gentlemen, on the ground that free negroes are pernicious companions to slaves of their own color, and make them discontented with their condition. No emancipation must be allowed, no free negroes to seduce their brethren to desertion, to infest the cities as vagrants, or highways as plunderers. If, in the present state of things, emancipation is so dangerous, that those humane gentlemen, who so deeply deplore the "evil and curse" of slavery, are obliged to enact laws to perpetuate and increase it; if they even now are compelled to this course by the necessity of self-preservation, how difficult, how impossible will they find it, to have recourse to emancipation when the evil shall have outgrown all computation!

To avert so fearful a calamity, let me ask their attention to the immediate interest of the slaveholding States, and inquire, whether the extension of slavery a single inch beyond its present boundary, is not to be resisted far more for themselves than for us? The advantages which they expect by the extension, are transient and inconsiderable; the evil is more remote indeed, but inevitable and overwhelming. Let me conjure their statesmen by the spirit of their fathers; by their reverence of the patriot whose glory is not yet extinguished; by the virtue which vanquished the hosts of oppression; by their respect for themselves, and their regard for future generations, to retrace their steps, to annul their laws against emancipation. Let it be their high prerogative to resist the torrent of prejudice, to stifle the murmurs of avarice and pride.

Let them boldly avow the salutary truth; now is the time to provide a remedy for the abomination, for the curse of slavery. Every moment's delay increases the evil. It is not by insulated and feeble efforts, that the purpose can be effected. A great and simultaneous exertion can alone be equal to the occasion. Such an exertion must be produced by a universal conviction of its necessity. It is only in an enlightened age, and in a virtuous country, that such a concert of spirit and action can be expected to silence the cavils of ignorance and cupidity. A general and sudden emancipation would be the extreme of folly. So great a change in the condition of a numerous class of human beings would be alike destructive of themselves and pernicious to the community. But, when once the States and the slave owners will resolutely determine to accomplish universal freedom, all difficulty will vanish. Slaves will not be denied all means of instruction; they will be taught the rudiments of knowledge, of self-government, and of morality. The most exemplary for industry and fidelity can be emancipated, and portions of the waste lands, which abound in the plantations, can be allotted them on moderate rents. Scarce an age would elapse before the slave population, with such inducements and such means, would assume a new character, a higher grade in the human scale. It would no longer be difficult to reconcile extensive emancipation with the safety of the free population. The freedmen and their descendants, possessing personal liberty, and protected against oppression, but not necessarily participating in political power, would remain the industrious and happy laborers in the fields, not of their masters, but their protectors. Secured in the fruits of their industry, they would be provident and frugal; the product of their labor would be immensely greater than in a state of slavery, and the proprietors of the soil, their former masters, would derive greater profit from their earnings, with far less care and responsibility.

To those who treat these suggestions as chimerical, the experience of other times and other nations ought to afford an impressive lesson. The vassals and serfs of feudal times were in a condition as degraded and dependent as the slaves of Virginia and the Carolinas. The boors of the Russian and the Polish nobility and great landholders, are attached to the soil and transferable with it. In France, before the Revolution, the laboring classes, though not nominally slaves, were so in reality, and much more wretched than those in our country. Even in England, the country which has so frequently reproached us for the continuance of a system inconsistent with our principles, the laborers in their manufacturing towns are far more miserable than the slaves of humane masters. The latter are sure of comfortable sustenance, and are cherished in sickness and old age; while arbitrary regulation of wages, the liability to be turned from employment, the pestilence of a crowded population, the squalid and loathsome condition of their dwellings, and the horrors of the poor-house, all contribute to make the condition of English laborers in manufacturing towns incomparably worse than the slaves of our Southern States. The wretched beings to whom I have alluded not only wear the human form, but the same color with the higher classes. Yet who would have the courage to proclaim, in those countries, the necessity or even the possibility of meliorating the condition of the inferior orders? Whoever should attempt such an enterprise, would be treated as a preacher of sedition, or a madman. But, can any one doubt that the French Revolution might have been arrested, had the nobility and clergy, who engrossed all the property of the nation, relaxed their oppression only so far as to have participated the public burdens? They were deaf to the warning voice of history, and the terrible explosion of the Revolution prostrated their privileges and ended their oppression. In Russia, Poland, and Germany, symptoms have appeared of a disposition in the sovereign and in the privileged classes, to relax the rigor of their yoke, and impart to their slaves some portion of the rights of humanity, and the fruits of their labor. Possibly, in those nations, a grain of seasonable wisdom may rescue them from the fate of inexorable oppressors. It remains to be seen, whether there is wisdom and virtue enough in England to reform abuses, to relieve the starving and improvident victims of their manufacturing system, before the accumulation of vice, of suffering, and of oppression, shall thicken to a tempest, and prostrate the monuments of learning, of power, and of glory, for so many ages the boast of that mighty empire.

To the wisdom and virtue of the slaveholding States it must be submitted, whether they will persist in riveting the fetters of their slaves, and shutting every avenue of emancipation, or whether they will devise a great system, which shall improve their condition, and, in due time, extirpate every vestige of that curse and reproach of our country. The difference of color can be no obstacle to the enlightened plan; it must be a perpetual barrier, indeed, against a commixture of blood, and will, therefore, leave to the master superior respect, the right of protection, and the voluntary services and labor of a grateful and happy race. Such a course, once fully adopted by the Southern States, would increase their population and wealth, as the product of labor would increase. Instead of angry collisions with their sister States, mutual esteem and increasing confidence would be the happy result of this magnanimous measure. Such a just and enlightened course of policy, so new in the annals of nations, must attract the admiration of mankind, and the gratitude of future ages.

Our opponents in this debate have frequently indulged in pointed sarcasms and severe reproach on the supposed arguments in favor of excluding slavery, which are founded on religion and morality. While they have thought proper to impute all such arguments to rank hypocrisy, they have not failed to exert all their ingenuity to prove that the extension, or, as they choose to say, the diffusion of slavery, will diminish the evil; and that, consequently, such diffusion is consistent with morality. Many have gone farther, and have asserted that slavery is encouraged in the Old Testament, and not forbidden in the New; from which they infer, that it is not offensive in the eye of Heaven.

It is sufficient for me, sir, to reply, that slavery is oppressive and unjust, an "intolerable evil and a curse;" it cannot, therefore, but be the deepest shade of immorality. Nor can the christian system be reproached with giving any countenance to such an enormity. The Founder of our Religion announced to his disciples that "his kingdom was not of this world;" he intermeddled not with "thrones and dominions," or with the civil institutions of mankind. To these, indeed, he inculcated obedience and submission. In vain should we look in Scripture for any authority to resist the encroachments of despotism; even our Revolution would have found no precept there to break the British yoke and establish our liberties. One sublime maxim, however, comprehends all virtue and all duty to mankind: "Do to others as you would that they should do to you." Let this be universally obeyed, and all tyranny will cease, and resistance be unnecessary. Let this prevail, and the yoke of slavery and the rod of oppression will be broken forever. I should not have answered such observations, nor attempt to throw reproach and ridicule on our principles, but to exhibit the harmony which may be found in religion and virtue, with the just interpretation and practical effect of our happy Constitution.

In expressing my views on this momentous subject, I have not pursued the path of feeling. The harmony of our national Union has been my pole star. General freedom, the equal and inalienable rights of mankind, are the pure spirit of our republican system. To resist encroachment, to guard with vigilance the bulwarks of our Constitution, is the duty of every citizen. By the faithful performance of this great duty, we may justly hope the permanence of our liberties, and the maturity of our glory.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Pennsylvania, next addressed the Committee, and spoke also about two hours against the constitutional right of Congress to impose the restriction; and, incidentally, in favor of the right of Congress to restrict slavery in the Territories of the United States.

The Committee then rose.

FRIDAY, February 25.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Engineer Department, containing the rules and regulations for the government of the Military Academy at West Point, and a list of cadets which were attached to the said academy on the 1st of January, 1815, and of such as have been appointed between that day and the 30th of September, 1819, with the States and Territories whence they came, &c., containing all the information required by, and rendered in obedience to, the resolution of the 26th of February, 1819; which letter and report were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of John O'Connor, deceased," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

LAND-BOUNTY CERTIFICATES.

Mr. COOK submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of enabling those soldiers of the late war, who are entitled to a land bounty, and have not received the same, to obtain certificates in lieu thereof, for such sum as may be deemed reasonable, making such certificate receivable only in payment for public lands offered for sale by the United States.

Mr. C. said, in offering the resolution to the consideration of the House, he must confess that the interest which he felt in the measure was too strong to allow it to meet its fate, without offering some reasons in its favor. To those who have inquired at all into this subject, said he, it will be found that there are between seven and eight thousand soldiers who have not received their land-bounty; and, according to the present mode of paying them, it will consume about one million one hundred thousand acres of land. If any measure can be adopted which will render this bounty more valuable to the soldiers who have fought your battles, conquered your enemies, and given lustre to your national character, without injury to the public interest, I think it is worthy of the consideration of the Government, and deserves to be adopted. In offering this bounty to the soldiers of your army, I conceive it was to induce the soldier to enlist under your banners; and after performing his duty, to have a home, a resting place for himself and his family. But, sir, from the manner in which this bounty has been given, it must be manifest to all who know anything about it, that it has fallen short of that object in a most unfortunate extent. Owing to the remoteness of these lands from the settled parts of the country, and the consequent absence of the conveniences of society and neighborhood, the soldiers have been unable to improve their lands, and, from their general poverty, have been compelled to sell them to the speculators to obtain the means of supplying their immediate wants, and this too at so reduced a price as to be of but little service. Indeed, sir, the management of the speculators has been such as to keep down the price of those lands to the lowest possible amount, and they will continue so to do, at least until the poor, but meritorious soldiers, have been rifled of their property—until it shall all be in their hands.

My object, then, Mr. Speaker, is to allow those soldiers who, from the tardiness of the Government, have not received their bounty, who may choose to do so, to obtain in lieu of such bounty a certificate for such amount as Congress may think just, and make such certificates recoverable only in payment for public lands. Sir, I believe, if the Government would give to the soldier his choice, either to take his bounty where the Government may choose to assign it to him, or to take a certificate which would enable him to enter eighty acres (the one half of his present bounty) within the limits of the settlements, after the sales are over—for I would be unwilling to give them a right of pre-emption for that quantity—that some thousands of them, who are now without homes, living in wretchedness, would gladly receive such certificates, and secure themselves in comfortable homes. And in this way there would be a mutual saving, both to the Government and the soldier. The Government would save one half of the land, and yet give to the soldier more value to him than the value of the present bounty. In doing this, Mr. Speaker, the soldier, who is living now both in vice and poverty, would find an asylum where comfort would smile around him, and where his vicious habits, contracted in the camp, would be corrected by the influence of those around him, who have fostered the virtues of civilized life. It would also, Mr. Speaker, prevent an extension of that principle which has converted so much of the State of Illinois at least into a temporary wilderness; that delightful body of land lying between the Illinois and Mississippi rivers, embracing more than five million of acres, has to such an extent fallen into the hands of speculators, who have bought it for a mere trifle, that it will be uninhabited for many years—a section, above all others, which it is desirable to have settled. The bounty of the Government, owing to the manner of conferring it, has thus done but little good to the soldier, and established a nuisance in that flourishing State.

Sir, I have seen the poor soldier who has come from the almost extreme east of our country to Illinois, who has heard a fine and just description of that State, with joy in his countenance, to see his land, that land which was rendered dear to him, because he had fought and conquered the enemies of your country to obtain it. But when he learned that it was so remote from neighbors, and from those indispensable advantages of society, his joy was turned into mortification, and he was driven to the shop of the speculator, to procure, in exchange for it, such bounty as their generosity might advance.

I do think, Mr. Speaker, that the melioration of the condition of such a number of those deserving men, is worthy of consideration; and more especially when it can be done without detriment to the nation. Sir, if you should wish hereafter to call upon the patriotism of the people to fight your battles, will not the effect of this measure tend to invite them to your standard? They will look back with confidence, and feel safe in obtaining the just reward of their country.

I do hope, Mr. Speaker, that, notwithstanding the great mass of business before us, this subject will receive its merited consideration.

The question was then put whether the House would now consider the resolution, and it was determined in the negative.

THE MISSOURI BILL.

The SPEAKER having announced the orders of the day—

Mr. HILL, of Massachusetts, rose, and said he did not now wish to consume the time of the House upon a subject, the progress of which seemed to be stamped with all the marks of eternity. But he rose merely to move that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from any further consideration of the Missouri bill.

Mr. LOWNDES said, that if the gentleman from Massachusetts insisted on this motion being put, he would cheerfully vote in favor of it; yet, if he would consent to withdraw his motion for the present, to give two or three gentlemen more an opportunity to speak to-day, he thought it might be a saving of time, and the motion could be renewed again, if necessary, to-morrow morning, which would then, he thought, receive a decided support.

Mr. HILL acquiesced in this suggestion, and withdrew his motion.

The House then again went into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. CONN in the chair, on this bill.

Mr. ERVIN, of South Carolina, took the floor, and spoke at considerable length against the restriction.

Mr. SCOTT, of Missouri, said, it had been erroneously stated that Missouri demanded that which she ought more modestly to sue for as a matter of special grace and favor. In the remarks which he should now have the honor to submit on the subject, he did not wish to be again misunderstood by the honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. TAYLOR,) or any other quarter. Mr. S. did not sound the tocsin of alarm—he did not beat up for volunteers in rebellion against the constituted authorities of his country—but he should degrade, counteract, and even misrepresent, the wishes of the people of Missouri, was he to press their claim for admission into the Union by obsequious supplications and prayers, suited alone to the taste and palates of sycophants or of tyrants. Sir, said Mr. S., Missouri asks, in the true American character of moderation and firmness, your assistance to organize her State government, as preparatory to her admission into the Union. She did not sink herself beneath notice, by an affectation of inferiority, meekness, dependence, and submission, which she did not feel, nor did she, by any rash declarations, or warlike attitudes, authorize the ungenerous insinuations that there was in that people a moral unfitness for self-government. There had been no exhibition of such a spirit of boisterous domination as ought to induce you to shun their company, or to avoid associating with them as a member of the federal family. Missouri presented herself with the Constitution of the United States in one hand, and the treaty of cession in the other, and asked admission into the Union. She exhibited, as preliminaries, a long apprenticeship under the guardianship of your laws; a moral capacity and fitness in the people for self-government; a devoted attachment to the Constitution and laws of the land; a firm and fixed republican character; and numbers sufficient to entitle her to two Representatives. She did not attempt to deceive Congress in reference to her territory, or the number of her inhabitants; she presented an actual map of the surveys of the country, by which a calculation might be made, within a few miles, of the exact extent of her boundaries; she produced documents in support of her population, sufficient to satisfy the most conscientious and scrupulous; she was not driven to the subterfuge of counting her citizens and travellers in every county through which they might pass, to make out her pretensions to admission, and then, to take off the odium of this deception, to christen the transaction with the name of pious fraud, because the great object in view was to jump into the Union, and obtain the blessed privilege of dictating to her superiors and her neighbors. Mr. S. regretted that this question had produced so much excitement; he, however, disclaimed the responsibility of ultimate measures, because he was acting only on the defensive, and was not one of the proposers or supporters of the proposition that had caused it. If it was of recent date, he would entertain some hopes of its short duration. But, for more than one year, this question had agitated many sections of this Government; it had mixed and mingled with every topic; it had operated on, and even controlled, elections. He had seen one instance of its powerful influence in an adjoining State, and he feared similar sacrifices had or would be made in other quarters, of honorable men, for their integrity and attachment to the principles of the Constitution.

FEBRUARY, 1820.

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

Mr. S. said, that both the advocates for, and those opposed to, this restriction, who had preceded him, had divided the subject into three heads: the first resting on the Constitution; the second on the treaty of cession; and the third on the expediency of the measure. There were other grounds, growing out of the relations of the United States and the Territory of Missouri, and that he considered as not only connected with, but conclusive on, the subject, and which he would hereafter examine: he would, however, first advert to the nature of this proposition, which gentlemen had contended they had the right to make. Some had dignified it with the name of treaty; some with the name of compact, while others had contended for the broader ground, that you have the power to restrict Missouri, in virtue of your sovereignty over the territory. On all occasions, it was of the first importance to understand the question, but more particularly so where it involved the principles of the Constitution, or the rights of the people. It was, then, either matter of treaty or compact, between Congress and Missouri, or it was an ordinary act of legislation.

Mr. S. contended that, if Congress had the right to impose this restriction, as an ordinary act of legislation, by virtue of their sovereignty over the territory, that then they could not support the ground that it was either a treaty or a compact with Missouri. Vattel, in his Law of Nations, page 192, section 154, laid it down as a fixed principle, "that public treaties can only be made by superior powers, by sovereigns who contract in the name of the State." It was of the first importance in every State, that it should be well understood where the power of making treaties resided. It was important to the State itself, and doubly so as related to foreign Governments with whom you are to treat. Vattel, page 193, section 154, said, "it is from the fundamental laws of each State, that we must learn where resides the authority that is capable of contracting with validity in the name of the State." By the Constitution, which is the fundamental law of the United States, in article second, section second, the power to make treaties was given to the President of the United States and the Senate, and that disposition of this branch of the supreme power, by the people, had the unequivocal effect of divesting the House of Representatives of this power; not only the House of Representatives was deprived of the exercise of this power, but the two Houses of Congress, were they of one accord, had not the power to propose or make a treaty; and the case in favor of his argument was infinitely stronger, when it was considered that the Senate, who, by the Constitution, was a component part of the treaty-making power, was, as to the question under discussion, actually opposed to its success. Had the Constitution stopped here, it would have been sufficient for all the purposes of the argument. The 10th section of the 1st article had, in express terms, inhibited a State from "entering into any treaty, alliance, or confederation." Was even a State to make a treaty, it would, upon principles that are recognised in Vattel, page 195, section 161, "be void, for want of sufficient power to make it." And yet a State had a constitution or fundamental law. How would the argument bear gentlemen out, when it was applied to a mere territory not absolutely sovereign within its own lines, and that had not any constitution or fundamental law? If Missouri had the right to treat with Congress, it must be in pursuance of her sovereignty; and that same sovereignty would give her the equal right to treat with any other power, and which, if she was to attempt to do, he had little doubt gentlemen would then, if not before, deny her power to accomplish. He thought it was sufficiently elucidated that both Houses of Congress, much less the House of Representatives, had not the power, in shape of a treaty, that a State had not the power, and that a territory, possessing even less sovereignty than a State, had it not.

Mr. S. said, that the next ground gentlemen had relied on was, that this restriction might be imposed on Missouri, by way of compact. Vattel, page 192, section 152, laid it down "that treaty and compact are synonymous terms, where perpetuity is the object." This restriction was to be fixed, unalterable, eternal—no change of time, circumstances, or condition, was to place it in the power of the people of Missouri to alter this feature in their constitution. He defined a compact to be an agreement, or contract to do, or not to do, a particular thing. Again, agreements were either voluntary or involuntary; if involuntary (as this would be in reference to the people of Missouri) it was competent for the party to avoid it as early as possible. If voluntary, and had for its object that which the parties might lawfully do, it was binding—the acquisition of power by Congress, by way of compact or treaty, beyond what the people had given them, was not a lawful object; if it were, Congress might progress in exacting from States a surrender of powers until they had accumulated sufficient strength to swallow up the whole. And was any one State disposed to make a surrender of any portion of its powers or sovereignty to the General Government? He doubted very much whether, from the evil tendency and dangerous example it would furnish, the other States would stand by and see it done. Mr. S. would put the question to gentlemen whether Congress could, by treaty, compact, or law, surrender any of the powers given by the Constitution for the benefit of the whole? Congress were but the bankers of the people, to the amount of power deposited, and the fund could only be distributed in the shape of laws, when the necessities of their country, or the good of the people, required. The deposit was so sacred that Congress could not agree to diminish it in any way that should counteract the purposes for which it was given. Congress could not agree to relinquish the right to impose taxes on any particular State; or the right to regulate commerce in reference to any one, or all the States; or give any preference to the ports of one State over those of any other State; or to give to one State more exemptions or a greater representation than her federal condition entitled her to. If Congress could not give powers to a State, she could not take privileges away. In fact, Congress could not relinquish its sovereignty on any of the objects over which it is made sovereign by the Constitution. By a parity of reasoning, a State could not surrender by compact any portion of the sovereignty retained to it by the Constitution, or which it possessed by virtue of inherent rights; but if a State could relinquish any portion of its sovereignty, it must first be considered independent to enable it to do so, and not be in a condition of territorial dependence. State rights are as fully secured by the Constitution as the rights of Congress, or of the General Government; the law of nations and of nature operated alike on the general and State governments. Vattel, in page 6, section 18, says, that "a State or nation is obliged to preserve itself, and has a right to every thing necessary for its preservation." The sovereignty of a State was necessary for its happiness and preservation, and could not lawfully be diminished by any compact. By Vattel, page 10, section 31, "the consequences of a good or bad constitution being of such importance, and the nation being strictly obliged to procure, as far as possible, the best and most convenient one, it has a right to every thing necessary to enable it to fulfil this obligation. It is then manifest, that a nation has an indisputable right to form, maintain, and perfect its constitution; to regulate, at pleasure, every thing relating to its government, and that no person can have a just right to hinder it. Government is only established for the sake of the nation, with a view to its safety and happiness." A State was as much bound by the Constitution and the law of nature to preserve its integrity and sovereignty, in reference to the State, as Congress were by the Constitution and law of nature to preserve the integrity and sovereignty of the nation. An acquisition or surrender of powers and sovereignty, by either the general or a State government, beyond what the Constitution, the law of nations, and the law of man had pointed out, would be unlawful, and consequently void.

The confederation of the several States was, in fact, nothing more or less than an alliance, offensive and defensive; each State was an ally in regard to all the other States. Missouri proposed to become one of the allies in the Confederation; but she did not intend to contract an unequal alliance that amounted to a diminution of her sovereignty; nor could she, constitutionally, do so if she would. Gentlemen had said that this proposition, if acceded to by Missouri, did not amount to a diminution of her sovereignty; and that, therefore, she might lawfully make the compact, and Congress might lawfully exact it. Sovereignty in the United States was something more than a mere name—it was an actual condition of a State. Vattel, page 2, section 4, said, "any nation that governs itself, under what form soever, without dependence on any foreign power, is a sovereign State; its rights are naturally the same as those of any other State." Mr. S. was well apprized that the law of nations (Vattel, page 2, section 5) recognised, in certain cases, as "sovereign States, those which had united themselves to another more powerful by an unequal alliance, in which to the more powerful is given more honor—to the weaker more assistance." This was precisely the case in question; to the General Government was given more honor, and even more strength—to the State of Missouri more protection and assistance. A most extravagant doctrine had been advanced by gentlemen, that Congress had the right to exact by compact any thing, and assent to any condition, provided the State was left in possession of sufficient sovereignty to enable it to regulate its own municipal concerns; and that, as the State of Missouri could exist as a State, shorn of this attribute of sovereignty, that therefore she might, by compact, surrender it to Congress. Mr. S. denied the soundness, even in theory, of this proposition, but, in practice, it was of the most dangerous tendency; a State must be always regarded as an inferior ally in reference to all the other States in the Confederacy. The argument that gentlemen drew from the power Congress had to exact tribute, by way of taxes from the States, went but very little to support the proposition, that Congress had the power to contract for any portion of the sovereignty of a State. The payment of tribute, or taxes, was no evidence of the diminution of the sovereignty of a State; that was a matter to which a State might consent, and still retain all its essential independence. Vattel, page 2, section 7, said, "For, though the payment of tribute to a foreign Power does, in some degree, diminish the dignity of those States, from its being a confession of their weakness, yet it suffers their sovereignty to subsist entire." And in page 2, section 6, "that a weak State might, in order to provide for its safety, place itself under the protection of a more powerful one, and, in return, agree to perform several offices equivalent to that protection, without divesting itself of the right of government and sovereignty."

The conditions of these alliances might be infinitely varied; but Vattel, page 2, section 5, had shown "that whatever they are, provided the inferior ally reserved to itself the sovereignty, or the right of governing its own body, it ought to be considered as an independent State." Gentlemen, however, still unconvinced, to the great and essential truth in relation to States, that they cannot, by treaty or compact, constitutionally surrender any portion of their sovereignty, had, with an air of triumph, asked, where was the line to which they might go without trenching on the independence and sovereignty of the State? Mr. S. would answer, from the laws of nations. Vattel, p. 202, sect. 175, declared, that "the sovereignty subsists entire and unimpaired, where none of its constituent rights are transferred to the superior ally, or rendered, as to the exertion of them, dependent on his will. But the sovereignty is impaired when any of its rights are ceded to an ally, or even if the use of them be merely rendered dependent on the will of that ally."

The connexion of master and servant was a domestic relation; the intercourse between them was, in all the States, matter of municipal law; it had been always considered as depending on the constitutions and laws of the several States, and not the subject of foreign control. The relations existed in other States, were controlled by their own institutions, without Congressional interference; it was their constitutional, nay, one of their constituent rights, to regulate this connexion. Congress, in this particular, were making an effort to prohibit the existence of this relation in Missouri; they were exerting themselves to render the exercise of this sovereign, constitutional, and constituent right, dependent on their will; and yet gentlemen argue that this is not a compact that will diminish the sovereignty of Missouri.

Mr. S. was aware that there were cases of absolute necessity, and then it was not to be imputed as a crime, (Vattel, page 303, sect. 176,) under the pressure of which "a State would have a right to place herself in absolute subjection, and renounce her sovereignty if she found such measures necessary for her preservation; by a much stronger reason she has a right, under the same necessity, to abandon her allies; but a generous people will exhaust every resource before they submit to terms so severe and humiliating." The consequence of acting in conformity to this necessity would be, "that all former engagements would fall to the ground, together with the power that had concluded them." (Vattel, page 3, sect. 176.) Such would be the case in regard to Missouri: was she to accept conditions that rendered her absolutely dependent on the will of the General Government, all her former and present engagements would cease to be binding, because the sovereignty that made them so had ceased to exist.

Some gentlemen, thinking the ground taken by their coadjutors was too broad, had narrowed it down to this: that Congress had a right to contract for the surrender of any portion of the sovereignty of the State of Missouri, provided that such right did not deprive her of, or encroach on, her federal rights. One moment's examination of this branch of the question would put it forever at rest. All had agreed that, if the exposition went to deprive her of a federal right, that the requisition could not be made. Under the Constitution of the United States, second section, "Representatives and direct taxation shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within the Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and, excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of any other persons." He desired it to be remembered, that all gentlemen had agreed that Missouri could not be deprived of a federal right: now, among many other federal rights, was that of representation in the Congress of the United States, according to numbers, to be calculated in pursuance of the article of the Constitution before alluded to. Five negroes, then, were equal to three whites in that enumeration, on which representation was founded. By the restriction in question, then, Congress undertook to deprive Missouri of the means of acquiring a federal right; thus doing indirectly what all agreed could not be directly done. Mr. S. could see no substantial difference between depriving Missouri of a federal right, or the means of acquiring a federal right. They were, both the right and the means of acquiring the right, as regarded Missouri, vested rights under the Constitution, and by no treaty, compact, or law, could she be constitutionally deprived of either: and was Missouri to contract for this surrender, it would make the alliance, as regards her and the other States in the Union, in reference to the whole Union, unequal, unlawful, and consequently void; and what would be void, if done, it was not competent for the parties to do. It was laid down by Vattel, (page 203, sec. 177,) "that every State ought to be jealous of her glory, careful of maintaining her dignity, and preserving her independence, and nothing short of the last extremity, or motives the most weighty and substantial, ought ever to induce a people to contract an unequal alliance. This observation is particularly meant to apply to treaties, (or compacts,) when the inequality prevails on the side of the weaker ally, and still more particularly to those unequal alliances that degrade the sovereignty. Men of courage and spirit will accept such treaties (or compacts) from no other hands but those of impious necessity." The restriction in question would degrade the sovereignty, because it would diminish the State independence, and deprive Missouri of the means of acquiring federal rights; and in the same proportion that the sovereignty of Missouri would be diminished, and the exercise of any of her constituent rights rendered dependent on the will of Congress—in that exact proportion would the powers of Congress be increased beyond those given by the Federal Constitution. Mr. S. hoped that it was sufficiently clear that Congress, neither by treaty nor compact could increase or diminish their powers; nor was it competent for a State, by treaty or compact, to surrender any portion of its sovereignty. It next remained to inquire, whether Congress could, by an ordinary act of legislation, accomplish the object? And this depended on the powers given in the Constitution.

The very act of exacting this restriction as treaty, or compact, and which required the assent of Missouri, showed that it was a portion of the sovereignty of the State, that you cannot take away without their consent. The Constitution of the United States sets out with this principle—"that all legislative powers herein granted (not inferred) shall be vested in a Congress of the United States." But, even was the Constitution silent as to the disposition of powers between the General and State Governments, a knowledge of the history how the Constitution was formed, would give a strong answer against the assumption of the authority now contended for. The framers of the Constitution were jealous of State rights, and therefore left nothing to be inferred, against which they could possibly provide. The powers of the General Government were the delegated powers, and not the powers of the States, or the rights of the people derived from the Federal Government. All right and authority was inherent in the people; they alone were supreme; they surrendered a portion of their natural and inherent rights to the State authorities, and a portion of the Federal Government; and the grant by them made was to be construed only for their benefit, and in the advancement and protection of their other rights. Congress had no powers but those expressly given, or those inferrible, as being absolutely necessary and proper to enable them to carry those given into effect. The ninth and tenth articles of the amendments to the Constitution settled this question: the first of which provided, that "the enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people." And the second declared, that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." When, therefore, Congress were about to exercise an authority, it was to the enumerated powers in the Constitution that they were to look for the right: if not found there, it did not exist; for all other than those were inherent in, and expressly reserved to, the States, and to the people.

Mr. S. would not delay the House by attempting a history of the causes and formation of the Constitution. It was well known to have been a matter of compromise between free, sovereign, and independent States; most of whom, at the time of its adoption, held more or less slaves; nor was it reasonable to suppose, that it was within the purview or meaning of the makers, that, at any subsequent period, it should be left to the discretion of either party that might become dominant, to impose slaves on those who had them not, contrary to their wishes—or to deprive others who had them, or who entertained a wish to acquire that description of property, of the discretion to do so. Mr. S. not only denied the power of Congress to prohibit the citizens of any State from enjoying the advantages resulting from the immediate use of slaves, but he would, also, repel their pretensions to legislate in relation to the increase. Societies, constitutions, and laws, were as much formed to secure the faculties and produce of property, as for the protection of the immediate object of property itself. Let the legislators destroy this principle, and occupancy alone, as in olden times, would be the only remaining evidence of property and of right.

The powers given to Congress by the Constitution were few, express, limited, positive, and defined; the majority of them were to be found in the 8th section of that instrument, and consisted in the authority to levy taxes, borrow money, and regulate commerce; establish an uniform system of bankruptcy; to regulate the coin, punish counterfeiting, establish post offices and post roads, constitute courts, declare war, raise armies, maintain a navy, call forth the militia, organize and regulate them; to have exclusive jurisdiction over the District of Columbia, and their forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and to make all laws which should be necessary and proper to carry into effect the enumerated powers. Mr. S. could not discover that the authority to impose restrictions on States could be derived from any latitude of construction growing out of this section. But, the powers of Congress were not only enumerated and expressed in the Constitution; the 10th section was equally explicit in declaring of what attributes of sovereignty the States should be deprived; no State was to enter into any treaty of alliance, grant letters of marque and reprisal, coin money, emit bills of credit, make any thing but gold and silver a tender, pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, impair contracts, or grant titles of nobility; nor, without consent of Congress, lay imposts or duties on imports or exports, lay any duty on tonnage, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, or make any agreement with any foreign Power, or even with a sister State, or engage in war, unless actually invaded. The States, then, were divested by the Constitution of no portion of sovereignty but those actually named and voluntarily surrendered; all other powers, and the residue of sovereignty, were inherent in, and expressly reserved to, the States and the people.

It was said, that, since the year 1808, Congress had power to prohibit the migration or importation of such persons as the States existing at the time of forming the Constitution thought proper to admit; and that, under the powers given in that clause of the Constitution, Congress might prohibit the removal of slaves to Missouri, both as a territory and a State, and impose the restriction. The Constitution of the United States not only admitted and permitted, but was partly based on domestic slavery; yet gentlemen said it was contrary to the principles and genius of the American Government—although the Constitution in but few instances recognised them to be free moral agents, but acknowledged them to be property, and not freemen, and guarantied to the master an ownership which his fellow-citizen, living in another State, and holding different principles, could not legislate from him. The 2d section of the 4th article of the Constitution provided that "no person held to service or labor in one State under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or legislation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due." A sister and sovereign State could not emancipate slaves fleeing to its jurisdiction; could Congress, then, do that which the Constitution had said should not be done by the independent sovereignty to which the fugitive fled? The framers of the Constitution never thought that Congress had the authority to prohibit the removal of slaves to any State; or that they would pretend to the still more alarming power of legislating the emancipation of slaves that were lawfully in, or might flee to any State. It was considered as an incident of sovereignty, as a matter of State right and of municipal legislation. The only danger was, that the States would exercise it to the prejudice of each other; against that state of things the Constitution had guarded, and deprived the respective States of the exercise of that power which they had without such prohibition. To make the argument more plain, he would state a case: Could Congress pass a law operating the emancipation of the slaves in Kentucky, or of their increase? Or, could Congress pass a law declaring that if a citizen of Kentucky removed to Ohio with his slaves, that in consequence of such removal, his slaves should be free? Or, would it not depend on the Constitution and laws of Ohio? If, then, Congress could not pass a law emancipating the slaves in a State, or pass a law declaring that their emancipation should be the consequence of removing them from one State to another State; it was not within the scope of his faculties to discover how the restriction was authorized by this clause of the Constitution. But let it, for argument only, be granted, that Congress had the power to prohibit the migration of slaves from any other State to Missouri, how far would that authority give to Congress the right to legislate in reference to the slaves, and the children of slaves, that were now in Missouri? The power to prohibit the migration had reference alone to the State where the slaves were, and not to Missouri. A general law, then, would be most proper, declaring that no slave should be removed from one State to another; and that would be a question of restriction for the slaveholding States to submit to, and not the question of restriction in regard to Missouri. The term migration indicated an exercise of free will, the exercise of which was not to be attributed to slaves; and he believed the real meaning of that portion of the Constitution was to authorize Congress to prohibit, after 1808, that great influx of the rabble of foreign countries, who, migrating to the United States encumbered with their passions and prejudices, might, in the end, endanger the Constitution and the Union. The term importation all understood as solely intended to provide against the further introduction, from abroad, of the unhappy sons and daughters of Africa, and not to give to Congress the power to regulate the distribution of those that were here.

The second section of the fourth article of the Constitution provided that "the citizens of each State should be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States." The obvious meaning of this clause was, that the rights of the citizens in one State should be equal to the rights of the citizens of any other State, and that, so far as the citizens of one State had the right to regulate their matters of internal policy, so far should the citizens of any other State have the same rights, privileges, and immunities—not only the rights of the citizens, individually, but their rights taken collectively as States, were to be equal in all respects whatsoever. For example, if the people of the State of New York had the exclusive power to make their own constitution and laws, and to provide that slaves should, or should not be introduced, so the State of Missouri, to be equal in power to the State of New York, must possess the same sovereign authority.

The second clause of the third section of the fourth article provided that "Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States." The whole context of this article showed that it was as property, and not otherwise, that Congress were to make rules and regulations. Certainly the boldest advocate for restriction would not contend that Congress had any property in the persons of the citizens of Missouri, because they were circumstantially connected with a Territory over which they had a limited control. Surely gentlemen would not undertake to advance the doctrine that Congress had any property in the confirmed lands of individuals, or in the lands purchased of the Government and patented to the purchaser, and still less had Congress any property in the rights of the people. And if Congress even had the power contended for, while they owned the land, it would surely cease to exist so soon as they parted with the soil. The sovereignty of Congress over the territory, as the lords paramount, was but temporary, and could only endure so long as they retained the soil; when that was disposed of, their sovereignty ceased also. Yet, by virtue of this brief and temporary authority, limited in its extent, and short in its duration, Congress were about to fix on Missouri a never-ending condition, that was to continue long after the authority on which it rested for existence, had passed away. If, in consequence of owning the land, Congress possessed that description of sovereignty that would authorize them to legislate in regard to the property of the citizens of a Territory or a State, or to dictate what kind of property the citizens should introduce and hold, then might they at this day undertake to regulate the affairs of the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama; and their right to impose restrictions on each of them, similar to that contemplated in regard to Missouri, would be equally as unquestionable. The whole amount of the authority Congress could claim under this clause of the Constitution, was, to make rules and regulations for the surveying and disposing of the public lands, to regulate the quantities in which it should be sold, the price, and the credit. But this power was limited in its operation to the property alone, and by no construction could be extended to the rights of the citizens inhabiting the Territory, Congress had no power over the right or property of the citizen, but, in certain cases, to levy taxes; and this authority was one of those expressly conferred by the Constitution, and was not alone supported by inference.

Mr. S. would now take a short view of the gentlemen's Gibraltar, behind which they had entrenched themselves, and thought they were secure and invulnerable. The third section of the fourth article provided that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." But, he contended that they were to be admitted on equal terms, and to be equal after admission. When Congress now used the term State, it was to be understood as the framers of the Constitution understood it; they meant a body politic, precisely similar in all respects to those that then formed the Confederacy, and were about to adopt the Constitution, and become parties in the Government. The term State had a precise, and, if gentlemen pleased, a technical meaning: Its attributes were freedom, sovereignty, and independence. By the principles of our Government, as recognised by the Declaration of American Independence, there were no parties but those determining to be free, concerned or consulted in making that declaration. The exercise of the free will was the only act necessary to achieve the moral independence of any people. Such had been the fact, in regard to the United States; and, in point of principle, such was still the case. If a new State only become independent by the act of admission, and was not free by virtue of inherent right before admission, then he inquired, when the old thirteen United States had become free? Was it by the treaty of peace of one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three? No; for the first article of the treaty only acknowledged a condition that antecedently existed, and of which the conduct and declarations of Great Britain only furnished the motive, not the right, for the right was from above. Was it by the formation and adoption of the Federal Constitution? No; for that Constitution was the act of their own free will, which of itself pre-supposed independence as being essential and necessary to make the instrument binding. Americans dated their freedom from the Declaration of Independence, of the 4th of July, 1776. It was then clear that, to be free, sovereign, and independent, as a State, it was only necessary to will and to declare so. To maintain that independence required physical force, and was another question into which he would not now inquire.

Mr. S. said that, as a territory, the Constitution of the United States was but relative to Missouri; it was only on becoming a State that she would incur all the duties, and partake of the full advantages, of the Constitution. No power could extend the Federal Constitution over Missouri as a State; it required her assent to be freely given; she must ratify and accept of it before it was her constitution. All its force and binding efficacy were derived from her voluntary act; and yet gentlemen undertake to impose a restriction on Missouri; growing, as they say, out of the powers contained in the Constitution, when that same Constitution was not applicable to the territorial condition of the country; nor was she any party to the instrument until she became a State, and assented to its provisions. To admit a new State was not solely the act of Congress—it was a compact between the new and the old States. The General Government was confederated, formed by compact between separate and independent States; the parts of which were, or ought to be, all equal. Missouri, as a new State, had the right to join the compact upon the same terms that others had done, surrendering only the same proportion of her inherent and political liberties. To make the election to join the compact, she must be considered as free and independent; for if, at the moment of admission, she was dependent, then the compact would not be binding on her. It was very doubtful whether Congress could give the rights of a State to a dependency; but he was quite sure that Congress could not make the dependency incur the duties of a State, because they depended on free assent, which an independent people alone could give. The fourth section of the fourth article provided, that “the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.” So sacred was the soil and rights of freemen, that the Congress could not, without violating the Constitution, enter the confines of a State, even to protect them against domestic violence, without a call from the constituted authorities; yet Congress were about to break on the lines of the sovereignty of Missouri, trample down the rights of the citizens, and inhibit the introduction or use of property acknowledged by the Constitution of the land to belong to its citizens. Congress was to “guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government.” Independence as a State, and incorporation into the Union, were two distinct things: the first was inherent; the second required the assent of Congress; in giving which assent Congress were then “to guaranty a republican form of government.” This was not one of the powers, but one of the duties of Congress, and the mistake of this duty for a right or power had produced all this absurd construction of the Constitution. “Congress may admit new States into this Union.” This clause spoke volumes on the subject. “This Union” meant the Union then formed, and “the State” was to be such a State as was then entering into the Union. If Missouri was admitted under restrictions and conditions that did not exist in relation to any of the States then existing, it was not “into the Union” that Missouri was admitted, but into a new union. If Missouri was compelled to surrender more of her privileges, or a greater portion of her sovereignty, to obtain admission into the Union, than other States had done, then by precisely so much more of her privileges and sovereignty as she had to surrender to obtain admission, just so much the more did she pay for her admission; and then it was not into “this Union” she was incorporated, but into another Union, formed by special compact in that particular case. And thus every State that was admitted might be required to submit to some extraordinary condition, until the original principles of the Constitution were entirely lost, and it would become a matter of contract, in which each party would make the best bargain they could, and “this Union” would be no longer “this Union,” nor would the term State be any longer intelligible, because it would give you no idea of what were its powers, its privileges, or its attributes. This argument might be further illustrated by that portion of the Constitution that gave Congress power “to establish a uniform rule of naturalization.” Congress were not obliged to exercise the power at all; but, if they did exercise it, they must make the rule uniform. So they were not obliged to admit a State; but, if they did admit a State, it must be on uniform principles; for example—Congress could not say that the subjects of France should remain in a state of probation ten years before they could become citizens, and that the subjects of Great Britain should only remain five years in suspension, because this would not be uniform, and would be making one applicant pay a greater price for the privileges of citizenship than another. Just so in regard to Missouri—if admitted, no greater price was to be exacted from her, in becoming a State, and entering into the Union, than had been paid by any other State heretofore admitted. And the parallel might be carried further; Congress could not say that the foreigner should become a citizen, but that, after he had become a citizen, he should not hold land, or any other description of property, because that would be a condition that would defeat the grant, and a restriction inconsistent with citizenship; which, when acquired, placed him, in all respects, on the footing of a natural-born citizen. And so in regard to Missouri; Congress might absolutely refuse her admission; but, if they choose to admit, they could impose no restriction inconsistent with her condition as a State. Other arguments and parallels might be shown, but he would rest this branch of the subject here.

Gentlemen, still doubting their authority to impose this restriction, as derived from the Constitution alone, had resorted to precedent to bear them out. Mr. S. would also refer to those precedents, and show that a large majority of them were in favor of Missouri, and the residue, if precedent at all, could not be so construed in reference to Missouri, because they were not even analogous. In the act of the Virginia Legislature, of 1788, giving their assent to the creation of a new State in the district of Kentucky, there was no condition. In the act of Congress, of 1791, admitting Kentucky into the Union as a new and entire State, there was no condition imposed whatever. The next State admitted was Vermont, in 1791; when Congress admitted her as a new and entire State into the Union, no restriction or condition was even hinted at in the act of admission. In the deed of cession from North Carolina, of 1790, for that portion of territory which now formed the State of Tennessee, an express exception was made in relation to slaves, and Congress were prohibited from making any regulations that would tend to their emancipation. And when, in 1796, Tennessee became a State, she was admitted by Congress into the Union, without a condition or limitation, equal in all respects whatever, as one of the United States. When, in 1802, Georgia ceded to the United States that portion of territory which now composed the States of Mississippi and Alabama, she had forecast enough to inhibit the application of the ordinance of 1787 to that country; nor was there in the act of 1817, authorizing the people of Mississippi to form a constitution and State government, or in the resolution admitting her into the Union, any condition similar to the restriction in question. And in the act of 1819, giving the people of Alabama power to form their constitution and organize their State, as also in the resolution for their admission, research might in vain be made for any conditions. Of the State of Louisiana he would speak hereafter, and would now turn his attention to the great and binding precedents derived from Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, as predicated on the ordinance of 1787. The deed of cession from Virginia, of 1784, was simply a transfer of the soil and sovereignty, and did not contain any stipulation either for or against the introduction of slaves. Virginia had not been so provident in reference to the future settlements in the Northwest Territory, as North Carolina and Georgia subsequently were, because they had the ordinance of 1787 before them, and Virginia could not have anticipated a regulation of the character of that ordinance. When Congress passed the ordinance of 1787, the fifth article contravened the provisions of the deed of cession as to the subsequent division of the Territory into States, and, when Virginia was referred to for her assent to that alteration, she did, by her act of 1788, consent to that alteration, and that alteration only; for no other modification of the deed of cession was asked for, nor was any other taken into consideration, or assented to, by Virginia. The 6th article of that ordinance of 1787, from which all arguments seemed to be drawn, never did receive the consent of Virginia, but was an ex parte act of legislation, ordinary in its character, and similar to any other act of legislation, except its extraordinary qualities of expansion. It was true that the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, had complied with the provision of that ordinance; but it was not in pursuance of its intrinsic binding force; it was to be accounted for only on the principle that the ordinance, in its operation on settlers, while the country was yet a Territory, and subject to Congressional control, had so regulated the emigration, and prepared the settlers to comply with the provisions, that, in forming their constitutions, they voluntarily chose to do so. The Old Congress, when making the ordinance, had proceeded as in other acts of legislation, until they reached the articles of that ordinance; they then assumed the ground that those articles should be matter of compact between the United States and the people and States northwest of the Ohio. But with whom were those articles matter of compact? Not with the people, for there were but few, if any, there; not with the States, for there was not probably two thousand people in the whole country, and they were hundreds of miles apart, in little villages, and knew nothing about it, nor were they ever consulted, and, had they been, no assent they could have given would have bound the inhabitants now there, or the millions yet unborn. No, sir; it was a compact with the mountains, the woods, and the lakes, who were personified and made to consent for inhabitants yet to come. But, Mr. S. said, the most remarkable circumstance was yet behind; the question under consideration was one of the Constitutional powers of Congress under the Constitution.

To ascertain what powers Congress had under the Constitution, which was ratified the 17th September, 1787, resort was made to an ordinance of the 13th July, 1787, several months, in date, prior to the Constitution of the United States. The ordinance was passed by the Old Congress, under the Articles of Confederation. The adoption of the Federal Constitution was the formation of a new Government, and an abolition of the old; and yet, an ordinance passed by the former Government was brought up in judgment to define and expound the powers of Congress under a new and totally different Government—under a new Constitution, and new organization. Gentlemen had contended that Congress had revived and ratified the Ordinance in the act of 1802, relating to Ohio; the act of 1816, relating to Indiana; and the act of 1818, in reference to Illinois; these being the acts by which Congress authorized those States to form a constitution and State government. But, were he to surrender this part of the argument to gentlemen, could it possibly be deduced, that, because Congress had revived the ordinance in reference to any one or all those States, that, by that revival, it would have any operation beyond the State actually named, and to which it was applied? Nor, had the question ever been made, by any of those States, which Missouri now made, how far Congress had the power to impose the provisions of that ordinance over a State; they had taken it as a matter of course, because it comported with their wishes and their will. Missouri did not intend so to take it, because it neither promoted her interest, or complied with her wishes or her will; nor did he believe that either of those States would now acknowledge that they had not the equal right with any other State of the Union to call a convention, and so alter their constitution as to admit of slavery; and, if they had this right, the operation of the ordinance upon them as a State was void, and of no avail. The ordinance of 1787, then, was a dead letter, so far as it had been resorted to as furnishing any explanation of the powers of Congress under the Federal Constitution, and it was equally inapplicable, as precedent, in relation to Missouri, because, at no period of the Territorial government, had any portion of its provisions been extended to that Territory, save only those principles that had been incorporated into the act of the 4th of June, 1802, when the second grade of government had been conferred upon Missouri.

Of the eight States of which Mr. S. had spoken, and that had been incorporated into the Union since the adoption of the Constitution, five of them were admitted as slaveholding States, and the other three as non-slaveholding States. Louisiana, of which he would now speak, was, though not in order of time, the ninth. And arguments had been drawn from the law of 1811, authorizing her to form a constitution and State government, in favor of the restriction, and prejudicial to the sovereignty of Missouri. The argument of gentlemen could gain no strength by referring to that law, because it expressly excepted Louisiana from the operation of the sixth article of the ordinance of 1787, in relation to slaves. And, in fact, as early as 1803, when a temporary government was provided for that portion of the country now included in the State of Louisiana, and the ordinance of 1787 extended to them, the sixth article of the ordinance was not considered applicable to their condition. Every restriction imposed on the State of Louisiana was precisely those contained in the Constitution of the United States, with the exception of that clause that required them to publish their laws and judicial proceedings in the English language; this provision did not deduct from their sovereignty, and was only shaping their laws and proceedings so as to give them "full faith and credit" in the other States in the Union. (Const. U. S., art. iv., sec. 1.) A precedent, to be binding, ought to be a decision made in some similar case; none had been produced, nor did any exist. The ordinance of 1787, was passed while that country was in the first grade of Government—Missouri was in the second grade. Congress had conferred on Missouri the right of self-government, in all respects whatsoever; nor did he know of any instance in which Congress had interfered after such a transfer of their powers. Then, of the nine States that had been admitted into the Union since the adoption of the Federal Constitution, six had been admitted as slaveholding States, and three as non-slaveholding States; the precedents, then, if of any force, were two to one on the side of Missouri.

But, Mr. S. said, there was no absolute necessity to hang any longer on the Constitutional ground. It was unnecessary to argue from the Constitution, or from precedent, as alone applicable to Missouri. All the powers Congress had over the territory were derived from solemn treaty, and that same treaty gave, guaranteed, and secured, the rights, liberties, religion, and property, of the citizens, and he believed that the obligations Congress were under to fulfil those engagements, in reference to the territory, was as strong as their right to the country under the treaty; and a delay, unreasonable in itself, or an ultimate refusal on the part of Congress, to perfect those engagements, might be fairly construed to be tantamount to an abandonment of the country ceded. The stipulation that the territory and inhabitants should be incorporated into the Union, was concurrent with the act of acquisition; they formed part of the same compact. When the province was acquired, it was made a question whether the United States could, constitutionally, purchase and hold foreign territory; that question being conceded, and settled in the affirmative, it only remained to inquire how the Government would hold the country acquired—whether the territory should be admitted as States, in pursuance of the treaty, or whether it should be held as provinces in vassalage.

Mr. S. said, that the people of Missouri relied with perfect confidence, for admission into the Union, on the third article of the treaty of the 30th of April, 1803; the words of which were, "the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and admitted, as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities, of citizens of the United States, and, in the meantime, they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess." Various interpretations had been given to this article of the treaty, by the advocates of the restriction; some had taken the broad ground that it contained no stipulation for admission as a State in any way; others had said that the treaty, in reference to the people, would be fulfilled, by giving them leave to remove east of the Mississippi river, leaving all their property behind, and there mixing, mingling, and becoming incorporated into the Union with those who reside on a part of the old territory of the United States; while others had contended that Missouri could only be incorporated into the Union by being attached to some portion of the ancient territory of the United States; and others had argued that the provisions of the treaty only related to the citizens in the province at the time of acquisition, and did not enure to the advantage or security even of your own citizens that had removed to the territory since the treaty; and, to crown the whole, some reasoners, more bold than others, contended that, if the treaty did contain stipulations for admission as a State into the Union, it was not binding, because the President and Senate could not make a treaty to bind Congress. He would not follow gentlemen through all the mazes in which they had involved themselves, but would briefly examine what obligations Congress were under by the treaty; what rights the people had under the treaty; what was the fair construction and interpretation honest statesmen would give the treaty; and what appeared to be the evident intentions of the parties.

Mr. S. hoped it was not necessary for him to impress on American statesmen the inviolable faith that ought to be observed in reference to treaties in the civilized world. Vattel, page 129, sect. 219, seemed to wonder that any man should think or act without regard to them: "Who can doubt that treaties are in the number of those things that are to be held sacred by nations? By treaties the most important affairs are determined; by them the pretensions of sovereigns are regulated; on them nations are to depend for the acknowledgment of their rights, and the security of the dearest interests. Between bodies politic, between sovereigns who acknowledge no superior on earth, treaties are the only means of adjusting their various pretensions; of establishing fixed rules of conduct; of ascertaining what they are entitled to expect, and what they are to depend on. But treaties are no better than empty words, if nations do not consider them as respectable engagements, as rules which are to be inviolably observed by sovereigns, and held sacred throughout the whole earth." And Vattel continues, in the same page, section 220, that "the faith of treaties, that firm and sincere resolution, that invariable constancy in fulfilling our engagements, of which we make profession in a treaty, is therefore to be held sacred and inviolable between the nations of the earth, whose safety and repose it secures; and if mankind be not wilfully deficient in their duty to themselves, infamy must ever be the portion of him who violates his faith." He did not wish to see the charge retorted on his Government that had been so correctly made by her in regard to Spain. To disregard the treaty under which Missouri claimed admission into the Union, would be a double breach of faith; first, as it regarded the power with whom it was made; next, in relation to the people of Missouri, for whose exclusive benefit the third article was introduced. Vattel, in the same page, section 221, declared, that "he who violates his treaties, violates, at the same time, the law of nations; for he disregards the faith of treaties—that faith which the law of nations declares sacred; and, so far as depends on him, he renders it vain and ineffectual; doubly guilty, he does an injury to his ally—he does an injury to all nations, and inflicts a wound on the great society of mankind." Mr. S. called on gentlemen to know if they were prepared to bring this charge on their Government, or to sustain it themselves? Were gentlemen ready to sport with the engagements of the nation, and set the faith of treaties at defiance, by subjecting them to whimsical and constrained constructions not recognised by the laws of nations, and in opposition to the plainest dictates of common sense? He believed he had now sufficiently established the indispensable necessity of keeping promises, alike interesting to the contracting parties, and to the universal society of mankind.

But the intention and meaning of the treaty of cession had become matter of great doubt with gentlemen in favor of the restriction. The meaning of the treaty is said to be involved, and the words used obscure. Vattel, page 249, section 273, said that "words are only designated to express the thoughts; thus, the true signification of an expression in common use, is, the idea which custom has affixed to that expression. It is, then, a gross quibble to affix a particular sense to a word, in order to elude the true sense of the entire expression." The word "incorporate" had been said not to mean admission as a State into the Union. Had the law of nations and the known rules of construction been silent, the plain and common sense of every man would teach him what was the intention of the parties to the treaty from the "entire expression." It was not fair to select a single word from a whole sentence, and on that alone to bottom what the construction of the whole sentence was, or ought to be. Vattel, page 249, section 274, declared that "all these pitiful subtleties are overthrown by this unerring rule. When we evidently see what is the sense that agrees with the intention of the contracting parties, it is not allowable to wrest their words to a contrary meaning. The intention sufficiently known furnishes the matter of convention—what is promised and accepted, demanded and granted." What, then, was the true and legitimate understanding of being "incorporated into the union of the United States?" Did it, as some gentlemen supposed, furnish the people with the privilege of removing from the territory, from their property, and their homes, into Illinois, for example, and there of being incorporated as citizens of the United States as a part of the State of Illinois into the Union? And would this comport with that part of the treaty that secured to the inhabitants their liberty and their property? This would be a passing strange construction of the treaty in fact, to provide for maintaining the citizens in the full enjoyment of their "property," which, to obtain the advantage of incorporation into the Union, you secure him the "liberty" to leave. A construction such as the one contended for by gentlemen would not only operate the greatest injustice, and that we were not at liberty to suppose a just notion would do, but would lead to an absurdity which we ought always to avoid. Vattel, page 252, section 282, said: "Every interpretation that leads to an absurdity ought to be rejected; or, in other words, we should not give to any piece a meaning from which any absurd consequences would follow; but must interpret it in such a manner as to avoid absurdity." He could not resist the conviction that an interpretation which required of the people of Missouri to abandon their property to secure their liberty as citizens under the treaty, or that forbid their admission into the Union, but in conjunction with some portion of the ancient territory, was, in the language of Vattel, "a gross quibble," and an "absurd construction," not within the intention of the parties to the treaty, which intention, in all cases of national and municipal law, was always to be regarded in construing the instrument.

Mr. S. said that this great rule of construing the instrument, with reference to the intention of the parties, was laid down by Vattel, page 258, section 291, "to defeat the pretexts and pitiful evasions of those who endeavor to elude laws or treaties. Good faith adheres to the intention, fraud insists on the terms, when it thinks that they can furnish a cloak for its prevarications." The fatal results that would accrue to the rights of one party, was it left for the other to put such construction as suited his interests and views on the instrument, was too apparent to require elucidation. Vattel, page 245, section 265, gives it as a "general maxim or principle, on the subject of interpretation, that neither the one nor the other of the parties interested in the contract, has a right to interpret the deed according to his own fancy." Nothing could be more clear than the propriety of the rule, was it competent for one party to disregard the intention and put such construction on any instrument as comported with the views or policy of his "fancy." It would result in this, that, having the liberty of affixing such meaning as you please to my promise, you would have the power of obliging me to do whatever you choose, contrary to my intention, and beyond my real engagements; while, on the other hand, if I am allowed to explain my promise as I please, I might render them vain and illusory by giving them a meaning quite different from that which they presented to you, and in which you must have understood them at the time of your accepting them. Neither Missouri nor Congress had the exclusive right of interpreting the treaty under which Missouri claimed admission. He was however willing, on the part of Missouri, to abide by that construction which those rules would furnish that had been established and practised on long anterior to 1803; and he had no hesitation in saying, that the people he represented would abide by, and redeem his pledge, on this, to them the most important of all subjects.

Mr. S. would not state it as his own opinion only, but would support it by another reference to the law of nations, Vattel, page 245, section 226, that, "on every accession, when a person could and ought to have made known his intentions, we are to assume for true against him what he has sufficiently declared." This was an incontrovertible principle, and was equally applicable to every description of agreement, whether, in its character, of a public or private nature; it was a duty which both individuals and States owed to each other, who did not mean to make a vain play of words to express themselves with truth, and according to their real intentions; were it otherwise, it would be perfectly useless to form contracts or treaties; if the meaning could be clearly collected from the whole tenor of the instrument, we were to take that as his evident intentions. Vattel, page 246, section 268, said that, "in the interpretation of a treaty, or of any deed whatever, the question is to discover what the contracting parties have agreed upon, to determine precisely, on any particular occasion, what has been promised and accepted; that is to say, not only what one of the parties intended to promise, but also what the other must reasonably and candidly have supposed to be promised to him, what has been sufficiently declared to him, and what must have influenced him in his acceptance." He inquired of gentlemen whether, honestly and candidly, it was not sufficiently evident, from the whole tenor of the treaty in question, that the United States had promised to admit the ceded territory into the Union as States; and whether that did not appear to be one of the conditions of the acceptance of the terms, and the transfer of the country? Gentlemen had made the inquiry—"on the words of which of the parties was the greatest stress to be laid?" He was prepared to give, from high authority, a conclusive answer to this interrogatory. Vattel, page 245-6, section 267, said, "it is very certain that, in order to discover the true meaning of the contract, attention ought principally to be paid to the words of the promising party, for he voluntarily binds himself by his words, and we take for true against him what he has sufficiently declared." The United States had voluntarily promised to "incorporate the inhabitants of the ceded territory into the union of the United States," and we were to take for true that such was the understanding of the parties to the treaty; and upon this ground the people of Missouri claimed admission into the Federal Union as a State.

Mr. S. would not enter into the argument whether the President and Senate could, by treaty, bind this House to the performance of any engagements; whether the treaty-making power could or could not lay Congress under obligations, was an abstract proposition, and not the question under consideration. The treaty under which Missouri claimed her rights had not only been made by the Constitutional and competent authorities of the nation, but had actually received the sanction of this House, and of every branch of the Government in every practicable way. Various acts of Congress had been passed appropriating money to carry the treaty into effect to authorize the President to take possession of the country, to establish territorial governments within the territories—lifting them from grade to grade of government, until Louisiana had, in pursuance of the treaty and of the promise contained in the act of the second of March, 1805, been admitted as a State into the Union, even without any restriction in relation to slavery, and Missouri had now come prepared to take the same step; and, however valid the objection of gentlemen might have been at an early day, before Congress had acted in regard to the treaty, it was now too late to make the objection, after an uniform concurrence of various acts of legislation, acknowledging the binding force of the treaty for eighteen years.

The treaty, then, having been made by the constituted authorities of the country, having received the uniform sanction of the National Legislature, and being in its object and terms sufficiently clear, the only remaining question on this head was, what obligations the Government were under by the treaty, and what were the rights of the people of Missouri. Vattel, page 196, section 164, said, "as the engagements of a treaty impose on the one hand a perfect obligation, they produce on the other a perfect right. The breach of a treaty is, therefore, a violation of the perfect right of the party with whom we have contracted, and this is an act of injustice against him."

The obligations on the part of Congress, under this valid treaty, were "perfect" or absolute; the rights of the people of Missouri were also perfect, in contemplation of the parties and the law of nations; they had the real and indubitable right to require the fulfilment of the engagement, a refusal was a violation of the right, and of the original obligation; there would no longer be any security in the commerce or contracts between mankind, if the faith of promises were not regarded in relation to each other; the security, the happiness, the tranquillity, of the whole human race depended on justice, and the regard that was paid to the rights of others. The rights of the people of Missouri, under the treaty, were not limited to the bare admission as a State into the Union; its provisions extended to securing them in their actual possessions and the rights of property; their right to ask, nay, even demand admission into the Union as a State, so soon as they had numbers sufficient to entitle them to a representation on the floor of Congress, was perfect, and, he hoped, would not be evaded or refused.

Mr. S. would now proceed to show, that, whatever might have been the original power of Congress over the liberties and property of the people of Missouri, they had parted with that power, and confirmed the people in all their rights; and that Missouri has the right, both on the ground of written law and custom, to declare exemption from the restriction in question. The act of 1803 authorized the President to take possession of the country, and to fix a temporary government; and that act showed that Congress, at that time, felt something like a due regard for the rights of the people, and the obligations of the treaty; for it had authorized the President to employ all means, including military force, to maintain and protect the inhabitants in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion, using the express words of the treaty of cession. The act of 1804, by which the province was divided into two territories, and a temporary government established for each, so far as regarded Missouri, extended the powers of the Governor and Judges of Indiana over that Territory, and gave them full legislative powers, but required that all the laws which might be passed should be transmitted and laid before Congress. When those officers went to the Territory they found it full of slaves, and one of the first laws they ever enacted, on the 1st of October, 1804, was that regulating slaves; this law, regulating the relations between master and servant, was reported, by the Governor and Judges, to be laid before Congress; and, as it might be out of order to say that Congress had not done their duty, he was at liberty to conclude that they had passed on, and approved of the statute. This law had laid open to Government the actual condition of the country; and, although Congress, with a full knowledge of this fact, had again, as early as the 3d of March, 1805, legislated in regard to the territory, yet it had never entered into their views to interfere on the subject; on the contrary, the 9th section of the act of 1805, expressly confirmed and sanctioned all laws in the territory at that time, of which that regulating slaves was one, so that we were no longer left to infer the consent of Congress to the territorial law of 1804, as regarded slaves, but were at liberty to state that Congress had solemnly recognised this description of property, and the right of the people to retain and regulate it. In fact, the 13th section of the law of Congress of 1804, had recognised and continued in force all the laws of the territory at the time of acquisition, until the same should be altered, modified, or repealed, by the local legislature.

All the Spanish and French laws, written and unwritten, had recognised the rights of the people to have slaves, and Congress expressly acknowledged their validity and binding force. The act of 1804 had made a distinction between the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana, (now Missouri:) the 10th section of that law had prohibited Orleans—first, from importing slaves; second, from introducing those imported after 1798; and, thirdly, against all introduction except by actual settlers. But those provisions were confined to the Territory of Orleans, and never were extended to the upper territory; it was so much more inland that Congress believed it unnecessary to make any provisions on the subject, and the upper territory was left to act according to her own discretion. The two acts of Congress of the second and third of March, 1805, had made another distinction that was favorable to the pretension of Missouri: by those laws the omnipotent ordinance of 1787, with the exception of the 6th article, was extended to Orleans; but no part, or clause thereof, had ever been extended to Missouri; and the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. CLAGETT) was vastly mistaken when he supposed that the ordinance was ever extended to Missouri, either by positive law, or the inference he had drawn from the powers of the Governor and Judges of Indiana having been extended over the Mississippi. It certainly could not be sound reasoning to say, that, because those officers, when in Indiana, were subject to the operation of the ordinance, that when they crossed the Mississippi, they had carried it on their shoulders and packed it on the people of Missouri. Orleans, however, notwithstanding the inhibition in regard to the introduction of slaves contained in the act of 1804, and the extension of the ordinance by the law of 1805, had been admitted into the Union as a State, without any restriction; and Missouri, although never subjected to any restriction or control, in relation to slaves, was now, for the first time, after a lapse of eighteen years, during all which time every encouragement had been given, and the tenor of every act run counter to the present pretensions, to be apprized of this disposition on the part of the Government, and suspended from the Union if she refused to comply. All the laws to which he had referred, were passed during the time the territories were in the first grade of government; and in each act, Congress seemed to have reserved something like a superintending power over the territorial laws, by having required copies of all their acts to be transmitted to be laid before Congress.

But the act of the 4th June, 1812, establishing the Missouri Territory, and giving the second grade of government, had dropped this and all other provisions, indicating any thing like a superintendence over the laws of the territory, and had given to the local legislature all legislative power without reserve. This act had given to the Executive all the powers possessed by the Executives of the States, and even more, for the Governor had, in addition to granting pardons for offences against the territory, the power to grant reprieves for crimes against the United States. This law had regulated the representation, and based it on the free white population of the country; thereby acknowledging that Congress were well apprized of the existence of other than free whites in the territory. This act, in addition to the treaty, naturalized the citizens and regulated their privileges; and again declared that free white males alone should be eligible to offices, and competent as jurors. It gave to the legislature the right to regulate the rules of its own proceedings, freedom from arrest, and from question elsewhere, and all and absolute powers of legislation, excepting and reserving none; and again confirmed all laws in existence in the territory up to that time, of which that regulating slaves, as formerly, was still one. The 14th and 15th sections of the act of 1812, contained all the provisions, that now formed the propositions to the State, in the law under consideration; they were all the people had notice of, or had the right to expect Congress would require, at the time of their admission, and all, he believed, Congress could reasonably ask or constitutionally impose.

Mr. S. would now endeavor to point out some of the absurdities and inconsistencies growing out of this sweeping doctrine of gentlemen. The lovers of this country ought to remember that the General Government were gradually assuming authority, and increasing the latitude of construction. Did members understand what Missouri required of Congress? She did not ask a magna charta, or to have a bill of rights dealt out to her, for she had both in the Constitution of the land and in the treaty of cession—she only asked of Congress the mere means of organization. Missouri might do, by her local legislature, what she desired Congress now to do; she might authorize, by virtue of inherent right, the election of members to a convention; and that convention, when met, might form a constitution—she might do all this, and produce the patriotic State of Tennessee and others, as an example.

The only difficulty that could exist in this course, would be that of boundaries; on the one hand, all the people intended to be included within the State might not be represented in convention; on the other, the convention might, in part, be composed of members, some of whom might not ultimately fall within the State boundaries. It was not by virtue of any grant from Congress that the people of Missouri derived their right to form a constitution; if it was, then it would be competent for gentlemen to argue that Congress could impose conditions in making the grant. The leading spirit of all American institutions, nay, the essence of American liberty, was, that the people had the inherent right to make, mend, alter, change, and modify, their own form of government. Missouri, then, only asked the assistance of Congress in calling a convention, and not to dictate what that convention should do when assembled. But, in affording this assistance, which was mere matter of form, Congress were undertaking to attach to it matter of substance, and to regulate the State of Missouri, and that, too, permanently and forever, on one of the most important points of internal policy.

It might be important on this question to clearly understand what was a constitution. Mr. S. would define it to be, a fundamental law, establishing a form of government, defining its parts, its powers, its relations, and its duties, being paramount to, and even controlling, the Legislature. The power that bound a legislature must be sovereign; the authority that made a constitution was that sovereign power, and ought to be above all human control. But, if Congress had the authority both to bind the Legislature of Missouri and to control their convention, then it followed that Congress were the sovereigns of the people of Missouri, and they were not left the poor privilege of choosing masters. The essential attributes of sovereignty, of saying who shall be the rulers, and what quantity of power they should have, and how distributed, was taken away from the people. Time and experience, by which all governments improved, would be of no use to that people, in regard to one part of their constitution. The independence of the State, so far as it could be effected by the operation of the restriction, was gone, and all modification of their government, so far as it depended on their constitution, was to be inhibited to them. Among the constellation of States, seeming to act in concert under one common head, claiming the advantages and privileges of one common constitution, Missouri would present an anomalous case of a people in America not governed by their own consent and free will, but by that of another; yet, it was pretended that this was self-government; it was, however, a limited, degraded, conditional, dependent independence, unknown to the principles and genius of our institutions. The very act of forming a constitution was a sovereign and independent exercise of power, resting alone, for the authority to do so, on the free will of those concerned, and on the law of man, which was paramount to all law and all constitutions, and, were we to go back one step more, it would be found that the election of members of a convention was one of the very first independent and sovereign acts that a people could do; for, was not the election of members of a convention a sovereign act, the sovereignty of the people would not be represented, which was essential in fixing first principles and establishing a form of government. But, how did the case stand here? It was true that Mr. S. was now heard, and was pleading the cause of the people of Missouri—yes, poorly pleading it; but was Missouri represented here? Had he a vote to give on this or any other question, and was he ever to give his assent, it would not bind the most obscure individual in the land; and he was still further deprived of the privilege of entering his dissent to this measure on the Journals of the House. The restriction under debate was to form an irrevocable feature in the constitution of the State of Missouri, and Missouri was not only unrepresented in Congress, but she was to be deprived of the privilege of being represented even in convention on this point—that was, she should not exercise her free will on this as on other questions to be taken into consideration in the formation of her constitution, but was absolutely and unconditionally to submit to the restriction. This being the true state of the case, it resulted in this absurdity, that part of the constitution of the State of Missouri was to be left to the people, subject to such alterations and modifications as time and experience should render necessary; but the other portions of the constitution Congress were parties to, being matter of compact, and, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, was irrevocable and unalterable. The corollary, of the most inconsistent character, that resulted from the restriction, was, that a portion of the constitution of the State of Missouri would derive its existence from Congress, while another portion of the same constitution gave being to a part of Congress itself; where the conclusion was so repugnant to the dictates of common sense, we were compelled to acknowledge that the premises were somewhere wrong.

Mr. S. had said, that an act of Congress to authorize the people of Missouri to elect members, and to meet in convention, was mere ceremony, and might have been done by the Territorial Legislature. In performing this act of ceremony, what were Congress about to do? They were about to interlope a condition, the effect of which, if Missouri refused to accede, was, the authorized convention of the people of Missouri was not an authorized convention; and the constitution itself, which they had formed in pursuance of law, and by virtue of inherent rights, was not a convention, and every conclusion drawn from the necessary independence essential to the act amounted to nothing.

Congress were about to prejudice the people of Missouri. How did gentlemen know what provisions they intended to make in their constitution? How did gentlemen know whether the constitution of Missouri would be republican or otherwise? With the aid of all their optics and political sagacity, they were not able to pronounce that the people of Missouri would not tender a constitution in every way comporting with the letter and spirit of the Federal Constitution, and perhaps complying with the wishes of gentlemen. This was not the time to talk of conditions: impartial judges always waited till the whole case was laid open, before they made up their opinions. Congress, then, ought to suspend their operations until they had seen and examined the constitution of Missouri: it was then, and not till then, that Congress could be able to determine whether its principles were republican, and its provisions just. Mr. S. was disposed to be charitable, but he really could not believe that gentlemen were serious when they contended that Congress, as the guardians or masters of the Territory of Missouri, had the right to dictate what should be the attributes of sovereignty of the State of Missouri, hereafter to be formed. He protested against the principle that the representatives of States and the people could rightfully impose shackles or restrictions on the States or on the people. This would be reversing one of the plainest maxims, and placing the creature above the creator; for Congress—nay, the Federal Constitution itself—was but the creature of the people and of the States. Suppose the people of Missouri were to meet in convention, under this law of Congress, and to make a constitution comporting with all its provisions, save only the restriction, and that they were to reject—what would be the consequences. Had gentlemen weighed them, as it was their duty to do? Could Congress do any thing more than refuse her admission? Would Missouri progress, as a State government, out of the pale of the Constitution and your laws; or would she resolve back to a Territory?—A case that might lead to awful consequences, and quite probable to occur, might with great propriety be here stated for the consideration of the members. Missouri having formed her constitution, proceeds to organize her government, elects her Governor, establishes her judiciary, appoints her judges, and proceeds as a State. Congress, in consequence of her not complying with the restriction, affects to consider her as a Territory, and appoints her a Governor, commissions her judges and other officers, and they repair to their posts to undertake their duties. The people of Missouri say, you are not our officers; we will not be ruled by, nor will we submit to, your adjudication on our rights. What were gentlemen prepared to do? Would they shamefully retreat, and permit Missouri to be triumphant, or would they rally an army, and force submission at the point of the bayonet? What! shed the blood of the people of Missouri—your friends, your brothers—because they contend for the right of self-government—for being Americans! That portion of the States that think Congress have not the power to impose restrictions on the people of Missouri will not join in the crusade, nor will they suffer Missouri to be subdued; because, if she falls in contending against the principles of the restriction, their turn will next come. The bayonets of Southern and Western men would not reach Southern and Western hearts. If it had been foretold by any one, that in the short period of thirty-three years after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, that in America the spectacle would have been exhibited of a portion of the people contending for the right of self-government, and the right was to them denied, he would not only have been placed among the false prophets of the day, but would have been called a madman, if not a fool. And yet such was the melancholy fact, and that, too, gravely contended for on the floor of the American Congress! But this was not the only danger, if the doctrine of the restrictionist was carried into practice. There were others, that, if not so immediately obvious, were equally certain; one was, that, under this latitude of construction, Congress might go so far as to make the new States depend on Congress for all their powers and all their privileges. New States thus admitted might in the end enlist on the side of the General Government, and swallow up the old States—producing consolidation. They would naturally feel degraded, and entertain at least a disposition to abridge the superior privileges of other States, and reduce them to a level with themselves, while the other side would present a view of the great embarrassments that would arise in defining the proper line of jurisdiction among a confederation of States, not possessing the same powers and privileges. Jealousies and distrusts must follow such a state of things, that would have a tendency to disunion; nor was it reasonable to suppose that any State would long support the General Government, if that Government interfered with its domestic concerns.

It has been rightly said that this part of the Constitution was matter of compromise. The framers of that instrument had taken special care not to interfere on those subjects where the feelings and interests of the several States were so much at variance. Gentlemen, however, more wise than their ancestors, wished to do that, by an act of general legislation, which the Constitution had thought most prudent to leave to the States respectively. If Missouri was not to have the right of domestic slavery, from whence did the other States in the Union derive the right? They enjoyed it before the Confederation; they enjoyed it under the Confederation; and stipulated for its duration and preservation under the Constitution—that Constitution which provided for, not only the States that were then parties thereto, but for all other new States that Congress might thereafter admit to a participation in the compact.

Mr. S. could see no essential difference in principle between dictating the whole or any part of a constitution to a new State, and the alteration or total abolition of the constitution of an old State; that feature, or rather that silence in the constitutions of some of the States, which permitted the citizens to hold slaves, seemed particularly to fall under the ban of gentlemen, as anti-republican. If such was the fact, and the power contended for, in relation to Missouri, was possessed, why not, at one dash, blot it out from all those constitutions? Why not, in the rage for universal emancipation, liberate all the cuffs of the nation; bring them to the hustings; let them vote; make them alone, or in part, eligible to all the offices in the Government; place them under the canopy where the chairman was then sitting; fix them in the judgment seats; promote intermarriages; and make us one people? If Congress had the right to abolish slavery, they must have concurrent right to abolish the right of representation attached to them. Why did not gentlemen go the whole? Why fritter down, by piecemeal, the rights of the slaveholding States? But look at the other side of this mammoth power. He desired to bring the question home to gentlemen. A member from Ohio (Mr. BRUSH) had contended that, under the 8th section of the Constitution that gave Congress the power "to provide for the common defence and general welfare," they could impose the restriction on Missouri, because he had assumed it for granted, that, to limit the negroes to certain latitudes, and to confine them within certain limits, would be promoting the common defence and general welfare. Now, what would contribute to the common defence and general welfare was mere matter of opinion, and it was not always that the means used produced the end; a mistake in the one was sure to defeat the other, and it appeared to Mr. S. much more reasonable to suppose that the common defence was weakened, and the general welfare much more endangered, by confining the slaves within certain districts, condensing their population, and enabling them to act in concert, than to spread them over a vast extent of territory, distributing them in small proportions among the whites, and thus prevent the probability of insurrection, from a want of capacity to concentrate their forces. If, then, an occasional majority of Congress had the right, under this or any other clause of the Constitution, to say that, in their opinion, it promoted the common defence and general welfare that slavery should not exist in certain States of the Union; a counter majority, at any other time, under the same clause of the Constitution, would have the power to declare that it comported with their views of common defence and general welfare that it should exist in all the States, and that the non-slaveholding States should admit slaves within their borders, under pain of suspension or expulsion from the Union. How would gentlemen then stand affected? Would they not then declare against this mighty power, exercised upon mere speculation, whether this or that measure promoted the common defence and general welfare of the nation? In point of fact there was but little, if any, difference between taking away, or forcing upon, any person or people that which they did or did not want; each was equally a violation of their rights.

Governments were instituted as much for the protection of the property as the person of the governed. So sacred was this principle that, in no instance, by the Constitution of the land, could private property be taken, even for public use, without compensation. But what compensation was offered to Missouri for this privation of her rights? What remuneration was offered to the slaveholding States, who had an equal interest in Missouri with the non-slaveholding States, for this deprivation of their right to emigrate to that country with their slaves? Did not the restriction take from this portion of the community a part of their interest in that Territory, and diminish the value of the lands they had already purchased for themselves and their children? In fact, it amounted to a fraud on the purchasers; the lands had been sold while certain regulations existed, that induced them to purchase, and to pay a higher price for the soil; but, so soon as Congress reap the advantages of these false-pretences, they then, for the first time, foreclose the right of the citizens to take with them their hands to operate on the soil which they purchased, alone with that view. Between individuals in a court of justice, (if there was any justice left in the land,) money, paid under such circumstances, could be recovered back, and the enforcements of the out-standing payments be enjoined. By the Constitution of the Union, Congress could pass no "ex post facto law, or bill of attainder, or any law working the corruption of blood, or forfeiture of property." The restriction in question was ex post facto, as regarded the Missourian, because it divested him of a vested right in the liberation of his slaves; it was ex post facto as related to the vested right that the purchaser of land acquired at the time of purchase, to take with him to the country any description of property that would facilitate the improvement and cultivation of his land. Such was the inducement and reasonable expectation at the time of purchase. Let the restriction become a law, and the emigrant would stand attainted and convicted of a crime that operated a forfeiture of his property, if he removed to the State of Missouri, and took his slaves with him; and that amendment to the 5th article of the Constitution which declared that no person should be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due course of law, became inoperative, and the citizen was divested of his property without Constitution, or law, or judge, or jury. Surely gentlemen were wrong when they sought refuge for the power to impose this restriction under that portion of the Constitution that authorized Congress to "regulate the intercourse between the several States, and between the United States and foreign Governments." Missouri was not yet any portion of a foreign Government; and the right to make regulations between the several States, was essentially different from making a restriction or regulation in respect to one particular State. When Congress acted between the several States, they had an eye to something like reciprocity; but here there was none—all the advantages and privileges were taken from Missouri, and none given in exchange.

By the principles of the Revolution Missouri could not be taxed without a representation and her own consent, yet she had been taxed during the late war, and had most cheerfully furnished her quota of men and of money, without murmuring or exhibiting one symptom of discontent. So much for a people's surrendering the smallest portion of their rights. Gentlemen, presuming on their patriotism and love of country, were now, in continuation, about to tax them out of their rights and privileges, and leave them without the means of redress.

Mr. S. would ask gentlemen whether the people of Missouri were to be considered free and independent before the formation of their constitution and admission into the Union? or, whether they became free and independent only after their admission as a State? If they became free and independent alone by the act of admission, then it would follow that they were not competent to form a constitution, because they did not possess the free will and sovereignty that was essential to such an act; and as the General Government was confederated, and formed by compact, Missouri could not be considered capable of entering into the compactive Union because she was not a free agent. But if, on the other hand, Missouri was to be considered as free and independent before she formed a constitution and was admitted into the Union, how was she to lose that independence after her constitution was formed? The case had already been supposed, that Missouri, having formed her constitution, proceeded to her operations as a State; he would now put it to gentlemen in another shape, and inquire if they did not intend to use force, to what other description of process they would resort to effect a repeal of the charter of Missouri? A quo warranto had been named. What! declare Missouri out of the pale of the Constitution, not amenable to your laws, not a member of the federal family, and consequently, not within the jurisdiction of your courts; and yet to issue, from one of those very courts, a quo warranto, to inquire by what authority the people exercised the right of self-government? Mr. S. said that if it was reserved for him to make a return to that writ he would endorse upon it the Declaration of Independence, and reply that the right was from God. Gentlemen would find, that, if such an unhappy state of things was produced by the restriction, it would be necessary to issue some other description of process to deprive that people of their right of self-government.

It certainly did not require any argument to prove that Congress could not incorporate a people and make them a State without their consent, and if they could not, it followed that the converse of the proposition was true, that it was their own free will and consent that made them a State, and not the act of Congress. Members, however, had taken the other ground, and had argued as though the law in debate was to constitute the State of Missouri; but the manner of its application was indeed very singular—it was thus: That if the constitution of Missouri, made in pursuance of this law, turned out to suit Congress, then the State and the people were to be considered as ex post facto independent, but if that constitution, on presentation, was not palatable, then, this leger-demain policy did not attach to the condition of Missouri, and she was to be considered as not having acted at all. The same laws and principles of eternal justice, that ought to regulate individuals in their private transactions, ought also to be regarded by States and nations; one of these was, that a bond or an indenture, entered into under duress, was not binding on the party. By a parity of reasoning, was Missouri to form a constitution under the ban of the nation, would it be binding on her after admission?

If the ground taken by gentlemen, practically speaking, be correct, that all negroes and their increase are naturally free, why dragoon Missouri into a Constitutional acknowledgment of the fact? Why make them declare what the law of nature had already declared? If, on the other hand, the attitude assumed be indefeasible, why enact a restriction that the State could turn round and repeal? Why produce such an unpleasant collision between the Federal and State authorities? It was, indeed, matter of regret to see gentlemen persevere in spending their time and the people's money in legislating to no effect, as though they were deputed here to rivet, either by direct or indirect means, the shackles on a portion of their fellow-citizens. Missouri did not intend, by any act of hers, to furnish the argument, that she had consented to remain in, or to return to vassalage. And was she to meet and form a constitution under such circumstances, and then, at any subsequent period, to attempt to alter the restriction, or shake off this odious badge of degradation and distrust, the advocates of the measure would then say, that, whether they had the right to impose the restriction or not, Missouri had consented to it; that the people had voluntarily entered into terms; and that they and all posterity were bound on the subject. This would be an unwarrantable, if not an unworthy exercise of power and cunning, on the one hand, against a supposed weakness and simplicity on the other. This, in fact, would only be a supposition; for a people contending for their rights were always strong.

It was his duty to apprise gentlemen of the true state of the case. He owed it to the people he represented, to speak their sentiments and their determinations, of which he was well advised; and he owed it to the Representatives of the nation to tell them the truth, however rash it might be deemed, because the people they represented might one day bleed in contending for and against this restriction. But the truth was, that, although the people of Missouri were accustomed to look to Congress for many laws, and as the dispensers of all good, they had not lost the dignity of their natures any more than the citizens of States, who were accustomed to look to their own States for supreme authority. The independence of that people could only be taken from them by conquest or consent—he did not deny the power of the General Government to conquer or compel submission, but consent to this restriction they never would. They would not acknowledge that independence was not their birthright with others. Had the Territory of Missouri sufficient physical strength to assert her rights, no attempt would then be made to impose this or any other restriction; her approach to good fellowship and the Union would be hailed from afar; she would be greeted with smiles, and not laughed to scorn.

The authority now contended for would give the equal right to distribute and regulate all the powers of the internal government of Missouri. Under this alarming latitude of construction, Congress might give to the rulers of the State all the powers, and produce an aristocracy, or they might reserve to the people all authority, and yield an arrogant mobocracy; indeed, what might they not do in the moments of mistaken philanthropy and misguided zeal for liberty and equality? Gentlemen might not only prohibit the further introduction of slaves into Missouri; they might not only emancipate all those that were now there, but they might violate the most sacred principles of the Constitution, and establish a standard religion; for it was but one step from the violation of the rights of property to the violation of the rights of conscience.

Mr. S. said, that this was not a question “whether slavery should exist,” but merely where should the slaves, now in America, be permitted to reside? The mistake of this proposition seemed to have measurably produced all this contention and strife. Was this an original question, whether we should subject a portion of our fellow beings to a state of servitude and degradation, he believed that the people of Missouri, from their innate love of liberty, equality, and independence, would be among the first to declare against the principle. But the absolute condition of that description of persons did exist, and actually had existed long before even the first settlements were formed in Missouri; and if there were any advantages to be derived from holding that description of property, the people of Missouri, as citizens of the United States, had the right, in common with others. Congress, in deciding that they should not be introduced, as one of the species of property under our Constitution and laws, were doing that section of country a wrong, because it placed them, in powers and privileges, below other States in the Union; and when a wrong was meditated on any people they alone were the judges; such had been the current doctrine, and so considered by the United States themselves, when they determined on that course with regard to Great Britain, which led to American independence. If gentlemen were not predetermined to fix this restriction on Missouri, and would take the trouble to mount up to first principles, they would find that it was not a mere question of power, growing out of the construction of the Constitution, but that there was another law, paramount to all written rules and regulations, that operated on and controlled the question—it was the law of man; it was his eternal and indefeasible right to self-government. It was an idle calculation to believe that the State of Missouri would lose sight of this law of man in adjusting their constitution or contending for their rights. It was true that the people of Missouri had been a long time in pupillage and wardship, but they had never been in bondage. Although derived from Spain, the citizens were not the poor remnant of Spanish despotism—the great portion of them had been in a land of liberty; they are your relations, your friends, your brothers; each State in the Union had some interest there; and they were freemen, who knew how to appreciate, maintain, and defend their rights. A maxim might with great propriety be here applied; it was, that whenever illegal or improper objects were to be attained, that they drove the supporters of them to improper and illegal means to effect the object. The Parliament of Great Britain, although deemed omnipotent, never had, in reference to the colonies, attempted any thing that would bear a comparison with this restriction, though the powers of Congress were express, limited, and defined. The force of precedent had been illustrated in the course of this debate. Let this restriction prevail, and then States beware! for it was thus that a tyrant, about to subjugate the liberties of a people, selected an obscure individual, whose fate would excite no alarm, and, in his destruction, fixed an example, to which, in turn, the most lordly were taught to bow. And thus Congress selected a distant and feeble Territory, whose murmurs could be but indistinctly heard, just o'er the verge of Heaven; and in the sacrifice of its rights, and prostration of its authority, established a precedent that saps the foundation of State authority, and produces consolidation, or, in the end, disunion.

Mr. S. remarked that he had much more to say, but, from indisposition and exhaustion, was unable to proceed; the Committee were also fatigued; the question of expedience and other topics he had left entirely untouched; but, from the labored and able investigation the subject had received, he was willing to trust the rights, the happiness, the fate of Missouri, with the House. Her present prosperity and future greatness depended on the decision; if gentlemen could take the power, he entreated them not to exercise it; the affections of the people of Missouri had been put to many severe trials in the course of eighteen years, but they could not endure forever; and he appealed to gentlemen's unquestionable knowledge of right, and native love of justice, not to add this restriction to the list of grievances of that people.

Mr. MEIGS, of New York, spoke for some time against restriction.

Mr. ADAMS, of Massachusetts, made a few remarks in favor of the restriction.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, said he should not have ventured to trespass further on the time of the Committee if his objections to the proposed amendment, particularly as to its expediency, had been anticipated by those who had gone before him in the debate. There is, indeed, said he, Mr. Chairman, something peculiar in every man's views of the subject, who exercises his own powers of reflection, and it is only by looking at it under these different phases that we can form a just estimate of its bearings and dimensions. I am the more desirous of speaking on the policy of the proposed restriction, because a distinguished member from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) has said that Virginia had no interest in this question. Sir, I think I can show, to every unprejudiced mind, that it threatens, not only the peace and welfare of Virginia, in common with all the slaveholding States, but their very political existence.

Before I consider the constitutionality of this restriction, I beg leave to say a word on the subject of precedents. The member from Pennsylvania who spoke yesterday, (Mr. BALDWIN,) has, perhaps, rendered it unnecessary that I should address you on this topic. He has shown, by arguments which it would be difficult to answer, that the precedents on which the supporters of the amendment so much rely, either have no application, or, if closely examined, disprove the existence of the power now claimed for the Congress of the United States. But, sir, suppose these precedents to be of a different character, what is their authority?

The effect of precedent, in a Constitutional question, seems to be derived from the presumption that those who have made the decision have heard the arguments for and against the power sought to be exercised, and have, after due deliberation, decided. But, when we know that this presumption is not the fact, and that the power in question has hitherto been exercised without controversy or examination, I think that precedents of this sort are entitled to little or no weight, and that those who deny the existence of the power have a right to ask those who assert it to point out that particular part of the Constitution from which it is derived. The advocates of the amendment have virtually admitted the reasonableness of this claim, as, while they have insisted on the force of precedents, they have directly inferred the power they contend for by arguments drawn from the Constitution itself.

In the examination of this doctrine, I shall confine myself to that clause of the Constitution which speaks of the admission of new States; for, although other parts of that instrument have also been referred to, in support of the restriction, yet, every gentleman on that side of the question has laid the chief stress of his argument on this clause, and some have relied on it altogether. They contend that the right in Congress to admit new States into the Union implies the right to refuse admission. This, I agree, is a fair implication. But they further insist, that the right to admit or reject implies the right to impose terms on admission, and they support their position by the legal maxim, cujus est dare ejus est disponere—he who can give may regulate his gift; may say how he gives. Sir, this is not true, even in municipal law. If there be a grant in fee simple, on condition that the grantee shall not alien, the condition is void for repugnancy, and the grant is absolute; so, also, of a condition in violation of law or against its policy.

But the rule is still less true in Constitutional jurisprudence. It may sometimes be expedient to give the power of rejection, and to refuse that of admitting on condition. The one may be deemed safe and salutary; the other, inexpedient and dangerous. Examples of this sort are frequent in our Constitution. Thus, the President may approve or reject a law, but he cannot propose amendments. It is true, he has but a qualified veto; but, in those cases in which a law has passed by a majority of both Houses, but with less than a majority of two-thirds, the argument is the same as if his negative were absolute. I appeal to every member of the Committee, whether, if the President possessed the power of making amendments, it would not be a greater power than that of absolute rejection? The one has been exercised but two or three times since the formation of the Government; the other would be a matter of daily recurrence. Thus, too, in the constitution of Virginia, the Senate has the unconditional power of rejecting money bills, but not the power of amending them. And, in like manner, it would be a less power to refuse the admission of a new State absolutely, than, by taking advantage of its anxiety to come into the Union, to mould its constitution, in a great degree, according to the pleasure of Congress. The power of annexing conditions, then, being a different, and not, necessarily, an inferior power, the one is not included with the other.

But, Mr. Chairman, if the power of admitting new States into the Union does not give Congress the right of imposing conditions at discretion, still less does it give the right of imposing conditions repugnant to the great principles of the Constitution. We cannot, without the grossest absurdity, infer from that charter a power to effect its own destruction. To do this, would be to make the implied power greater than the express; the creature greater than the creator. But the power of imposing the purposed restriction on the State of Missouri is thus inconsistent with the Constitution.

In the first place, it would alter the proportion of power between the General Government and the individual States. The essence of our complex Government consists as much in this proportion as in any thing else. If Congress possessed more municipal powers, ours would be more a consolidated Government; if a less portion, it would more resemble the old Confederacy. This proportion of power is as much disturbed by lessening the power of the States as by increasing that of the United States. The effect is the same whether you take out of one scale or put into the other: in both cases the balance established by the Constitution is destroyed.

Sir, if you have the right of imposing one condition, not expressly prohibited, you have the right of imposing another. Suppose, then, that Congress should reserve to itself the right of defining and punishing crimes in the new State, or the regulation of its landed property, or a negative on all its laws, would not the possession of these extensive municipal powers completely change the character of this Government? I would further observe, that this power must appear to be the more dangerous, when we recollect how large a part of our territory west of the Mississippi is yet to be laid off into new States, and that every new State which enters into the Union, with restrictions on its sovereignty, as was well argued by a gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Lowndes,) becomes at once an example and an advocate for further restrictions on others. In this way, that Constitution, whose component parts were so cautiously adjusted and so skilfully balanced, would be effectually destroyed.

It is no answer to this argument to say that such an exertion of power as I have supposed is highly improbable. In expounding a Constitution, it is perfectly fair to test the correctness of a principle by extreme cases. Besides, the framers of the Federal Constitution have endeavored to guard, not only against probable dangers, but also against remote possibilities. They have prohibited both the United States and the several States from passing any bill of attainder, than which, according to the settled principles of criminal law at the present day, nothing was more improbable. Thus, too, there is a similar prohibition against the grant of any title of nobility. Surely, when we consider that this institution originated in the days of feudal barbarism, and recollect how much the genius of our people, their habits and laws, all favor an equality of rights, it must be admitted that nothing but a determination to guard against the most distant and improbable dangers could have dictated such a provision.

Mr. Chairman, the proposed restriction is also inconsistent with the Federal Constitution, because it is irrepealable. The framers of our form of Government knew that, in the vicissitudes which time is ever bringing about in human affairs, provisions should be made for correspondent changes, not only in our laws, but in the Constitution itself. Accordingly, there is no rule of action, whether it be prescribed for individuals, for the States, or the Federal Government, which may not be legally changed. Sir, this restriction would either be an act of ordinary legislation, or a fundamental law. If it be a mere legislative enactment, it may be abrogated by our successors: the clause which declares it irrepealable may be itself repealed. If it be a fundamental law, then we cannot pass it. In either case, by attempting to impose an irrepealable condition on the people of Missouri, we attempt to exercise a power which the Constitution has denied us.

In support of these extraordinary doctrines, the advocates of the amendment have found it necessary to draw a distinction between the rights of the thirteen original States and those subsequently admitted. But the Constitution recognises no such principle; and it would be not more an invidious discrimination than it is repugnant to the common sense of mankind. Allow me, Mr. Chairman, by way of illustration, to put a case familiar to all. Let us suppose a voluntary association of individuals, for purposes of business or amusement, who form certain rules for the government of their society, or club; and that one of these provides for the admission of new members. When a new member is admitted, we know that he is placed, in all respects, upon the same footing as the former members, unless, indeed, some previous rule warranted a distinction, or a new rule is made for that purpose. Now, the Constitution is precisely such a set of rules for the association or confederacy of States. It is not pretended that it makes any distinction between its new and its old members; and a new rule cannot be made by you, but solely by the people. I will here take occasion to observe, Mr. Chairman, that, in expounding the Constitution, I think we should be cautious of introducing too much subtlety and refinement in our reasoning; both because that instrument is made in the name of the people, and because the people are, in some form or other, its final expounders. Simple, direct, and manly reasoning, conforming as much as possible to the common sense of mankind, gives us at once the just rule of construction, and the only one which, in great cases, is likely to be carried into effect.

Gentlemen on the other side, however, by way of parrying the force of these objections, have urged that, though the proposed restriction may not be void as a condition imposed, it may be valid as a compact agreed to. But if, as has been shown, new restrictions on the power of States would alter the essential character of the Government, then you can no more consent with another to impose these restrictions, than you can impose them by your sole legislative will. You cannot aid in doing that indirectly, which you are forbidden to do directly. With the limited power delegated to you by the charter which created you, you never can rightfully assume the power of destroying that charter, or of assenting to its destruction. Besides, there must be a third party to such a contract, and the most material party, too, (I mean the people,) before it can be binding.

But, again, sir, in every contract, both parties must be bound, or neither; and the people composing the proposed State of Missouri cannot bind future generations by a compact of this character. An honorable member from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) by way of obviating this difficulty, has mainly contended, that a State may, by the compact, part with portions of its sovereignty, and he cited several instances of such an exercise of power. But that gentleman did not, with his usual perspicacity, advert to the distinction between two very different exertions of sovereign power; acts which are complete of themselves, and rules of action. The one looks to the present and the past, the other to the future. Thus, a sovereign State may, by expending money, alienating territory, declaring war, and the like, do that which it can neither recall nor control; but, by such acts the State may be said to exercise its sovereignty, rather than to part with it; and it will be found that the examples given by the honorable member were of this character. But, as to the rules of action, whether they be prescribed to the legislature for the future conduct of the citizen, or by the people for themselves, I had supposed that, in this country at least, these might always rightfully be abrogated or changed. Sir, if there be any political principle deemed fundamental among us; if there be one on which the American Revolution rests for its justification, or the right of self-government for its security, it is, that no generation can make laws or constitutions that are binding on their posterity. And this amendment, turn it as you will, is an attempt to make a constitution by law, and to make that law unchangeable.

The same gentleman, as well as his colleague who preceded him, (Mr. HEMPHILL,) contended that the proposed restriction would not impair the rights of Missouri; for, said they, slavery is confessedly an evil and an injustice, and a State cannot claim a right to do wrong. Here, too, the gentlemen have not exercised their wonted powers of discrimination. They confound political with moral restraints; power with right; the possession of the power with the virtuous exercise of it. Thus, to illustrate the difference, every man has the power of regulating the concerns of his own family as he pleases, if he violate not the laws of the land. He may be very capricious and tyrannical, and, no doubt, often is so; but, while he thus violates moral right, he has the power, not merely physical, but political, of thus acting. This is what is called an abuse of power; and, in that sense, a man may properly be said to have a right, that is, the legal power, to do wrong.

I will not detain the Committee by objections to the amendment derived from the Louisiana Treaty, especially as the arguments which had occurred to me on this topic have already been urged by other gentlemen. I will, therefore, proceed to examine the policy of the proposed restriction.

Mr. Chairman, the view I have taken of the consequences of this restriction compels me to regard this as the most important branch of the question before us. I have seen, by ingenious and refined constructions of the Constitution, measures pursued by each of the great parties which have ruled the destinies of this nation, that were supposed, by a large majority of the community, to have violated the meaning of that charter. Such occasions have indeed always produced great party heat and animosity, and interrupted, in no small degree, the harmony of social intercourse. After a while, however, these feelings have passed away. The wounds they created were healed, and their causes forgotten. But, if you persist in this restriction, it is not for human foresight to estimate the sum of its future mischiefs. I beg leave to call the attention of the Committee to some of the most obvious.

It is, in the first place, Mr. Chairman, no small objection to the exercise of this power, that it is unpalatable to the people on whom it is to operate. In the other instances which have been produced, in which conditions have been attached to the admission of new States, these conditions have been entirely acceptable to the States admitted, and such as they would voluntarily have imposed on themselves. But the present is the first occasion in which this Government has attempted to impose unwelcome conditions on a new State. The people of Missouri can see no reason why they should be treated with this unwonted rigor. To tell them that this restriction is for their benefit, is to add mockery to unkindness.

Sir, they claim the privilege, which every free-man asserts, of being the best and the sole judge of what suits them. They say, that all your arguments, derived from morality, religion, or local policy, should be left to themselves, and that, while you affect to receive them as equals you are dictating to them as children; or that you yourselves manifest a distrust of these arguments by your wishing to enforce them with Constitutional provisions. Sir, they are just such men as yourselves; they were a part of yourselves, and they would be unworthy the name of American if they did not feel this condition as a degradation. On the policy of introducing slaves, I understand they are somewhat divided in Missouri, as elsewhere. Many of them, contemplating the moral and political effects of domestic slavery, are opposed to its further extension. Were I there, I should probably be one of this number. But, on the power of Congress to impose the restriction, I learn that there is but one sentiment. They consider it a common cause, which they are bound, upon every principle of self-respect, to oppose; and they already assimilate your conduct towards them to those oppressions of Great Britain towards her colonies which finally produced their independence.

Putting aside the feelings of the people of Missouri, is it not a solid objection to this restriction that your power to impose it is doubtful and contested? However thoroughly gentlemen on the other side may be persuaded that Congress possesses this power, they must know that a large portion of the United States are as thoroughly persuaded that it does not; that, on this question, there is entire unanimity in the slaveholding States; and that, with all the motives to an opposite unanimity in the other States, there is, among them, as well as among their Representatives in this House, considerable diversity of opinion. They must also recollect, that, though these circumstances do not produce conviction, they must produce some doubt, awaken some distrust in the infallibility of human reason in every ingenuous mind. And, Mr. Chairman, when we consider the influence of public opinion on the harmony and stability of this Union, it must always be a matter of regret that the Government should exercise powers that are doubtful, or even disputed. Until habit and custom have had their wonted effect in cementing the Union, its strength and permanency must rest on the affections, the undivided affections of the people, and nothing is more likely to weaken their attachment than a want of confidence in this House, the natural guardian of the people's rights, and their immediate Representatives.

But, Mr. Chairman, the immediate effects of this restriction, important as they are, shrink into insignificance when compared with its distant consequences. I ask the indulgence of the Committee, while I endeavor, as briefly as I can, to be intelligible, to bring them to their notice.

It will be admitted that our numbers will continue to increase, at their present rate, or near it, until they are checked by a diminution in the means of subsistence, and that the means of subsistence will be abundant and easy, so long as we have fertile lands to settle and cultivate. These principles of population, now so familiar to all, were first distinctly stated, so far as my information extends, by Sir James Steuart. They are also noticed by Dr. Franklin, and seem to have been an original suggestion of his own good sense and sagacity. But, their influence in producing human misery and vice, and in circumscribing the efficacy of governments, were never fully developed, before the appearance of Mr. Malthus's Essay on Population, which I cannot but consider as a work of great ability. I make these remarks, because the censure of my colleague (Mr. RANDOLPH) on this writer, the other day, was general, though probably it was intended to apply to the author's theory of the poor laws, and not to the principles of which I have spoken.

From these undeniable principles it follows, that, if the blacks be confined to the present slaveholding States, while the whites are left free to emigrate to the more tempting regions of the West, the ratio of blacks to whites must be continually increasing, until our population has reached the Pacific.

It has, however, been contended that the blacks thus confined to the slaveholding States will increase more slowly than if they were allowed to spread over the country west of the Mississippi, because population in that case will sooner begin to press on the means of subsistence; and, in answer to the inhumanity which this consideration implies, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) says, that as the check upon natural increase must inevitably take place, sooner or later, on both classes, it is better that it should operate first and strongest upon the blacks rather than the whites.

The argument would be sound, so far as policy is concerned, whatever may be thought of its consistency with some other principles maintained by the same side, if the restriction would have this partial operation. But, by reason of the emigration which is ever going on from those parts of the United States where population is most dense, to those where it is most rare, the natural multiplication is everywhere the same. Thus, in the States of Connecticut, of Maryland, or Virginia, though, by the census, their population seems to be nearly stationary, we have every reason to believe that the principle of increase operates in as full vigor as in the other States; and that the excess of their numbers is kept down by emigration, to which the state of our country and the habits of our citizens afford so many facilities. The check, then, of which the gentleman speaks, operates on both classes alike, and will operate upon neither until the whole of our territory is settled, and its most fertile lands are brought into cultivation.

The State of Virginia has already experienced, in a small degree, the effects of this partial emigration. It will be recollected that the member from Indiana (Mr. HENDRICKS) stated, that he represented as many who had migrated from the South as from the North; and the States of Ohio and Illinois have also received considerable accessions from the slaveholding States. Now, as these emigrants have not been permitted to carry slaves with them, their removal must have altered the ratio of the two classes in the States they have left; and hence it is, that, in Virginia, as one of the fruits of her cession of the territory northwest of the Ohio, the black population has been steadily gaining somewhat on the white. Hitherto, however, the migrations from the older slaveholding States have been principally to Kentucky, Tennessee, and the other Mississippi States, from one part of the slaveholding country to the other, where lands were at once cheaper and more fertile; but, as soon as these States are filled up, and population begins to press upon subsistence, the Missouri, and its thousand tributary streams, will draw off the surplus numbers of the slaveholding States, and this unequal drain will operate with undivided and still increasing force.

It has also been urged, against the probability of this growing disproportion between the blacks and the whites, that it must be the poor and laboring class, persons not owning slaves, who may chiefly be expected to emigrate from the slaveholding States; and that these States have not a sufficient number of that class to admit of emigration to the extent supposed. But, it must be remembered that the white population considerably exceeds the black, and that, as individual citizens often own many slaves, there must be a proportional number who own none. There must necessarily be, for every person who owns an hundred slaves, there are more than an hundred whites who are not slaveholders. There is, then, an ample number of the poorer class for the inducements to emigrate to act upon; and, if that were not the case, the same inducements would operate on the slaveholding class, and, by transferring the lands and slaves into fewer hands, assimilate every portion of the slaveholding district to the lower part of South Carolina and some other of the Atlantic States.

An honorable member from Massachusetts, (Mr. WHITMAN,) however, observed, that there could be no danger from the relative increase of slaves, for an hundred years to come, and that a century was as far as politicians could be expected to look or provide for. I will observe, by the way, that I was surprised to hear such an opinion from an American statesman. An hundred years, sir, is a long period for human life, but is a short one in the life of a nation. There are few of the sovereignties of Europe which cannot number many centuries of existence, and I should be sorry to think that our Government was not likely to ensure and prosper as long as any other. But, let us limit our views to the moderate term that has been mentioned. Supposing then the slaves in the United States to have augmented as fast, in the last ten years, as they did in the ten years preceding, they now amount to upwards of a million and a half. Suppose that they will continue to double every twenty-five years—their present rate of increase—then, in the lapse of a century, their numbers will amount to no less than twenty-four millions. Estimating the present slaveholding States to contain four hundred and twenty-four thousand square miles, according to Mellish's estimate, this number of slaves will give nearly sixty to a square mile; a density of population implying a general occupation of the land, but by no means a difficulty of procuring subsistence. In the same period the whole population of the United States, allowing it to double, in like manner, four times, will amount to one hundred and sixty millions, which, according to the same authority, will give, for the whole Union, nearly an average of sixty to the square mile. Now, as this population will be very unequally spread over the different parts of our territory, being more dense in the older settlements, and less so in the new, it is impossible to say, with accuracy, what will be the degree of density in the slaveholding States; but, whether it be greater or less, the ratio of blacks to whites would be most fearfully increased. If we assume it to be eighty persons to a square mile, (and I think we cannot reasonably believe it would be much greater, on the supposed average, throughout the Union,) the blacks would be to the whites nearly in the proportion of three to one.

With this great and still accelerating gain of the black population, who can answer for the consequences? The wildest political visionary does not think it practicable to amalgamate such discordant materials; we must be in that situation then in which we can neither safely set them free, nor hold them in subjection. If one of the two races must yield to the other, who can say which it will be, or how it will be effected? Sir, this is a subject of peculiar delicacy, and I will not press it further than to remark, that, if restriction could be enforced, the least pernicious result to which we could look forward, would be, that the whites, finding the African race constantly pressing on them, would finally abandon the country, and leave the blacks undisputed masters of the soil. But if, as would be too probable, the disease should have a violent termination, the struggle between the two races would end in a war of extermination.

It has also been said, that, be the political and moral evils, from the growing increase of blacks, what they may, the whites, in any disproportion which can be deemed probable, will always be sufficient to keep the blacks in subjection, and secure the tranquillity of the State. But, granting that the authority of the whites would always be sufficient for this purpose—though history warns us of the contrary—yet there is a cause beyond our control, which will, sooner or later, prevent our holding them in servitude.

As soon as our population has overspread the whole habitable parts of our territory, and brought our waste lands into cultivation, human labor will begin to decline in value. This is very high with us at present; it is lower in Europe, and lower still in China; everywhere gradually decreasing as population advances. In the same proportion that the price of labor diminishes, must the value of slaves decline, until at length the cost of bringing up a slave will be more than he is worth. When that period arrives, the community will not, and cannot, impose on itself the burden of supporting slaves; and, be the consequences what they may, they will be manumitted, and then all the difficulties to the union of the two races must be encountered. This effect of the gradual decline of labor in producing emancipation was also urged by the Speaker, (Mr. CLAY,) but we draw different inferences as to its remote effects. I cannot agree with him in the probability that the African, as well as the Indian race, will, under any course of policy we may pursue, be finally extirpated. It seems to me that they will continue to increase until their labor ceases to be valuable, that is, until our waste lands are brought into cultivation, and, when that period arrives, we have seen that their numbers will probably amount to twenty-four millions, and greatly exceed that of the whites inhabiting the same district.

But, Mr. Chairman, many look to colonization as the means of avoiding these threatening evils. Sir, I do not wish to disparage the exertions of the society established for the purpose of colonizing the people of color—its members deserve the thanks and good wishes of every friend of his country. But I have long since abandoned the hope of deriving any remedy for the evil of domestic slavery from this quarter. I, too, was once an advocate for colonization, but I now consider every project for ridding the country of its black population, as utterly hopeless and impracticable. Estimating their present numbers at 1,600,000, their annual increase is about fifty-one thousand. The Colonization Society, as the result, I believe, of one year's efforts, are about to send to Africa, from New York, one hundred and seventy-four blacks, which is little more than the increase of a single day. Taking the average value of the slaves to be three hundred dollars each, it would require upwards of fifteen million of dollars to purchase fifty-one thousand, and probably five millions more to transport them to Africa. And this annual expenditure of twenty millions is not to reduce the number, but merely to keep it stationary.

Thus, sir, we see that the effects of this fatal policy are as inevitable, as uncontrollable, as the laws of nature. But if, on the other hand, the slaves be allowed to spread themselves equally with the white population west of the Mississippi, then they must always continue, as they now are, inferior in number to the whites; and, when the period arrives, as it certainly must, when the self-interest of individuals will burst the bonds of the slave, emancipation will then consist with the tranquillity and safety of the State; and, in the meantime, partial emancipation is making rapid advances. Let me call the attention of the Committee to its progress, according to the facts which are correctly taken from Doctor Seybert's valuable publication, and which are not garbled like those in some late pamphlets, to further a favorite purpose. In the State of Delaware, in 1800, the free blacks were, to the slaves, in the proportion of four to three. In 1810 they had increased to the proportion of more than three to one. In Maryland, in the same ten years, the proportion of free blacks to slaves, had increased from one-fifth to one-third. In Virginia, from one-seventeenth to one-thirteenth. In North Carolina, from one-nineteenth to one-sixteenth. In South Carolina, from one forty-sixth to one-forty-third.

In Georgia, however, the proportion has diminished from one thirty-first to one fifty-eighth; because, as you know, Mr. Chairman, the Legislature of that State thought it necessary to prohibit the further progress of emancipation, and to expel a number of its free blacks. It is worthy of remark, that this progress increases by regular gradations as you advance north. It is owing to voluntary emancipation no less, perhaps, than to the migrations from Europe, that the ratio of slaves to the whole population of the United States has been continually decreasing. In 1790 they were more than one-sixth of the aggregate of our population. In 1810 they were reduced almost to one-seventh. They now are, without doubt, less than a seventh; and, before the lapse of a century, if things are left to their natural operation, they will probably be reduced to a tenth, or less. But, if you enforce this restriction, other States will follow the example of Georgia, and, in their own defence, put an entire stop to the further increase of free blacks among them. Surely, then, gentlemen on the other side will not render impracticable that melioration which they so much profess to cherish.

But, if our brethren of the North and East are indifferent to our interests, I trust they will not be regardless of their own. Sir, I think that all the Atlantic States are concerned in opposing this restriction. If the confinement of the black population to the east of the Mississippi, while the whites are free to emigrate to the West, must necessarily alter the proportion of their numbers, as I think I have shown, then, in which ever way the slavery of the blacks may terminate, the strength and influence of the Atlantic States will be greatly impaired. As our population advances westwardly, the line of local division will probably be, not as at present, between the North and the South, but between the Western and Atlantic States. On all questions concerning foreign commerce or navigation, the interests of the latter will, in time, be the same; and these interests cannot be protected against the preponderating influence of the West, without a voice and numbers that will secure respect. Besides, without waiting for the dangerous epoch I have mentioned, if the arguments be just, that a State will possess more wealth, and strength, and weight in the Legislature, when inhabited by freemen than by slaves, it seems strange that gentlemen from the North should seek to increase that political influence which, on the supposition of local parties, will be opposed to them, and to lessen that of their natural allies.

FEBRUARY, 1820.

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

Before I conclude, I will take a cursory notice of some further considerations which were urged in favor of this restriction.

The member from New York, who moved the amendment, (Mr. TAYLOR,) said that the further diffusion of slaves would lessen the revenue of the nation, inasmuch as the consumption of slaves is less than that of freemen. No argument could have been more unfortunate than this. It is well known to us all, that the slaveholding States are generally opposed to an increase of the impost, and the other States generally friendly to it; and this because we are the greatest consumers of imported goods, and they are the most extensively engaged in domestic manufactures. Ask, sir, the great importers of New York to whom they make the chief sales of foreign merchandise, and they will tell you, to the merchants of the Carolinas, of Georgia, and Virginia.

Another objection has been drawn from the increase of representation which Missouri would derive from its slave population; and a member from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HEMPHILL,) in urging this argument, observed that a citizen in the slaveholding States, who owned an hundred slaves, had as many votes as sixty freemen in the other States. This remark did not partake of the candor which in general characterized that gentleman's speech.

Sir, in the slaveholding States, one slaveholder, having the right of suffrage, has no more votes than another, and if we estimate the additional influence which each owner derives from the representation of two-fifths of the slaves, it will be found to be less than a vote and a half, instead of sixty to one. For this small difference of political power, they pay a full consideration, not only by bearing a greater share of direct taxes, but by contributing more largely to the revenue arising from impost. But these objections are, moreover, founded on the fallacy that the number of slaves will be increased by their further introduction into Missouri. But it is conceded that their multiplication is as great at present as the laws of nature permit; and we have seen that they will continue to increase, at their present rate, whether they be confined to the slaveholding States or not; it follows, therefore, that the question is not whether we shall have the same number on the east or the west side of the Mississippi.

But it has also been said, that the slaves, in a slaveholding State, increase faster than the freemen. Sir, the census gives evidence of no such fact, notwithstanding what more than one publication has stated to the contrary. If we take the whole slaveholding district together, (and this is the only fair way of making the comparison,) it will be found that the increase of the whites, from the year 1800 to 1810, was as one hundred to twenty-six, while that of the slaves, in the same time, was as one hundred to one hundred and twenty-nine. This difference of increase amounts only to about forty thousand in favor of the blacks; which is certainly not more than can be accounted for by the importation from the year 1800 to 1808, when Congress put a stop to that abominable traffic; and to the emigration to the northwest of the Ohio, of which I have spoken. Leaving out the States of South Carolina and Georgia, the white population has gained a little upon the slaves. The truth is, that if there be some causes more favorable to the natural increase of the blacks, there are others more favorable to that of the whites. There is, therefore, very little difference between them; and the increase of both is nearly at its maximum.

There is, however, an objection of more plausibility, to which I will advert. It is said that, by extending the market for slaves to Missouri, we shall encourage the African slave trade. Sir, I cannot be brought to believe that our Government is not able to carry into execution the laws it has made against this disgraceful traffic. But supposing that a small number of slaves should be smuggled into the country in spite of our utmost vigilance; they will then remain in Louisiana and Georgia, where their labor is most valuable, and not be transported into Missouri. The slaves which would be carried to that State would be principally original members of the families of emigrants; and it is extremely improbable that any would be carried there from the Gulf of Mexico. The trade is known to be in a contrary direction; nor do I remember ever to have seen in Virginia a slave who was born in Africa; except in a single instance, in a town in which I live. If we regard the known current of trade, it is just as reasonable to suppose that our settlements on the Missouri will give new encouragement to the smuggling of tea, for example, in Passamaquoddy Bay, as of negroes in Louisiana.

But the zeal and ingenuity of gentlemen have found a further motive for this restriction, in the peculiar liability of slaveholding States to insurrections, and in the greater probability of their involving the General Government in war. But, Mr. Chairman, a similar objection may be made to the further extension of our foreign commerce. All the maritime wars in which this Government has been involved, have grown out of foreign commerce. Now, what would the members from the new State of Maine say, if they were told, that, as that commerce to which they were addicted, was dangerous to the peace of the United States, they must agree to abandon it before they could be admitted into the Union? If they could insist that they already possessed this commerce, that the other adjoining States were allowed to prosecute it unmolested, and that no discrimination could justly be made between them and the other members of the same Confederacy, the representative of Missouri might allege the same arguments in his favor; and no reply could be made to him, which would not, with equal propriety, be made to the members from Maine. Such a discrimination being equally odious, unreasonable, and oppressive to both, I trust it will be attempted on neither.

Having now, Mr. Chairman, examined this great question, with all the fairness of which I am capable, I entreat the Committee to give these suggestions their serious consideration. If my views of the consequences of this policy be correct, as I religiously believe them to be, it must be seen that the slaveholding States are bound to resist the restriction at every hazard. I mean not this as a threat; but merely to remind them of the uncontrollable influence of the law of self-preservation; and to appeal to the interest which every member of this Committee must take in the safety of the Union, and the welfare of every part of it.

When Mr. T. had concluded—

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, rose and observed, that a large number of his constituents had expressed their opinion in opposition to the opinion which he was known to entertain on this subject, and it might be presumed that he desired to deliver his reasons for the vote which he should give. But, Mr. S. said, the public business was suffering by the protraction of the debate; the members are weary of it; every one's opinion was made up on it; and he was unwilling to consume the time of the Committee by any remarks on the question. He therefore forebore, and he hoped the question would be taken.

Mr. WALKER, of North Carolina, rose then to address the Committee on the question; but the question was called for so clamorously and so perseveringly that Mr. W. could proceed no farther than to move that the Committee rise.

The Committee refused to rise, by almost a unanimous vote.

Mr. BEECHER, of Ohio, then stated that it was his wish to be heard on the question; and, if not allowed an opportunity of speaking in Committee, he should do so in the House, unless prevented by force; and he moved that the Committee should then rise.

This motion was lost by a very large majority.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, said the course he was about to propose was unusual and perhaps without precedent—that was, to call the previous question in Committee of the Whole; but, as he conceived the motion would be sustained by the rules and orders of the House, and to put an end to any further debate on the amendment, he moved for the previous question thereon.

The Chair conceived that the motion was not in order.

Mr. RANDOLPH asked leave of the mover of this course, to suggest to him a less invidious mode of getting at his object. If the Committee should consent to rise, and the House would refuse it leave to sit again, the question would then be in the House; and that was the only way, Mr. R. said, that the Committee, worn down by what was called a discussion, could be relieved from it. He hoped, wherever possible, that the previous question should be dispensed with; but if some mode were not devised of getting clear of this debate, he believed he should become reconciled to it—though a man convinced against his will was of the same opinion still.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) observed, that the previous question would not effect the object of the gentleman who moved it; because its effect would be to put aside the question on the amendment altogether; and though that might be a very happy effect, yet it was not, he presumed, desired by the Committee, and he thought it fair to warn gentlemen of an effect that he supposed was not anticipated.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, though he had felt himself at entire liberty to make a motion, intended to stop the debate, inasmuch as he had not troubled the Committee with a speech on the subject; yet, as the effect would be what had been stated by the Speaker, he would withdraw his motion.

The question was then taken on Mr. TAYLOR's proposed restriction, and agreed to, by from 12 to 18 votes.

Mr. TAYLOR then moved that the Committee rise, as he presumed it was not prepared to go into the various details of the bill this evening, several of which were important, and would give rise to many questions.

This motion was opposed by Mr. SCOTT and Mr. STROTHER, and supported by Mr. SERGEANT. It, however, finally prevailed, and

The Committee obtained leave, ayes 90, to sit again; and, about five o'clock, the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, March 26.

Mr. ARCHER, from the Committee on Naval Expenditures, submitted to the House certain documents in relation to the expenditures of public moneys in the Naval Department, and to a retrenchment of expenditures in said department; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMYTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing an additional National Armory, made a report unfavorable to the establishment of an additional armory; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ROBERT MOORE, from the committee appointed on the petition of John Wells, made a report thereon; and, by leave of the House, reported a bill for the relief of the said John Wells; which bill was read twice, and committed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Bowie, Kurtz, and others," in which they ask the concurrence of this House. The bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill from the Senate, for the relief of the legal representatives of John O'Connor, deceased, was read the third time; when, some debate ensuing on its merits, the bill was, on motion of Mr. STORRS, committed to a Committee of the Whole.

THE MISSOURI BILL.

The order of the day being announced from the Chair, being the unfinished business of yesterday—

Mr. HILL renewed the motion which he made yesterday, that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the Missouri bill; but the motion was not sustained by a majority of the House.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the said bill.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, moved to amend the bill by inserting, in the 4th section, (immediately preceding the restrictive amendment adopted yesterday,) the following proviso:

"That, in all that tract of country ceded by France to the United States, under the name of Louisiana, which lies north of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes north latitude, excepting only such part thereof as is included within the limits of the State contemplated by this act, there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted: Provided, always, That any person escaping into the same, from whom labor or service is lawfully claimed in any State or Territory of the United States, such fugitive may be lawfully reclaimed, and conveyed to the person claiming his or her labor or service, as aforesaid."

Mr. STORRS supported his amendment in a speech of considerable length; embracing, incidentally, in the range of his remarks, an examination of the right of imposing the slavery restriction on Missouri.

Mr. RANDOLPH next rose, and spoke more than four hours against the amendment, and on the topics connected with it, the subject of restriction, &c. When he had concluded, (about half-past four o'clock,) an ineffectual motion was made for the Committee to rise.

Mr. BEECHER, of Ohio, then took the floor, and proceeded a short time in a speech on the subject, when he gave way for a motion for the Committee to rise, which prevailed, and about five o'clock the House adjourned.

MONDAY, February 28.

Mr. MEIGS presented a petition of Everiste Mauri, a native of Venice, in Italy, and a naturalized citizen of the United States, stating that it is his intention to attempt the establishment of a colony of Venetians in the United States, for the purpose of cultivating the vine, and raising the silk worm, and praying a grant of one hundred and sixty acres of land to each male emigrant of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, at the minimum price, with an extended credit, and under such other terms and conditions as Congress may think proper to prescribe.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. SERGEANT presented a schedule of fees of office, proper to be allowed and taxed in the courts of the United States in the district of Pennsylvania, approved and signed by Richard Peters, judge of the district court of that district; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the committee appointed for the purpose, reported a bill for the relief of the family of the late Oliver Hazard Perry, and for the education of his children at the public charge; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. SMYTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill respecting the military establishment of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. SMYTH reported a bill authorizing grants of bounty land, in certain cases; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. HARDIN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe, as stock, in the company incorporated by the Legislature of Kentucky, to cut a canal round the falls in the Ohio river, any number of shares not exceeding five hundred.

Mr. H. entered into some explanations in support of his motion, and to secure to it the favor of the House.

Mr. HENDRICKS, of Ohio, proposed an amendment to the resolution, having for its object to include a similar inquiry as to subscribing a like number of shares to the stock of the Jefferson Ohio Canal Company, and spoke a short time in favor of his motion; when, on motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the resolution was for the present laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. CRAWFORD, the Committee of Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the compensation of losses occasioned by the impressment and application of private property to the military service of the United States, during the late Seminole war.

SEMINOLE WAR, &c.

Mr. STORRS, from the committee appointed on the 17th of December last, to inquire and report whether any of the public moneys appropriated by Congress for the pay and subsistence of the regular Army of the United States, since the 4th of March, 1815, have been applied to the support of any army, or detachment of troops, raised without the consent of this House, or the authority of Congress, made a report thereon; which was read, and committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The report is as follows:

The committee appointed, on the 10th day of December last, to inquire and report to the House of Representatives whether any of the public moneys appropriated by Congress, for the pay and subsistence of the regular Army of the United States, since the 4th day of March, 1815, have been applied to the support of any army, or detachment of troops, raised without the consent of the House, or the authority of Congress, respectfully report: That, on the 11th day of January, 1818, Colonel David Brearly, of the 7th regiment of the United States infantry, who was about to proceed from Hartford, in the State of Georgia, to the Creek Agency, on public service, was, by an order from Major General Edmund P. Gaines, authorized to receive into the service of the United States not exceeding five hundred Indians of the Creek nation; and should they volunteer their services, to muster, inspect, and provision them, and direct their march to Fort Scott. In obedience to this order, Colonel Brearly, shortly after his arrival at the Agency, proceeded to fulfil the intentions of the commanding General. The necessary measures were taken for assembling the warriors of that tribe; and it being ascertained that nearly the whole effective force of the nation would consent to serve, arrangements were made for mustering them into service, and organizing them. These arrangements were, that the whole force was to be denominated a regiment, to consist of eighteen companies, to be officered according to the regulations of the Army of the United States; that William McIntosh, the principal war chief of the nation, should rank as full colonel, and the two chiefs, George Lovett and Noble Kennard, as majors. This arrangement was communicated to General Gaines, then at Hartford, who approved of the proceeding of Colonel Brearly, informing him, by a letter of the 29th day of January, 1818, that he would cheerfully accept the services of all the Indians who might be disposed to join him; which disposition Col. Brearly was directed to encourage as far as practicable. Pursuant to these instructions, one thousand five hundred and thirty-seven warriors were mustered into the service of the United States, on or about the 24th day of February, 1818, and served until the early part of the month of May thereafter. Including Onir Haujo, a chief of the Creek nation, and seventy-five warriors, who had been mustered into service on the 8th day of December, 1817, the whole number of Indian forces employed during this period amounted to one thousand six hundred and thirteen men. William McIntosh held the rank of brigadier general, and received, in that capacity, one hundred and four dollars per month pay, seventy-two dollars per month for subsistence, forty dollars per month for forage, and forty-two dollars and twenty-seven cents per month, allowance for servants; having received, for two months and fifteen days service, from the 24th day of February to the ninth day of May, 1818, the sum of six hundred and forty-five dollars and seventy-two cents. George Lovett, Noble Kennard, Samuel Hawkins, and — Blue, were assigned to the rank of majors, in which capacity they served from the 24th day of February until the 11th day of April, when the American army, under the command of Major General Andrew Jackson, then having arrived near to Suwaney river, after the capture of Fort St. Marks, in the Spanish province of East Florida, Lovett and Kennard were promoted to the rank of full colonels, and Hawkins and Blue to the rank of lieutenant colonels, in which capacities they respectively served until they were discharged from service. These persons received for their services during these periods, the full allowance made for pay, subsistence, forage, and servants, to officers of the like rank in the regular army. The vacancies occasioned in the regimental field and staff by these promotions, were, on the 12th day of April, 1818, partially filled, by the promotion to the rank of majors of two chiefs, John Bernard and — Matthey, who had served as captains from the 24th day of February until that time. The general field and staff further consisted of one assistant adjutant general, who received per month sixty dollars pay, twenty-four dollars for subsistence, twenty-four dollars for forage, and twenty-eight dollars and eighteen cents allowance for servants. Four assistant commissaries of purchases were also appointed, who, respectively, received salaries at the rate of thirteen hundred dollars per annum. In addition to these, 28 captains, 28 first lieutenants, and 28 second lieutenants, were appointed; the whole force having been divided into 28 companies. These officers were, at the first organization of the corps, appointed by the Creek nation of Indians, under the sanction of the commanding General. By what authority the original arrangement for the organization was changed, the rank of several of the chiefs raised, and an additional number of field and staff officers appointed, the committee have not been able, conclusively, to ascertain; but, as these various transactions appear on the regular pay-rolls of the corps, which have been passed to the credit of the officer who made the disbursement, and have been recognised at the War Department, it is presumed that they must have occurred with the sanction of some public agent. The promotions, which took place near Suwaney river on the 12th day of April, 1818, were made by order of Major General Jackson.

The sums paid to these Indian forces for their services amount to thirty thousand one hundred and twenty-seven dollars and forty-nine cents, including the sum of three thousand five hundred and forty-eight dollars and forty-eight cents, paid to the General, Field, and Staff. To ascertain out of what fund these disbursements were made, a letter was addressed to the Second Auditor of the Treasury, in whose office these accounts were audited, which, with his answer thereto, dated on the 14th ultimo, is submitted with this report. By this communication, it appears that it became questionable out of what fund these forces were to be paid; but, after examination, it was concluded by the Secretary of the War Department, for the reasons stated in the said letter, to carry the expenditure to the charge of the appropriation made by Congress for the pay of the Army of the United States for that year.

For the purpose of determining with certainty by what authority these forces were raised, the Secretary of the War Department was requested to furnish to the committee "copies of any orders (if any such existed) which might have issued from the War Department" to the commanding officers of the southern division of the army, "by virtue of which" these Indian forces were "raised, officered, and taken into service." The answer of the Secretary of that department, dated on the 22d ultimo, referring the committee to the documents therein stated, contains all the information relating to the subject of inquiry existing in the War Department. After careful and deliberate examination of these documents, the committee cannot discover that any orders whatever are therein contained, which, by the most forced and artificial construction, could be deemed even to imply an authority from the War Department to muster into service, organize, or employ, the Indian forces under the command of William McIntosh and the chiefs of the Creek nation. The papers referred to contain no orders whatever addressed to General Gaines, and only one bears date previous to the issuing of the orders by that officer to Colonel Brearly for employing the Indian warriors. This order is addressed to Major General Jackson; and, so far as this communication and the answer of Gen. Jackson thereto, of the 29th January, 1818, furnish any aid to this branch of the inquiry, it is strongly to be inferred that the employment of these forces was neither in accordance with the views of the War Department, nor justified by any existing necessity. In the communication of the Secretary of War to General Jackson, of the 26th day of December, 1817, directing him to assume the command of the forces employed in the vicinity of Fort Scott, against the Seminole Indians, he was informed that "the regular force now there was about eight hundred strong;" and "one thousand militia of the State of Georgia were called into service;" "that General Gaines estimated the strength of the Indians at twenty-seven hundred." The answer of General Jackson to the War Department, of the 26th January, 1818, informed that Department, that "the troops assembled on the southern boundary, reinforced with the Tennessee volunteers called into service," would enable him "to inflict speedy and merited chastisement on the deluded Seminoles." These Indian forces were not mustered into service until the 24th day of February thereafter. In the judgment, therefore, of the commanding officer of the southern division of the Army of the United States, the addition of this extraordinary force of sixteen hundred and thirteen Indian warriors was not deemed necessary to the execution of the orders which had been issued for "a speedy and successful termination of the Indian war." In confirmation of the opinion that the employment of these forces was viewed in that light by the commanding General, the committee submit with this report the proceedings of a court martial convened by his order for the trial of Colonel David Brearly, who was arrested on the application of General Gaines on charges of alleged neglect of duty in not forwarding certain supplies from the Creek Agency, destined for the use of the troops of the United States and Georgia militia stationed near the Chehaw village and at Fort Scott. To these charges exhibited by General Gaines was added, by order of Major General Jackson, a charge of "unmilitary conduct," under which was specified an alleged offence, "that the said Colonel David Brearly did, in the month of February or March, 1818, muster into the service of the United States a large body of Indian warriors, at or near Fort Mitchell, thereby consuming a large quantity of the supplies laid in and destined for the relief of Fort Scott, and to furnish the Tennessee volunteers;" which act is therein alleged to have "tended manifestly to the injury of the service."

After an investigation of several days, Col. Brearly was honorably acquitted of all the charges preferred against him. The commanding General, by an order of the 5th day of August, 1818, approving the sentence of the court on this specification, observed that "they had, from the documents produced, properly found him not guilty, as it appeared from General Gaines's letter, bearing date the 29th of January, that he was ordered to accept all the Indians that might be disposed to join him." Notwithstanding the commission of this act, so "manifestly" injurious to the service, was thus directly traced to the superior officer of Colonel Brearly, no proceedings have been since instituted to fix the responsibility of the alleged offence on the officer from whom the order emanated.

The committee further report, that it appears from the documents to which they have been referred by the letter of the Secretary of War, of the 22d ultimo, that Major General Andrew Jackson having been directed by that Department, on the 26th of December, 1817, to assume the command of the forces in the vicinity of Fort Scott, was ordered to call on the Executives of the adjoining States for such additional militia force of the said States as he should deem it requisite to raise for the execution of his orders, to terminate the conflict then commenced with the Seminole tribe of Indians. Instead of obeying this order, he proceeded to levy an army from the people of the States of Tennessee and Kentucky, by circular letters, privately addressed to individual citizens of his own selection. In this circular address dated on the 11th day of January, 1818, the aid of one regiment only, to be composed of one thousand men, was requested. At a meeting, however, of the citizens who were to command, as officers, this corps of levies, on the 19th day of January, thereafter, General Jackson accepted the services of two regiments, to be raised by voluntary enlistments, which were accordingly assembled together, consisting of one thousand two hundred and eighty-six citizens of those States, who were organized as auxiliaries, into an army of mounted gunmen. The organization of the officers commanding these regiments was made under the authority and sanction of the commanding General, and consisted of one assistant adjutant general, one assistant inspector general, one assistant deputy quartermaster general, one judge advocate, one chaplain, two colonels, four lieutenant colonels, four majors, four adjutants, one forage master, one assistant forage master, two surgeons, four surgeons' mates, two quartermasters, and eight non-commissioned staff. To this organization of the general regimental field and staff, were added twenty captains, twenty first lieutenants, twenty second lieutenants, eleven third lieutenants, and seventeen cornets. The additional lieutenant colonel and major to each regiment was made in consequence of an agreement for that purpose originally made by General Jackson. The ruinous tendency of these unauthorized proceedings is forcibly illustrated by the fact, that, on the assembling of these forces for the purpose of being mustered into service, at Fayetteville, they brought with them into camp no less than forty captains. The reason given by the Inspector General of the southern division of the Army, who mustered them into service, by order of General Jackson, for appointing an extraordinary number and grade of company officers, appears in a letter addressed to the Secretary of War, by that officer, of the 9th February, 1818. In this letter Colonel Hayne observes, that to "merge the lesser fractions into the larger, and thus amalgamate them into single companies, to cut down captains, to leave out subalterns, and yet to satisfy and secure to us all the men, has been a very difficult task indeed. To effect this object, I have been obliged, in a number of cases, to give an additional lieutenant and cornet to the companies." On the assembling of these troops, General Jackson proceeded to direct the disposition for their use of the funds placed in the hands of the regularly appointed officers of the Army of the United States, imposed on Major Fanning, of the corps of artillery, the temporary duties of deputy quartermaster general, and vested him with authority to draw on the Quartermaster General for any additional sums wanted for supplies. To facilitate their march, he also authorized the Inspector General of the southern division of the Army to draw, either on the Secretary of War or the Quartermaster General at Fort Scott, for such funds as might be found necessary. These troops, thus mustered into service, and organized, served from the 31st day of January, 1818, until the 25th day of June thereafter, and have received from the public funds the pay and allowances made to the regular armies of the nation.

The committee further report that two companies of rangers, under the command of Captains Boyle and Gist, consisting of about one hundred and forty-five men, were called into service by order of Major General Jackson, during the Seminole war. It does not appear that these forces were mustered into service pursuant to any requirement on any civil or executive officer of any State or Territory. By the letter of William W. Bibb, Governor of the Alabama Territory, dated on the 15th day of April, 1818, it appears that at the date he was "ignorant of the views of the Government with respect to Florida," that he "knew not the orders which had been issued to General Jackson," and that he was "not acquainted, in any degree, with the arrangements on the part of the United States for prosecuting the war against the Seminole Indians. The answer of the Secretary of War to Governor Bibb, communicating the information of those arrangements in reply to his inquiries, was transmitted from the War Department on the 13th day of May, 1818. No muster or pay-rolls of these forces have yet been received at the War Department, and no documents can be furnished in the public offices, by which the number of these forces, the period of their enlistment or discharge, the mode in which the officers were appointed, or by whom, can be satisfactorily determined. The communication addressed to the committee by the Secretary of War, on the 19th instant, contains all the information existing in the War Department relative to these companies of rangers. The object for which these forces were raised, appears in the letter of General Jackson to the War Department, dated on the 2d day of June, 1818, and the instructions issued to them were to scour the country between the Mobile and Apalachicola rivers, exterminating every hostile party who should dare to resist, and would not surrender and remove with their families above the thirty-first degree of latitude. Excepting this letter, the only information relative to these forces, which exists in the War Department, is found in the papers referred to in the letter of the Secretary of War of the 19th instant. From them it appears, that Captain John B. Hogan, paymaster of the 4th regiment of infantry, was directed by Colonel King, on the 18th day of September, 1818, to prepare an estimate of the amount of funds necessary to pay them off. This estimate is submitted with this report, and it appears thereby, that the sum required for this purpose amounts to nineteen thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven dollars and ninety-two cents, including eight thousand five hundred and sixty-three dollars, for pay, seven hundred and twenty dollars for subsistence, and ten thousand five hundred and eighty-four dollars allowance for the use and risk of horses.

These various forces, forming no part of the Military Establishment of the United States authorized by Congress, and not having been called into service by virtue of any law providing for calling forth the militia of the several States, the committee, in obedience to the resolution of the House, which has imposed on them the duty of reporting whether any of the appropriations for pay and subsistence of the regular Army of the United States have been applied to the support of any army or detachment of troops raised without the consent of this House, or the authority of Congress, deeming that on the preservation of the Constitutional powers of Congress the chief security of the people of these United States against all encroachments on their liberties must for ever depend, and that on the firmness, independence, and fidelity of their immediate Representatives, they justly rely for the protection of the solemn trust confided to their charge, do unreservedly express to the House their opinion, that the levying of these forces, their organization and employment in the public service, was in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and a dangerous infringement on the powers of Congress.

To attempt seriously to establish, by argument, that Congress alone possesses the power to raise armies, instead of partaking of the nature of an inquiry how extensive the breach sustained by the Constitution has been, would rather imply that it might be doubted whether we have any Constitution at all. In no instance of the delegation of sovereignty to the Federal Government have the people manifested greater caution and wisdom, than in confiding to their immediate Representatives the exercise of this power, which, above all others, is susceptible of the most alarming abuses in every government. The experience of all nations had uniformly taught them that their only security from violence and rapacity was to be found in the careful restraint of its exercise. In the elective franchise an adequate remedy was provided for the redress of most of those abuses which originate from the temptations of avarice and the love of power; but they well knew, that whenever their liberties should be directly assailed, the physical force of the Government alone could be resorted to, for the successful accomplishment of the designs of ambition. The unlimited power of supporting any military establishment whatever is denied, even to Congress; and the term of appropriations for this object has been wisely restricted to the Constitutional period of service of the members of this House. So highly fraught with danger has the raising of troops, and their maintenance, been considered, that, except in time of war, actual invasion, or imminent danger, these powers have been withheld from the State Legislatures; sovereignties—whose jurisdictions are more comprehensive and indefinite than any known to our institutions. To levy armies, without the authority of Congress, is, therefore, to substitute the arbitrary pleasure or caprice of individuals, in the place of the national will, and to violate all those securities which the people have provided for their safety.

The nature or character of this assumption of power derives no exemption from the application of these principles, by reason of the particular description of the forces originally called into service by General Gaines, and subsequently commanded by General Jackson. As lawfully might a commanding officer in the army, of his own authority, receive into the service of the United States, as auxiliaries, the forces stationed in the neighboring provinces of Great Britain, as to embody and organize into regular armies, and associate with his command, the Indian tribes residing within our jurisdictional limits. In relation to forces of this latter description, the Constitution has heretofore received a practical exposition from Congress; which, whether we consider the period of its enactment, or the character of the distinguished patriot and statesman, from the history of whose administration this illustration is derived, is entitled to the greatest consideration and respect. So clearly does it seem to have been at that time considered that the power of employing Indian forces in the public service, even for the protection of the frontier, had not been vested even in the Executive Department, that, in the act entitled "An act making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States," approved on the 5th day of March, 1792, it was found necessary to derive that power from the authority of Congress; and the President of the United States was, by the 15th section of the said act, authorized by Congress to employ, in the public service of the nation, that description of forces, in case he should deem the measure to be expedient. This act was repealed by Congress, and the authority, thus conferred, ceased on the 3d day of March, 1795.

FEBRUARY, 1820.

Seminole War—Unauthorized Levies.

H. OF R.

The appointments of the officers of this corps of Indians, and the promotion which took place by order of General Jackson, were also, in the opinion of the committee, an infringement on the powers confided to the Executive of the United States and to the Senate. It is scarcely more than to repeat a mere political truism, to say that the exercise of all power whatever, not derived from the will of the people, is not only in itself unlawful, but contrary to the fundamental principles of every free government, and the orderly administration of its public concerns. The declared will of the nation has intrusted to the President and Senate alone the power of appointment to all offices, not otherwise provided for by the Constitution. The prudence and wisdom of these eminent and distinguished functionaries of the Government, were the guaranties on which the people relied for the careful selection of those subordinate agents to whom the sword of the nation was to be intrusted. The assumption, therefore, by others, of the responsibility of exercising this power, is self-created—unrecognised by our institutions, and tends to the most pernicious and alarming disorders in the administration of the Government. In the case of military appointments, the most powerful as well as the most obvious considerations especially demand that this power should not be wrested from the hands of those on whom alone the Constitution has imposed this high responsibility.

The Congress of the United States alone is vested with the general authority to organize the militia, and to provide for calling them forth for the purposes expressed in the Constitution. These powers have been executed. Not only the organization, but the rank and description of the officers of the militia has been prescribed by the act of Congress of the 8th day of May, 1792, and the act of the 2d day of March, 1803. Neither of these acts contain any authority for the appointment of those descriptions of officers selected for the command of the corps of volunteers, who were respectively invested with the rank of Assistant Adjutant General, Assistant Inspector General, and Assistant Deputy Quartermaster General. These offices have been created only in the regular Army of the United States.

The extraordinary assignation of an additional lieutenant colonel and major to each regiment, and a third lieutenant and cornet to each company, is also unknown to the laws providing for the organization of the militia. With whatever force the propriety or necessity of varying these laws may be urged, until the Congress of the United States, who are the Constitutional judges of the utility of such a measure, and who have the exclusive right to provide for calling forth the militia, and the sole power to establish regulations for their government, shall, by the authority with which they have been thus invested, revise the present system, there is no power known to our institutions which can lawfully execute any schemes of reformation or improvement in the established organization of the military force of the nation.

By the further provisions of the Constitution, the appointment of the officers of the militia is expressly reserved to the States. The object of this reservation of power was to provide for the security of the people against the success of any design which might be formed to alienate the militia from the allegiance which they owed to their respective States. So "necessary to the existence of our Union, and a free government, has the preservation of the rights of individual States, in their full extent, according to a just construction of the principles of our Constitution," been considered by Congress, that the utmost extent of power to call forth the militia, conferred by the act of the 28th of February, 1795, even on the Executive, has only authorized the issuing of orders for that purpose to the "officers of the militia." Neither the Executive, by virtue of any authority which has been conferred by this act, or much less an officer of the regular Army, of his own authority, can, without the assumption of powers repugnant to the principles of the Constitution, and of the most dangerous tendency, proceed to levy armies by enlistment from the citizens of the respective States. When it is further considered that the authority of the States over their militia "ceases when they are called into the service of the General Government;" that they "constitute a part of the national force for the time, as essentially as the troops of the regular Army;" that, "like the regular troops, they are paid by the nation; like them, their operations are directed by the same government;" and that their superior commander may be designated by the Executive of the United States, it is evident that the chief reliance of the States for the preservation of this great bulwark of their liberties, must essentially consist in scrupulously retaining the selection of those officers to whose authority their citizens are to be immediately subjected. From whatever source, therefore, the officers selected for the command of these volunteer forces might have received their rank, the power to appoint them was self-assumed, inasmuch as the appointments were not made, and they held no commissions by virtue of any authority for that purpose, derived from any of the States.

The committee submit to the House with this report, a vindication of the proceedings of General Gaines, addressed by that officer to the Department of War, dated at Augusta, in the State of Georgia, on the 17th day of October, 1819. This document chiefly relates to the result of the measures adopted by the Senate of the United States at the last session of Congress; and, although the committee do not consider that subject to be directly connected with their duties, as prescribed by the resolution of the House, yet they are impelled by a sense of that justice which is due to an officer whose proceedings are the subject of inquiry, to furnish all the information within their power, however remotely affecting the investigation confided to their charge.

It does not appear to the committee at what time General Gaines made known to the War Department his proceedings in relation to the assembling and organization of the Creek warriors, under the command of William McIntosh. In a letter addressed to that Department, on the 15th day of December, 1817, he observes, that the steps which he had taken were "known to the Department of War;" but the date of this letter was several days antecedent to the first order issued to Colonel Brearly for the mustering of these forces.

That a crisis of such great public peril and imminent danger to the nation, might exist, as to palliate, if not in a great measure justify, a commanding General in departing from the strict rules of subordination and obedience, the committee most readily admit; but they believe that a careful examination of the circumstances under which these Indian forces were assembled, must lead to the conviction that any necessity which might have been supposed to exist for resorting to this extraordinary proceeding, is rather to be imputed to the premature commencement of hostilities by the commanding General, than to any unforeseen or inevitable events not within his own control, and which a cautious and prudent foresight of the probable result of his own measures would not have enabled him to avoid.

The waste of the public resources which has resulted from these various assumptions of the power of raising armies, is not among the least of the pernicious disorders which have originated from these unauthorized measures. The committee submit to the House with this report an abstract of the muster rolls of the militia, volunteers, and Indian warriors, employed in the public service during the late operations of the army against the Indians, on the southern frontier of the United States. It appears from this document, furnished from the office of the Paymaster General, that the whole number of such forces (including the rangers under the command of Captains Boyle and Gist,) employed during the war with the Seminole Indians, exclusive of the troops of the regular army, amounting to six thousand and fifty-eight men, of which number four hundred and twenty served in the general and regimental field and staff, and as company officers. The whole number of forces, of all descriptions, actually in service on the 1st day of April, 1818, amounted to upwards of five thousand six hundred men. From the state of the accounts it is impossible at this time satisfactorily to ascertain the whole amount of public expenditure on the object for which these forces were raised. The disposition, however, of the appropriations made by Congress for the support of a brigade of militia, amounting to four hundred and forty-six thousand seven hundred and forty-three dollars, appears by the annexed statements, furnished from the office of the Second Auditor of the Treasury Department. The pay-rolls of only four companies of the Tennessee volunteers have yet been received. From an examination of these it appears that the paymaster of those forces, Captain John B. Hogan, has paid to the men, respectively, the sum of fifteen dollars and fifty cents each, as an allowance for clothing. Should the same disbursement for this allowance have been made to the whole number of the non-commissioned officers and privates of this corps, the total amount of this item will exceed the sum of eighteen thousand dollars. The amount of these pay-rolls (twenty-seven thousand eight hundred fifty-five dollars and forty-five cents) having been carried to the charge of the appropriations for a brigade of militia, in the annexed abstract from the office of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, and appearing thereby, also, to have been deducted from the balance remaining due from the paymaster, on account of this fund, a letter was addressed to the Second Auditor, requesting that officer to inform the committee by virtue of what law of the United States or regulation relating to this subject, the paymaster was entitled to credit at the Treasury for a disbursement of this nature. From the answer of the Second Auditor, herewith submitted, dated on the 15th instant, and from an inspection of the books of that office, it appears that the accounts of the paymaster, which include this item, have not been acted on at the Treasury, nor has any part of them been passed to his credit. This disbursement being directly contrary to the act of the 28th day of February, 1795, and totally unauthorized, the officer cannot receive credit therefor under any circumstances whatever.

It appears further to the committee, that the accounts for the moneys paid to the Creek warriors, composing the general field and staff of that corps, for forage and servants, have been passed to the credit of the disbursing officer, in the office of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, without any evidence whatever that the number of horses and servants allowed for, were actually kept or employed by those persons. The explanation which the Second Auditor relies upon as a justification of this departure from the established regulations of the Treasury Department, is contained in the communication of the 5th instant, addressed by that officer to the committee. In their opinion this deviation from those regulations which have been adopted, as salutary and indispensable restraints on improper expenditures of the public moneys by the disbursing officers of the Government, or any other persons acting in such capacity, and which in all cases should be impartially applied, was irregular and unauthorized.

The House having authorized the committee to report by bill, they have devoted their attention to the devising of some legislative remedies against the recurrence of these disorders. To prescribe the principles of the Constitution by legislative enactments, might tend to impair its high and uncontrollable sanctions, and the faithful discharge of the duties of the several committees of the House furnish an adequate remedy against all abuses in the public expenditure. The committee, therefore, submit the facts contained in this report, and the documents which establish them, referring them to the discretion of the House.

Mr. REID, of Georgia, moved that five thousand copies thereof be printed for the use of the House; in support of which he remarked that this was a Government depending in a peculiar manner on the strength of public opinion; that the House would recollect that the debate on the Seminole war had gone before the public, that a report of a committee of the Senate at the last session had also gone forth, and that a vindication of the President of the United States and his Commanding Generals, prepared by an unknown hand, had been put into circulation, and found its way even to their tables, and that, without any prejudices of any description to gratify, he wished all the facts and evidence (now laid before the House by this report) to be as extensively spread before the people as the documents, &c., to which he had alluded.

The motion was opposed by Mr. STROTHER at some length; who argued that it would be an unnecessary expense, as the report would probably receive a general circulation through the public papers; and that the usual number (sixty copies) would be sufficient for the use of the members, &c.

The motion to print five thousand copies was lost, as was a motion to print three thousand, and a motion to print one thousand; after which, the usual number was ordered.

MAINE AND MISSOURI.

A message was received from the Senate, by their Secretary, announcing that the Senate insist on their amendments to the bill for the admission of Maine into the Union, which had been disagreed to by this House.

Mr. TAYLOR moved that the House insist on its disagreement to the said amendments.

Mr. COBB inquired of the Chair whether the question could be divided so as to be taken separately on each principle embraced in the amendments.

Mr. LOWNDES remarked, in substance, that it appeared to him there would be much difficulty in coming to any conclusion on these amendments in which the two Houses would concur; that he thought therefore that it would be better to lay them aside until this House had matured and finally acted on the bill now before it, for the admission of Missouri, and ascertained how it was received by the Senate, &c.; with this view he moved that the amendments be laid on the table.

On this question the House divided, and the motion was negatived—yeas 74, nays, 85.

Mr. CULPEPER, then, after some remarks to show the propriety and necessity of mutual forbearance on a question so important and delicate; and from the hope, that, by acting conclusively on the bill now before the House and sending it to the Senate, all difficulty would be gotten over, &c.—moved that the amendments be postponed until to-morrow.

This motion was opposed by Mr. HOLMES, and Mr. WHITMAN, who were averse to delaying a final decision on these amendments with which the admission of Maine was connected, and which they wished to separate from it as promptly as possible.

The motion to postpone the amendments was negatived without a count.

The main question then recurring, it was so divided, on motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, as to be first taken on insisting on the disagreement of this House to the first eight sections, (connecting with the Maine bill provisions for the admission of Missouri,) and was decided, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of New York, Bateman, Beecher, Boden, Brush, Buffum, Butler of New Hampshire, Campbell, Case, Clagett, Cook, Crafts, Cushman, Darlington, Dennison, Dewitt, Dickinson, Dowse, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Edwards of North Carolina, Ervin, Fay, Fisher, Floyd, Folger, Foot, Ford, Forrest, Fuller, Garnett, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hazard, Hemphill, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Heister, Hill, Holmes, Hostetter, Kendall, Kinsey, Lathrop, Lincoln, Linn, Livermore, Lyman, Maclay, Mallary, Marchand, Mason, Meech, Meigs, R. Moore, S. Moore, Monell, Morton, Moseley, Murray, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Virginia, Parker of Massachusetts, Patterson, Phelps, Philson, Pitcher, Plumer, Rich, Richards, Richmond, Rogers, Ross, Russ, Sampson, Sergeant, Silsbee, Sloan, Smith of New Jersey, Southard, Stevens, Storrs, Street, Strong of Vermont, Strong of New York, Tarr, Taylor, Tomlinson, Tompkins, Tracy, Upham, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Wendover, Whitman, and Wood—97.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour, Bloomfield, Brevard, Brown, Bryan, Burton, Burwell, Butler of Louisiana, Cannon,

The question was then stated on insisting on the disagreement of the House to the remaining amendments of the Senate, (being the 9th section, embracing the compromise principle.)

Mr. LOWNDES wished to remark, before this question was taken, that, although he should always be ready to vote for such a proposition, substantially, when presented to him, combined with the free admission of Missouri; yet, as the amendment relative to Missouri had been disagreed to, it would be useless to retain this amendment in connexion with the Maine bill alone, and, as he should therefore now vote against retaining it, he wished his motive to be understood.

Mr. MCCREARY made a remark or two to the same effect; when—

The question was taken on insisting on the disagreement of the House to the 9th section of the Senate's amendments, and carried—yeas 160, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Alexander, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Ball, Barbour, Bateman, Beecher, Boden, Brevard, Brown, Brush, Bryan, Buffum, Burton, Burwell, Butler of New Hampshire, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Cannon, Case, Clagett, Clark, Cobb, Cook, Crafts, Culbreth, Cushman, Cuthbert, Darlington, Davidson, Dennison, Dewitt, Dickinson, Dowse, Earle, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Edwards of North Carolina, Ervin, Fay, Fisher, Floyd, Folger, Foot, Ford, Forrest, Fuller, Garnett, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hardin, Hazard, Hemphill, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Heister, Hill, Holmes, Hostetter, Johnson, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Kendall, Kent, Kinsey, Kinsley, Lincoln, Linn, Livermore, Lowndes, Lyman, Maclay, McCoy, McCreary, McLean of Kentucky, Mallary, Marchand, Mason, Meigs, Metcalf, R. man, Williams of Virginia, Williams of North Carolina, and Wood.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bloomfield, Cocke, Culpeper, Fullerton, Lathrop, Little, Mercer, Shaw, Sloan, Smith of New Jersey, Smith of Maryland, Strong of Vermont, and Tarr.

So the House insisted on its disagreement to the whole of the Senate's amendments to the Maine bill; and the Clerk was directed to acquaint the Senate therewith.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate ask a conference on the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, on the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the admission of the State of Maine into the Union," and have appointed managers at the said conference on their part.

THE MISSOURI BILL.

The House then again went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. COBB in the chair,) on the Missouri bill—Mr. STORRS's proposition to insert therein the clause to exclude slavery from the territory of the United States west of the Mississippi, and north of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude, (excepting the proposed State of Missouri,) being still under consideration.

Mr. BEECHER resumed and concluded the speech, which he commenced on Saturday, against the amendment, and in defence of the right of Congress to impose the slavery restriction, heretofore discussed.

Mr. RANDOLPH again rose, and spoke some time against the amendment, and in reply to some of the arguments of Mr. BEECHER.

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, spoke some time in explanation of the reasons which would induce him to vote against the amendment, though he was in favor of restriction on the territories west of the Mississippi, &c.

Mr. STORRS next addressed the Committee, in a short but earnest speech, in support of his amendment.

Mr. LIVERMORE made a few remarks against the amendment.

Mr. BALDWIN spoke a short time in favor of the amendment, and in reply to a point or two of Mr. BEECHER's remarks.

The question was then taken on Mr. STORRS's amendment, and decided in the negative—ayes 33.

The Committee then proceeded to fill up the details of the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR moved an amendment thereto, going to strike out all that part providing the apportionment of delegates to the convention among the several counties, and substituting therefor, in substance, a provision leaving the apportionment to the General Assembly of the Territory, according to the free population thereof.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose to offer a little amendment to the amendment, which he supposed had dropped out of it by accident: it was the word white—a matter, he observed, of some importance yet to those on the south side, as they said—and proceeded to extend his remarks on the subject; when

Mr. TAYLOR accepted the amendment with pleasure. He had omitted it, because it was sufficiently expressed in subsequent parts, and he had not deemed it important here.

Considerable discussion ensued on Mr. TAYLOR's amendment, in which it was opposed by Messrs. SCOTT, WHITMAN, and CLAY, and was supported by the mover and Mr. LIVERMORE; and

The question being taken thereon, was decided in the negative, by a large majority.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, then moved to amend the third section of the bill, by striking out of the clause which designates the kind of persons who shall vote for delegates to the convention of the State, the word white, so as to extend the privilege of voting to all "free male citizens;" and spoke at some length in support of his motion, and in explanation of his opinions on other points which had been introduced in the debate of the bill.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose in opposition to this amendment, and spoke about an hour and a half on this motion, and other topics which he embraced in its consideration.

Some proceedings took place on a point of order which was made; after which, the question was put on Mr. ALLEN's motion, and a division required, when it appeared that but one member (the mover of the amendment) rose in its support.

After filling the blanks in the bill, according to the motions of Mr. SCOTT, of Missouri,

Mr. TAYLOR moved an amendment, [one which he had offered on the first day that the bill was taken up, and then withdrawn,] by adding to the last section the following clause: "And if the same [the constitution] shall be approved by Congress at their next session after the receipt thereof, the said Territory shall be admitted into the Union as a State, upon the same footing as the original States."

This motion was advocated by the mover, and earnestly opposed by Messrs. SCOTT, CLAY, and MERCER; and, after some remarks by Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, touching the case of Louisiana, referred to in the debate,

The question was taken on Mr. TAYLOR's motion, and negatived—ayes 75, noes 84.

Mr. STORRS then offered an amendment, in effect to transfer the restrictive amendment already adopted, to the sixth section of the bill, (which embraces those provisions in the nature of compact,) and so modify it as to make it a recommendation for the free acceptance or rejection of the convention of Missouri, as an article of compact, to exclude slavery, instead of enjoining it as an absolute condition of their admission.

Mr. CLAY seconded the motion, and, with the mover, zealously urged the adoption of the amendment. It was opposed as zealously by Messrs. TAYLOR, SERGEANT, and GROSS, of New York.

The debate had continued some time, with much animation; when, in consequence of the doubts expressed whether the amendment, in its present shape, was in order, Mr. STORRS withdrew it.

Mr. CLAY renewed the amendment in substance, but so changing the manner of inserting it in the bill as to avoid the objection as to the point of order.

FEBRUARY, 1820.

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

The debate was renewed on the proposition, and continued with undiminished zeal, by Mr. CLAY, in its support, and by Messrs. TAYLOR, SERGEANT, RANDOLPH, and COOK, against it.

The question being put, the Committee divided, and the amendment was negatived, as follows: For the amendment 82, against it 92.

No other amendment being offered, about half past nine o'clock the Committee (having rejected several motions, in the course of the evening, to rise and report progress) rose and reported the bill to the House.

Mr. LOWNDES laid the following proposition on the table, as an amendment of the rules and orders of the House:

"And if any member shall not confine himself to the question under debate, and shall be called to order, if the decision of the Speaker of the House, upon appeal, be against the member thus deviating from the question, such member shall not be, at that time, permitted to proceed, without the special leave of the House."

The House then adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 29.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

"Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be directed to report a bill, authorizing the Grand Lodge of the District of Columbia to erect a Masonic Hall, in this city, by lottery."

AMENDMENT TO THE RULES.

The House then took up the motion, offered last evening by Mr. LOWNDES, to amend the rules and orders of the House.

Mr. STROTHER opposed the proposition, and spoke at considerable length to show that it was unnecessary, and might be dangerous and oppressive, and was inexpedient.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said a few words to the same effect.

Mr. RANDOLPH offered to amend the proposition by adding thereto the following proviso:

"Provided, That in such case the words in question shall be reduced to writing, and that the member, thus called to order, shall be at liberty, if he shall choose, to explain the same."

Mr. R. followed his motion, at some length, with remarks in illustration of the oppressive effects which might be apprehended from the proposition, without the qualification which his amendment proposed, with which the rule, he admitted, would be salutary.

Mr. LOWNDES spoke in support of his proposition, and defended it principally on the ground of its necessity to prevent the time of the House from being wasted by irrelevant debate; to prevent a yet greater evil—an injury to the character of the House by suffering such a waste of time—the consequent creation of an opinion that the House is inadequate to the proper discharge of its duties, &c., and that no undue regard for the principle of the liberty of speech ought to overrule a measure necessary to counteract evils so serious as those he had noticed. He disapproved Mr. RANDOLPH's amendment because it would neutralize his proposition, and leave the rules just as inoperative as they were at present, in the case he wished to provide for.

Mr. MERCER, with the view of proceeding at once to the important business of the day, moved to lay the subject on the table; but the motion was negatived.

Mr. M. then moved the indefinite postponement of the proposition, and spoke at some length against it, as placing in the hands of a majority of the House an engine of oppression and injustice. He waived his motion, however, to give place to a motion by

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, who entertained doubts on the expediency of the proposition, and was not prepared at this moment to vote on it; and, therefore, moved its postponement until to-morrow. This motion prevailed; and the amendment was postponed accordingly.

MAINE BILL.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider, the message from the Senate asking a conference upon the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the admission of the State of Maine into the Union;" whereupon,

Resolved, That this House do agree to the conference asked by the Senate upon the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments depending to the bill aforesaid, and that managers be appointed to the same on their part.

Ordered, That Mr. HOLMES, Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. LOWNDES, Mr. PARKER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. KINSEY, be the managers at the said conference on the part of this House.

MISSOURI BILL.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider, the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole to the bill to authorize the people of the Territory of Missouri to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and, the said amendments being read, were concurred in by the House, with the exception of the following:

"And shall ordain and establish, that there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said State, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted: Provided, always, That any person escaping within the same, from whom labor or service is lawfully claimed in any other State, such fugitive may be lawfully reclaimed, and conveyed to the person claiming his or her labor, or service, as aforesaid; Provided, nevertheless, That the said provision shall not be construed to alter the condition or civil rights of any person now held to service or labor in the said Territory."

The question was then stated to concur in the said amendment; when,

Mr. STORRS moved to amend the same by striking out these words: "And shall ordain and establish that;" and, in lieu thereof, to insert the following, to wit:

"And be it further enacted, That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the said convention, for their free acceptance or rejection, to be incorporated into the Constitution of the said State, as articles of compact between the said State and the United States, viz: That there be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said State, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted; Provided, always, That any person escaping within the same from whom labor or service is lawfully claimed in any other State, such fugitive may be lawfully reclaimed, and conveyed to the person claiming his or her labor or service as aforesaid; Provided, nevertheless, That the said provision shall not be construed to alter the condition or civil rights of any person now held to service or labor in the said Territory.

Mr. RHEA spoke near an hour against the restriction.

Mr. WALKER, of North Carolina, spoke a short time on the same side.

Mr. FORD, of New York, spoke half an hour in answer to the remarks of several gentlemen who had opposed the restriction.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, replied briefly to Mr. F., and in explanation of remarks which he had before made.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, next rose and entered into a general examination of the restriction in the proposed case; to show that Congress possessed no right to impose it.

Mr. RANDOLPH spoke some time against Mr. STORRS's amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, followed, and addressed the House at considerable length against the right of restriction, &c.

Mr. FORREST, of Pennsylvania, spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I rise to give my reasons why I shall vote for the restriction and against the amendment offered to it, or, in other words, more in unison with my feelings, why I shall vote against the extension of slavery beyond the bounds of the old United States. I rise with unfeigned deference to those who have gone before me, whose abilities are so pre-eminent, whose research has been so profound, and whose powers and eloquence have been so impressive on the subject, that very little is left for me to say. I have possessed myself of sundry notes from the Constitution and other documents, to aid me in my feeble attempt, lest I should be embarrassed, not being accustomed to public speaking, and having but small hopes, and less expectation, of being able to cast a single ray of new light on the subject. I shall commence by declaring that the Constitution, so far as slavery may be inferred from it, is nothing but the creature of compromise, which I can testify, on a retrospect of my feelings at the time of its adoption, or rather when it was promulgated for the consideration of the public. It was a compromise to prevent disunion; it was a dereliction of first principles upon which the independence of our country was achieved; it was an acquiescence in the bondage of those of our fellow-men in whose services their possessors conceived they had a property. It was a compromise for the sake of peace, and confined wholly to the then United States, and not extended to the territory possessed or to be acquired.

The parts of the Constitution which I shall recite are section 2d, article 3d: "Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole numbers of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all persons," &c. This part of the article I have thus noted, and the 1st article of the 9th section, to wit: "The migration and importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by Congress prior to the year 1808, but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each person," manifestly show, (corroborated by the declaration made on this floor, by the member from South Carolina, who had been a member of the Convention,) that the States of South Carolina and Georgia would not have come into the Union if this concession had not been made by the other States; that it was a compromise, and that the words in the 9th section, "as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit," although the words slave, slaves, or slavery, are not in the Constitution, yet it is inferred, and servitude is confined to the then United States, and not extended to the territory. Does not the limitation in the 9th section of the Constitution most manifestly declare the power of Congress to prohibit the importation of such persons, say slaves, by limiting the exercise of the authority until the year 1808, and which could only have been meant to be operative on the old United States, as will appear by the act of Congress, passed the 7th April, 1798, to authorize the establishment of a government in the Mississippi Territory? At least ten years before the expiration of the limitation contained in the 9th section, before recited, the 7th section of the act of Congress, just alluded to, prohibits the importation of slaves into the Mississippi Territory, from any port or place without the United States, under a penalty of three hundred dollars, and the slave to be entitled to his or her freedom; as also the act, passed 26th March, 1804, erecting Louisiana into two territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof. See the 10th section, in the following words:

"The prohibition of the importation of slaves in the territories, not only from any port or place without the United States, but also from any port or place within the limits of the United States, of any slave or slaves which shall have been imported into the United States since the first day of May, 1798."

This act was passed at least six years before the expiration of the limitation before mentioned, and had relation to the slaves imported into the United States since May, 1798.

Now, is not this conclusive to show that the Congress could not have entertained the most distant idea that the territory belonging to the United States was entitled to a participation in the compromise with the old States? No: if they had, they never would have passed those acts, but would have considered the limitation contained in the 9th section of the Constitution as applying to the territory as well as to the old United States.

It seems too plain to admit a doubt, that, previous to the year 1808, Congress had the power, and exercised it, to prohibit the migration and importation of slaves into their territories, and into new States formed out of their territories; and if it may be prohibited into new States, (which has been done,) why not the same authority to make it a condition for the admission of territories into new States?

The third section of the Constitution, part the first: "New States may be admitted by Congress into the Union," and so on. Second part: "The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and to make all needful rules and regulations that policy and expediency may dictate for public good;" and, in exercising their powers, Congress passed the resolution, on the 10th day of April, 1780: "That the unappropriated lands that may be ceded to the United States by any particular State, pursuant to the recommendation of Congress, should be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and admitted into the Federal Union, with all the rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, with other States."

It was in consequence of this resolution, that Virginia, New York, Massachusetts, and Connecticut, ceded to the United States claims to land within their States respectively, beyond a given line, which they thereby made their western boundary. Virginia ceding all her territory northwest of the river Ohio, in conformity to the resolution of the 10th day of October, 1780, Congress passed an ordinance, on the 13th day of October, 1787, for the government of the territory northwest of the river Ohio, being that part of the cession made by the State of Virginia, ordaining, in the articles of compact, that the territory should be restricted from taxing the lands the property of the United States, and providing that in no case should the non-residents' land be taxed higher than residents'; the 6th article of which inhibits slavery and involuntary servitude. The fifth section of the said ordinance having varied the disposition of the territory into States from the mode pointed out in the cession made by Virginia to the United States, Congress passed a resolution recommending to the State of Virginia a reconsideration of her cession, or so much of it as prescribed the bounds of the States to be formed out of territory ceded by her, so as to comport with the views of Congress, contained in the 5th section of the ordinance to divide the ceded territory into distinct States of not more than five nor less than three, as the situation of the territory might require. The State of Virginia, by the act of her Legislature, did so reconsider the section, and adopted the 5th section of the ordinance of Congress verbatim; and, at the same time, the 6th section, prohibiting slavery and involuntary servitude, was the subsequent section; by which, and by her full representation on the floor of Congress, she became a party in imposing the restrictions, however inconsistent her conduct is at this day, for, had she thought they were incompatible, or unconstitutional, she would have then made her objections, and not at this day; but, as she did not, the territory was formed into three States, which were subsequently admitted into the Union, to wit: Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana, and now are respectively represented on this floor, without diminution of sovereignty.

The State of Georgia ceded to the United States all the territory within her chartered bounds, beyond a given line, and, by the fifth part of the first section of the articles of agreement between the United States and the State of Georgia, she authorized the formation of the State of Mississippi to be admitted into the Union, on the same conditions and restrictions, with the same privileges, and in the same manner, as is provided in the ordinance of Congress passed the 13th day of July, 1787; which ordinance was thereby directed, in all its parts, to extend to the territories, except that article which forbids slavery.

This, the State of Georgia had a right to except, the territory being within the chartered bounds of the State of Georgia; and, of course, within the limits of the old United States. Mississippi was admitted into the Union in December, 1817, and Alabama was authorized to become a State in 1819, upon the same conditions and restrictions, both formed out of the same territory. I now will state a question—if the States of Ohio, Georgia, Virginia, and other States, can cede their territory, to become States in the Union, and that under restriction, cannot the United States do the same with their territory, without impairing their sovereignty, when they are admitted into the Union?

I will relieve the Committee from further attention, after a very few remarks on observations that have been made by members opposed to the amendment. The member from Virginia, who is not now in his place, but who I have in my eye, when on the floor dealt out denunciations of disunion, massacre, civil war, horror, and blood, exclaiming that, if the restriction should be carried, this would be the darkest day our country ever saw. Here I must differ with the member. No; the morning of the 26th day of December, 1776, let me tell the youth, whose father was a fellow-soldier of mine, a Revolutionary compatriot in the cause of liberty, was the darkest time our country ever saw. It was then WASHINGTON led his patriot band of freemen to the battle of Trenton, the forlorn hope of the independence of his country. It was then he commanded the rifle corps under Captains Washington and Monroe to drive in the Hessian pickets. Methinks I see the striplings skipping in obedience. The action became general, and WASHINGTON, at their head, pouring forth his patriotic exhortation, in words that will ever be remembered by me, and ought to be impressed on the minds of every friend to liberty: "That the darkest time of night was just before day;" which was soon verified by the surrender of the Hessians, an event that gave a preponderance to the invisible balance held by the hand of Him who weighs the fate of nations. It was that event that laid the foundation of our country's independence, and to which we are indebted for our seats at this day, in this splendid hall, once more engaged in the cause of liberty. When WASHINGTON led on his little patriot band, to them he was as a modern Moses; he went before them as a pillar of smoke by day, and a column of fire by night; his sympathy in their distress and sufferings allayed their hunger and quenched their thirst. They followed him as the modern Israelites, the Israelites of the day, with their urim and thummim on their breasts, the insignia of their cause inscribed on escutcheons of brass, fixed on their bayonets and sword-belts—liberty or death—united we stand, divided we fall—'tis for posterity we die. Posterity! what, posterity perpetuate slavery! How shall I express myself? Oh pour un mantle pour couvrir les faces de ceux qui sont les fils de mes compatriotes, who with me in battle, fell, whose death I then regretted as premature and unfortunate, snatched, as I then thought, from a participation in the blessings of an happy independence, in the full enjoyment of every civil and religious liberty. But now I have occasion to rejoice; yes, rejoice overmuch, that they were not, like me, permitted to live to see posterity outgrow the remembrance of the patriotic virtues of their fathers, by an act for the extension of slavery.

It has been a source of very considerable pain to me, and an afflicting exercise of mind, to hear members on one side of the House, or those who are opposed to restriction, use such language against their fellow-members on the other side, as does not comport with their dignified standing on this floor. Denunciation, sarcasm, and insinuation, serve to irritate and excite warmth with some, but with me they only produce sorrow, that the exemplary and conciliatory language of Abraham, the elder, to Lot, the younger brother, did not pervade our feelings. "Let there be no strife between thee and me, between thy herdsman and mine; are we not brethren?" I shall notice an allusion to me by a member when on the floor, who was pleased to characterize the extremes of my life, by portraying the previous part in all the habiliments and trappings of a soldier in uniform clothes and epaulettes. The friend must have had but a very imperfect knowledge of the Revolutionary Army, if he supposed that they were as neatly dressed and equipped as the officers of the present day. No, it was the inability of Congress to furnish the means to either feed, pay, or clothe the army, that reduced them to starvation, and to the necessity of cutting up their only blankets to make a coat and overalls; and as to rank, it could not be distinguished for the want of epaulettes. I was in hopes the little service I rendered to my country would not have been sufficient to have brought me into notice at this day; it is a part of my life I wish to forget, being opposed to war, believing it to be unlawful in the sight of God. But, if the extension of slavery grows out of the question before the Committee, I shall think the small share I have had in the Revolution was the blackest part of my life.

My plainness of dress and manners were also noticed and complimented, as belonging to the society of Friends, otherwise called Quakers. I trust I am a member of the church militant, and in spiritual union with friends, whose character is peace and good will to all men; and I am authorized to say, that I would cheerfully give up the Territory to the inhabitants to free their fellow-men, to avert what has been threatened, but which I cannot think will ever be realized. However, I cannot do an evil that good may come out of it.

I now shall conclude, with expressions of respect for the members from Virginia and Kentucky, who were pleased to compliment the State of which I am an humble Representative, by ascribing its dignified standing in the Union to the exemplary conduct of the people called Quakers. Would to God we were all Quakers; there would be less strife, more harmony and brotherly love among us; and, if we were to follow their precepts and emulate their virtues, we should do as they do; they build all their churches without a lottery; they do not sell their pews to the highest bidder; but sit on benches, master and man; they maintain their own poor, and pay their tax assessed for the maintenance of the poor of the township they live in; they believe God to be a spirit, and worship in spirit and truth.

Mr. PARKER, of Virginia, occupied the floor about half an hour, on the other side. When Mr. P. concluded—

The question to agree to the amendment proposed by Mr. STORRS, was put, and decided in the negative—yeas 82, nays 98, as follows:

Mr. SCOTT then offered an amendment to the restrictive amendment, having for its object, in substance, to prevent the operation of the restriction either on the slaves now in Missouri or on their increase.

This proposition was advocated by Mr. CAMPBELL of Ohio; but,

Mr. SCOTT, at the suggestion of several of his friends, withdrew his amendment.

The question was then taken on concurring in the restrictive amendment, adopted in Committee of the Whole, on the motion of Mr. TAYLOR, and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Baker, Bateman, Beecher, Boden, Brush, Buffum, Butler of New Hampshire, Campbell, Case, Clagett, Clark, Cook, Crafts, Cushman, Darlington, Dennison, Dewitt, Dickinson, Dowse, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Fay, Folger, Ford, Forrest, Fuller, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hazard, Hemphill, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Heister, Hostetter, Kendall, Kinsey, Kinsley, Lathrop, Lincoln, Linn, Livermore, Lyman, Maclay, Mallary, Marchand, Meech, R. So the House concurred in the restriction.

Mr. TAYLOR then renewed a motion which he had made unsuccessfully in Committee, to amend the last section of the bill, by striking out the words "and the said States, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "and if the same (the constitution) shall be approved by Congress, the said Territory shall be admitted into the Union as a State, upon an equal footing with the original States."

This question was briefly supported by the mover, and was opposed by Messrs. SCOTT, LOWNDES, MERCER, FLOYD, and HENDRICKS; and, the question being taken thereon, it was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Buffum, Butler of New Hampshire, Clark, Crafts, Cushman, Darlington, Dennison, Dowse, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Fay, Folger, Forrest, Fuller, Guyon, Hackley, Hemphill, Herrick, Hostetter, Kinsley, Lathrop, Lyman, Maclay, Marchand, Meech, Morton, Murray, Patterson, Phelps, Philson, Rich, Richards, Richmond, Rogers, Ross, Sergeant, Storrs, Strong of Vermont, Strong of New York, Tarr, Taylor, Tracy, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Wendover, and Wood—49.

The question recurring on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time,

Mr. STORRS moved to amend the bill, by adding thereto a new section, providing for the exclusion of slavery from all the Territories of the United States west of the Mississippi and north of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes of north latitude, excepting the proposed State of Missouri—(the amendment commonly called the compromise.)

Mr. RANDOLPH spoke a short time against this amendment.

Mr. FOOT moved to amend the amendment by striking out the words "thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude," so as to leave the provision applicable to all the Territories of the United States.

Proceedings.

MARCH, 1820.

Mr. CLARK made a few remarks against the propriety of introducing the amendment offered by Mr. STORRS in this bill.

Mr. RANDOLPH stated much at large, the reasons why he should vote against the compromise.

Mr. FOOT explained the object of his motion, which was, chiefly to attempt an accommodation of conflicting opinions on this subject, of stripping the question of the Constitutional difficulty, and to test the sincerity of those who had maintained the restriction.

Mr. COBB spoke at considerable length, and very warmly, against all restriction whatever, as tending to universal emancipation.

Mr. STORRS rose and stated that, from the consideration that his proposition might create delay in the passage of the bill, by drawing out a long discussion, and thus, by procrastinating any result from the conference between the two Houses, operate to delay the admission of Maine beyond the 4th of March, the time to which she had been limited by the parent State—he would withdraw his proposition.

The question was then, at length taken, on ordering the bill to be engrossed, and read a third time, and decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of New York, Anderson, Baker, Bateman, Beecher, Boden, Brush, Bufum, Butler of New Hampshire, Campbell, Case, Claggett, Clark, Cook, Crafts, Cushman, Darlington, Denison, Dewitt, Dickinson, Dowse, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Fay, Folger, Ford, Forrest, Fuller, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hemphill, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Heister, Hill, Hostetter, Kendall, Kinsey, Kinsley, Lathrop, Lincoln, Linn, Lyman, Maclay, Mallory, Marchand, Meach, R. The bill was then ordered to be read a third time to-morrow; and a little after 8 o'clock, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 1.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, made an unfavorable report on the petition of the Grand Lodge of the District of Columbia, (to be authorized to build a Masonic Hall by lottery;) which report was read and concurred in.

Mr. CANNON, from the Committee on the Militia, reported a bill to establish an uniform mode of discipline and field exercise for the militia of the United States; which was twice read and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, communicating the information required by the resolution of the 24th ultimo, in relation to a loan of gunpowder made to the firm of Stull & Williams.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, communicating the information required by the resolution of the 22d ultimo, in relation to the contracts heretofore made with James Johnson, Alexander McRea, Elias Earle, and Peter Townsend, for the delivery of powder, arms, &c.

These communications were severally read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WHITMAN submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire and report to this House what right, if any, Commodore Stewart had, by law or otherwise, to require that men whose terms of enlistment expired while on the Mediterranean station, should either re-enlist, or forfeit the right "to any claim or provision as distressed seamen, from the Consuls of the United States in Europe;" and what right existed at the Departments of the Treasury and Navy "to refuse remuneration for such claims," as stated in a letter, under date of the 27th January, 1820, addressed by the Secretary of the Navy to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

A short debate took place on this resolution, in which it was supported by the mover, and was opposed by Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, and TRIMBLE; in the conclusion of which Mr. TRIMBLE moved that the resolution be laid on the table for the present, which motion was agreed to.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act for the better regulation of the trade with the Indian tribes; An act for the relief of Robert Purdy; An act in addition to an act, entitled "An act regulating the Post Office Establishment;" An act for the relief of Bartholomew Duverge; An act for the relief of Labedoyere de Kermion; and An act for the relief of Joseph McNeill; in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

DEATH OF DAVID WALKER.

Mr. QUARLES, of Kentucky, rose, he said with feelings which he could not express, and with a melancholy very seldom experienced by him, to announce to the House the distressing intelligence of the death of one of its body; my friend and colleague Major DAVID WALKER, with Christian fortitude, about eight o'clock this morning, exchanged, said Mr. Q., a world of cares, of toils and difficulties, for, I hope, a mansion of bliss.

MARCH, 1820.

Death of David Walker.

H. OF R.

I offer, said Mr. Q., for consideration, resolutions comporting with the wish of the deceased. While living, my colleague, by profession and practice, in private and public life, was a plain unaffected man. He, from education, had an abhorrence of pomp and parade. He desired that the body that was clad with mourning should weep with mental distress. He had seen numerous carriages, filled with persons attending funerals, at this and other places, moving with solemnity to the burial ground, and returning from it with no evidences of sorrow. And to prevent a similar spectacle, connected with his remains, did he make the request contained in the resolutions I now offer. The Representatives from Kentucky, the relatives of the deceased, and also those gentlemen who lived with him, and whose kindness was generously afforded him in his sickness, have been consulted with regard to the propriety of the course which is now proposed, and have approved it. I wish that this body will consider the departure from the usual course of proceeding on former occasions of this kind, as arising from none other than the purest motives—the most sincere respect to our colleague—and in this House a desire to carry into execution the dying wish of one of its body. I hope that I shall have the kind indulgence of my brother members, in permitting the repeated wishes of my colleague to be carried into effect, conformably to the spirit of the resolutions now proposed.

Mr. Q. then submitted the following resolutions :

Resolved, unanimously, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of David Walker, deceased, late a Representative from the State of Kentucky.

Resolved, That the said David Walker having communicated to the Speaker of this House, and the honorable James Barbour, of the Senate, shortly before his death, his wish that he might be buried without pomp or parade, attended by a few only of his friends, in compliance with his wish, this House will, on this occasion, not conform to the practice which has heretofore prevailed, of adjourning, to attend the funeral of a deceased member.

Resolved, further, That, in conformity with the spirit of the same wish of the deceased, the members of this House will depart from the usage of wearing crape for one month, with the exception of those who may voluntarily choose to conform to said usage.

Mr. RANDOLPH said it was from a very different sentiment indeed than that of disrespect to their departed brother who had gone to his account, that he rose to say any thing on this melancholy occasion. There is no man in this body, said Mr. R., in whose eyes, at this time—may it be so at all times!—the wretched strife and contention of ambition appears so contemptible, or at least more low and contemptible, than in the eyes of him who now addresses you. Sir, I cannot consent to continue that strife under existing circumstances; I will, as far as in me lies, conform to the letter and the spirit of the request of the deceased. But, while I conform to the letter and spirit of that request—and, sir, it is such an one as I should wish made in my own behalf, under similar circumstances—I cannot consent to protract the discussion of the most agitating and invidious question which was ever presented to the Congress of the United States since the institution of this Government. I do not mean to cavil about the point that a motion not to adjourn is never in order, although a motion to adjourn is always in order—far be such a spirit from me at all times, but more especially at the present time. But, said Mr. R., I wish to adhere to precedents set in good times, on such mournful occasions, in this House. And, if precedents are valuable on any occasion, they are to be adhered to in those decorous and solemn rites which all people, even the most savage, pay to the last sad relics of departed humanity, and in which the infringement of established custom strikes as a jarring discord upon the heart. The first death which took place of a member of this House—and I ought well to remember it—for it was of one of my nearest relatives, the only near one left on the maternal side—it took place in New York, in the month of June, 1790, when Congress sat in that city—the House resolved that the delegation of Virginia then present (consisting, when full, of only ten members) should be a committee to see performed the last sad offices for the deceased. The next day they “resolved, unanimously, that the members of this House, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of Theodorick Bland, deceased, late a member thereof, will go in mourning for him one month, by the usual mode of wearing crape on the left arm.” As the member in question was, if not in affluent, yet in independent circumstances, it was ordered that a sum equal to his travelling expenses, had he lived to return to Virginia, should be allowed for the expense of removing him to his last sad home in this world. I mean, sir, the travelling allowance was viewed as a fund to which the deceased member's executors might be entitled, and therefore applicable, under the direction of his colleagues, to the rites of sepulture. His executors might, if they pleased, have removed the body to the family burial ground. The funeral was neither pompous nor expensive; it was, what it ought to have been, decent Christian burial. Other cases had occurred, Mr. R. continued, which he remembered, in Philadelphia; two particularly, of members from North Carolina. On those occasions, a particular friend of his, who has been a member of Congress from the time of the adoption of the Constitution by North Carolina, was appointed on the committee to make the necessary arrangements for interment, in the case of Mr. Burgess, of Edenton, he believed, and in that of Mr. Bryan, of Newbern, he was sure, in conjunction with a colleague of his (Mr. Thomas Blount,) since also gone where all flesh must go. On that occasion this rule was also observed. During the first session of Congress here, (the last of Mr. Adams's administration,) this House lost one of its most valuable members, in the person of a gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. Jones.) In this case the rule was still adhered to. But, at a succeeding session, the first under the new administration, and the only bad example set at the time—Mr. R. regretted it the more, as he felt his full share of all responsibility incurred at that time—on the death of the delegate from the Territory of Mississippi, (Mr. Hunter) the rule was departed from; then, for the first time, was the practice adopted of providing a funeral at the public expense, be that expense what it might; and that rule, under which gross abuses have been practised, has continued ever since to be observed, or rather to be abused; and this without any change in the accustomed form of attending the funeral and wearing crape for a month. Why not, then, in this case, said Mr. R., comply with the letter and spirit of the request of the deceased, without departing from the established form, and yet get back, if I may so express myself, to first principles, on this melancholy occasion? Mr. R. adverted to the funeral of a former Vice President. To what man does the cause of American Independence owe more, with one single exception, than to George Clinton? None; none, sir. If any man's remains might claim a funeral at the public expense, surely it is those of him whose death bathed a nation in tears. Next to that man, or as near as any, in the cause of the Revolution, stood George Clinton. But a funeral at the public expense ought to be considered as the highest public honor which the nation could bestow. Ought it, then, to be considered a matter of course, that, whenever a member of either House of Congress, or a Territorial Delegate, or a Vice President, or even a President of the United States, shall leave this bustling, sorry world, we shall follow him (perhaps nothing loath) to the grave, and the sumptuous funeral be defrayed at the public charge? It was not the money price of which he spoke. Recollect the case of the late William Pitt. What was the distinction taken on that occasion? And by whom was a public funeral of that great statesman, who for more than twenty years had filled the first place in the eyes of Europe, opposed? By a man whom I may call, and will call, ultimus Anglorum—by William Windham; by the favorite disciple of Edmund Burke, the fourth but not the least star in the great constellation of English statesmen that is set for ever. It was this—he would pay the debts of this eminent man; his great and disinterested public services deserved it at the hands of the nation; but he would give no unsuccessful statesman, and such he considered Mr. Pitt to have been, a funeral at the public expense. Mr. R. hoped the House would, in the present case, go on in the usual course; and that, while it complied with the established form, it would at the same time comply in such a manner as to fulfil the letter and spirit of the request of the deceased.

H. OF R.

Admission of Missouri.

MARCH, 1820.

The SPEAKER rose and observed that, as he was referred to in the resolutions, he would ask leave of the House to state what had passed between the deceased and himself on the subject. The SPEAKER then briefly recapitulated the conversations which had taken place between himself and the deceased, which corroborated and supported the statement contained in the resolution.

A few remarks were subjoined by Mr. CLARK and Mr. CULPEPER, in approbation of the wishes of the deceased, when the question was taken on each resolution separately, (a division of the question having been required by Mr. WALKER, of North Carolina,) and they were severally agreed to, nem. con.

A committee was appointed accordingly, consisting of the entire delegation from Kentucky, with the exception of Mr. CLAY, (Speaker,) and with the addition of Messrs. BARBOUR, SHAW, TAYLOR, and CUTHBERT.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH, the House agreed that when it adjourned, it would adjourn to twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. R. then moved an adjournment, but the motion was not agreed to.

THE MISSOURI BILL.

The engrossed bill to authorize the people of the Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, upon an equal footing with the original States, was read the third time, and the question stated, Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. RANDOLPH rose, and spoke more than three hours against the passage of the bill, on the ground of the unconstitutional and unjust restriction which it imposed on the people of Missouri, as a condition of their admission into the Union, &c. When Mr. R. had concluded,

Mr. HOLMES called for the previous question.

The call being sustained by the House, the previous question was accordingly stated, "Shall the main question be now put?" which being agreed to, the question was taken on passing the bill, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 91, nays 82, as follows:

So the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence; and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 2.

JAMES WOODSON BATES appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat as the Delegate from the Territory of Arkansas.

Mr. SERGEANT presented a memorial and petition of William Bayard, of the city of New York, merchant, in behalf of himself and others, holders of property in the three per cent. stocks of the United States, representing that the proceeds of the sale of the public lands in the Western territory were, by the act of the 4th of August, 1790, pledged, in the most formal and solemn manner, towards sinking or discharging the said stocks; that the holders of the said stocks, since its first creation, have done no other act tending to show that they had given up, in any degree, their reliance on the faith of the Government, so expressly pledged originally, that the proceeds of the said western lands should be applied to extinguish their stocks; on the contrary, they have retained their full faith and reliance on the promises of the Government, and still retain it; they, therefore, pray that Congress will take their case into consideration, and make such provision as justice may require.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, presented sundry resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, remonstrating against any change in the system heretofore, and now, existing for the disposal of the lands of the United States; which resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. PINCKNEY, from the committee appointed on the subject, reported a bill, to restore to all the States which have, in cessions, omitted to retain the same, the jurisdiction of the territory ceded to the United States for forts, arsenals, dock-yards, and barracks, so far as respects the execution of their State laws, for the prevention and punishment of crimes, and recovery of debts; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider the bill to authorize the President of the United States to appoint a receiver of the public moneys, and register of the land office, for the district of Laurence county, in the Arkansas Territory; and the bill being amended, was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. RHEA, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of reviving, and continuing in force, an act, entitled "An act to provide for persons disabled by known wounds received during the Revolutionary war," passed April 10th, 1806; which act was afterwards revived, and continued in force for the term of six years, by an act of the 25th of April, 1812, as in said act declared, and is since expired.

On motion of Mr. COBB, four thousand copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the subject of the currency of the country, were ordered to be printed for the use of the members of this House.

On motion of Mr. BATEMAN, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of requiring, by law, the marshals of the several districts in selling real estate by virtue of execution, to hold such sale in the city or county in which such real estate shall be situate.

On motion of Mr. BALDWIN, the Secretary of the Treasury was required to communicate to this House the state of the Bank of the United States, on the first days of March, June, and December last.

On motion of Mr. HOOKS, a committee was appointed to inquire into the propriety of providing, by law, for an equitable adjustment of the accounts of Andrew McIntire, deceased, late collector of direct tax and internal duties in the sixth collection district of North Carolina, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. HOOKS, SLOCUMB, and SETTLE, were appointed the said committee.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit:

1. An act for the better regulation of the trade with the Indian tribes;
2. An act in addition to an act, entitled "An act regulating the Post Office Establishment;"
3. An act for the relief of Robert Purdy;
4. An act for the relief of Bartholomew Duverge;
5. An act for the relief of Labcdoyere de Kermeon; and,

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which was read, and is as follows, viz:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 4th of February last, requesting to be informed what progress has been made in surveying certain parts of the coast of North Carolina, and in ascertaining the latitude and longitude of the extreme points of Cape Hatteras, Cape Lookout, and Cape Fear, according to a resolution of the 19th of January, 1819, I have to state, that it is intended to carry the resolution of the 19th of March into effect in the present year. The co-operation of the board of engineers with naval commissioners being necessary in executing that duty, and the board having been engaged last year in surveying the eastern coast of our Union, it would have interfered with previous arrangements, and been attended with increased expense, had they withdrawn from it. The board will, however, be employed during the present Summer in the regular execution of its duties in the survey of the coast of North Carolina, when instructions will be given it to afford the necessary aid to carry the resolution of the 19th of January of the last year into effect.

JAMES MONROE.

MARCH 1, 1820.

The said Message was laid on the table.

Mr. STROTHER made an unsuccessful motion to take up the joint resolution now lying on the table, to authorize the publication of the secret journal of the old Congress.

The House next went into a Committee of the Whole (Mr. STORRS in the chair) on the bills for establishing United States courts in Maine and Alabama. The Committee got through the details of the first bill, and made some progress in the second, when the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill from this House, entitled "An act to authorize the people of the Territory of Missouri to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States," with amendments; they have also passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Frederick Goetz and Carl W. Westphal, and of the heirs of Abraham Neppes, deceased;" in which amendments and bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved that the House should, by general consent, agree now to take up (out of its order) the Navy appropriation bill. This motion was lost.

Mr. S. moved to postpone the preceding orders of the day, for the purpose of taking up the said bill. This motion was agreed to; and the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the appropriation bills.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose to object to this mode of getting at the consideration of important bills, out of their turn—of being taken by surprise—and to regret the change in the rules which permitted, by any motion, the taking up of bills, except on the day set for them. Money bills, of all others, ought not to be taken up without due notice; which was proper, to enable members to come prepared for their investigation. He would not allow any money bill to pass without strict examination. He would take the ipse dixit of no man, in passing between the people and appropriations even for the Navy, which had fought itself into favor. He, therefore, moved that the Committee now rise.

Mr. SMITH replied, that he had three days ago, in his place, given notice to the House that he should, as soon as the discussion of the Missouri bill had been brought to a close, move to take up the appropriation bills. He had moved now to take them up, because the public service was suffering for the want of appropriations. He stated further, that, though it had never been the usage before, it had always been his practice, since he had been chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, to give notice when he should call up appropriation bills.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) explained the reasons for the change in the practice of the House, by which the orders were called regularly, as they followed on the docket of the House. He then expressed his hope that the Committee would rise; the Missouri bill, in fact, was not yet disposed of, and until it was, he, for one, was unwilling to go into any other important business. The bills before the Committee were those, on which the great question was to be decided, of how the deficit in the Treasury, whether by taxes, loans, or otherwise, was to be supplied. The House was not now in a moral condition for the consideration of such questions. He not only wished the Missouri bill to be first finally disposed of, but really he wanted a day's rest for the body as well as the mind, after the settlement of this agitating and laborious subject. He hoped, therefore, the Committee would rise, with an understanding that it would take up the appropriation bills on Monday.

Mr. SMITH said it would be very unwise in him to press the consideration of these bills, contrary to the wishes of the Committee; and he therefore acquiesced in the motion for the Committee to rise. Mr. S. took this occasion to say, that he hoped he was not considered under any necessity, from the situation which he occupied, of defending any measure or any appropriation. He considered himself here a member of the House, and would freely exercise his opinion on all subjects whatever.

The Committee then rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

THE MISSOURI BILL.

The message received from the Senate announced that they had passed the Missouri bill, with an amendment; which amendment was, in substance, to strike out the slavery restriction, and insert, in lieu thereof, the clause (Mr. THOMAS'S and Mr. STORRS'S original proposition) to exclude slavery from all the territory of the United States west of the Mississippi, north of 36° 30' north latitude, except within the proposed State of Missouri.

On motion of Mr. HOLMES, this message was laid on the table long enough to give him an opportunity to make a report from the committee of conference; which report is as follows:

Mr. HOLMES, from the managers appointed on the part of this House, to attend a conference with the managers appointed on the part of the Senate, upon the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill of this House, entitled "An act providing for the admission of the State of Maine into the Union," made the following report:

1. That they recommend to the Senate to recede from their amendments to the said bill.
2. That they recommend to the two Houses to agree to strike out the fourth section of the bill from the House of Representatives, now pending in the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the people of Missouri to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," the following proviso, in the following words: "And shall ordain and establish that there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted: Provided, always, That any person escaping into the same, from whom labor or service is lawfully claimed in any other State, such fugitive may be lawfully reclaimed, and conveyed to the person claiming his or her labor or service, as aforesaid: Provided, nevertheless, That the said provision shall not be construed to alter the condition or civil rights of any person now held to service or labor in the said Territory."

And that the following provision be added to the bill:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That, in all that territory ceded by France to the United States, under the name of "Louisiana," which lies north of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes north latitude, not included within the limits of the State contemplated by this act, slavery and involuntary servitude, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall be, and is hereby, forever prohibited: Provided, always, That any person escaping into the same, from whom labor or service is lawfully claimed in any other State or Territory of the United States, such fugitive may be lawfully reclaimed, and conveyed to the person claiming his or her labor or service, as aforesaid.

The report was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BEECHER then moved to print the report.

This motion was opposed by Mr. LOWNDES, on the ground that it would imply a determination in the House to delay a decision of the subject to-day, which he had hoped the House was fully prepared for.

Some conversation passed on this motion between Mr. TAYLOR and Mr. LOWNDES, on the propriety of proceeding to act in this House, on the recommendation of the committee, before the Senate had given the pledge required of them of first adopting the report by receding from the amendments to the Maine bill, in which Mr. TAYLOR opposed such proceeding, and Mr. LOWNDES was in favor of it; inasmuch as it would be wrong to put in jeopardy a satisfactory settlement of this question, from an adherence to a mere point of etiquette and order; that the House could not fear that the Senate would adopt the recommendation to recede from their amendments, as the committee of conference was unanimous in their report, with the exception of one member from this House, (Mr. TAYLOR,) and became us further, as the disposition of the Senate to admit Maine could not be doubted, they would have no motive to adhere to their amendments if this House should adopt the report, &c.

A long debate took place on the question of printing, or rather on the question whether this House should act on the second and third propositions of the committee of conference, before the Senate had acted on the first. Those against acting immediately, and in favor of the printing, were Messrs. TAYLOR, LIVERMORE, and WHITMAN; and those who opposed the printing, were Messrs. LOWNDES, HOLMES, KINSEY, STORRS, RANDOLPH, BROWN, STROTHER, CAMPBELL, and PARKER of Virginia.

The debate had continued about three hours, when Mr. BEECHER withdrew his motion.

The House then resumed the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the Missouri bill.

The question was divided so as first to be taken on striking out the restriction.

Mr. LOWNDES spoke briefly in support of the compromise recommended by the committee of conference, and urged with great earnestness the propriety of a decision which would restore tranquillity to the country—which was demanded by every consideration of discretion, of moderation, of wisdom, and of virtue.

Mr. HOLMES followed in a short speech, nearly to the same effect.

Mr. ADAMS, of Massachusetts, spoke at some length in favor of the restriction, and against a compromise.

Mr. KINSEY, of New Jersey spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, a period has now arrived when it becomes necessary to close this protracted debate, and, as I shall vote for the compromise offered by the Senate, it is proper to state my reasons for so doing. We have arrived at an awful period in the history of our empire, when it behooves every member of this House now to pause and consider that on the next step we take depends the fate of unborn millions. I firmly believe that on the question now before us rests the highest interests of the whole human family. Now, sir, is to be tested, whether this grand and hitherto successful experiment of free government is to continue, or, after more than forty years enjoyment of the choicest blessings of Heaven under its administration, we are to break asunder on a dispute concerning the division of territory. Gentlemen of the majority have treated the idea of a disunion with ridicule; but, to my mind, it presents itself in all the horrid, gloomy features of reality; and when we unfold the volume of past ages, and, in the history of man, trace the rise and fall of governments, we find trifles, light as air compared to this, dissolving the most powerful confederacies, and overturning extensive empires. If we inquire what causes operated to destroy the Amphictyonic league or dissolve the German Confederacy, in almost every case, we find questions of territorial jurisdiction. And what, for past ages, has deluged Europe in blood? Disputes concerning territorial government. On questions of this high and mighty import, it behooves us to approach with the most awful considerations. What at this period is matter of conjecture, may, in a short time, become real history. It is not a question like that heretofore, in which a diversity of opinion commingled in the same society where a division of sentiment, on subjects political, spread itself over the whole Union; but, on this question, the States are almost equally divided. And what is the case now before us? Opinions from which every gentleman, a few months past, would have recoiled back with horror, as treason to imagine, are now unhesitatingly threatened; that which had no ideal existence, engendering as this discussion progresses, assumes a positive shape, and, mixing with this unpropitious debate, presents itself in all the dreadful appearances of reality. May God, in mercy, inspire us with a conciliatory spirit, to disperse its fury and dispel its terrible consequences.

On this question, which for near six weeks has agitated and convulsed this House, I have voted with the majority. I voted the same at the last session. But I am convinced, should we persist to reject the olive branch now offered, the most disastrous consequences will follow. Those convictions are confirmed by that acerbity of expression arising from the most irritated feelings, wrought upon by what our Southern brethren conceive unkind, unjust, determined perseverance of the majority: and to those I now beg leave to address myself. Do our Southern brethren demand an equal division of this wide-spread, fertile region; this common property, purchased with the common funds of the nation? No; they have agreed to fix an irrevocable boundary, beyond which slavery shall never pass; thereby surrendering to the claims of humanity and the non-slaveholding States, to the enterprising agriculturist of the North, the Middle and Eastern States, nine-tenths of the country in question. In rejecting so reasonable a proposition, we must have strong and powerful reasons to justify our refusal; and notwithstanding you may plead your conscientious scruples, be it remembered you must shortly account to that august and stern tribunal—impartial history and the strict scrutiny of public opinion. Can you plead conscience in bar to such a compromise? If so, how reconcile votes you have, on similar questions, already given?

When Mississippi, at the last session, was received into the Union, your votes made slavery interminable. At the present session you have confirmed slavery forever, and by the constitutions of Alabama and Mississippi, rendered future Legislatures incapable of ever abolishing this greatest of human curses. (In those two votes, I sincerely thank God I had no participation.) On those occasions the eloquence of your orators was dumb. Where, then, was this overflowing of sympathetic philanthropy? Where, then, was this divine monitor? Was it asleep, or had its powers of reminiscence failed to operate? Where, then, were those chivalric champions who now fearlessly brave all consequences, after having in those two cases trampled on the rights of human nature, now boast of their superior humanity, their greater gifts of civilization and refinement? If you really do possess any of those characters, in a superior degree, you are in a tenfold ratio more culpable than our Southern brethren. You had no interest to lead you aside from the path of rectitude. If now the pure principles of humanity alone operate on your minds, in the rejecting the compromise now offered, where then were those vigilant sentinels, those guardians of the rights of man?

The bias of education was against you; public opinion in opposition; and yet, either heedlessly or willingly, you consented to the deed. Yes, you have assisted in enchaining, and, in perpetuity, rivetting the galling fetters of slavery on unborn generations of that unhappy people. Do not attempt to palter, to shuffle with your consciences, in a double sense. The rejecting this reasonable, this equitable compromise, will not cure your wounded conscience. It will not be blotted out; the waters of the Mississippi cannot obliterate the stain.

When called upon to assign a reason for rejecting it, can you plead principle in excuse? Conscientious scruples are not bounded by the Mississippi, or limited to the latitude of 36 degrees 30 minutes; when, agreeably to the observation of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) it would require a clear day to ascertain its operation. I much fear, notwithstanding all your solemn asseverations, a scrutinizing public will assign other views, other motives; and what more probable than that unhallowed one of political ascendancy? And it is to be feared that a lurking ambition, the bane of all government, has had too great an influence in this debate. If so, it is time now to pause before we pass the Rubicon: to hesitate before it is too late to retract. In persisting in our restriction on Missouri, are we dealing to our brethren of the South the same measures we would be willing they should mete to us? When, with magnanimity unparalleled, they have conceded to us nine-tenths of this great common property, can we wish to deprive them of the remainder? And whilst gentlemen, on the part of the majority, arrogate to themselves a greater portion of moral refinement, it would be highly honorable to exhibit greater manifestations of liberality in sentiment. We perhaps have assumed too much to ourselves on the score of emancipation. Has that geographical line which divides the slave from the non-slaveholding States, originated in moral or physical causes, or in both? If from moral principles, its progress must continue to keep pace with the march of intellect, information, and the divine influence of religion. And those really pious and zealous advocates of abolition have much to console and congratulate themselves with for their strenuous and hallowed labors. When retrospecting but a few years, and slavery spread its deleterious influence over the whole of this Confederacy; when at present the better moiety is free. This has been effected, under Providence, by the mild and persevering influence of religion and reason, co-operating with natural and physical causes. In those States whose soil and climate are only calculated for the cultivation of the cereal grainæ, the agriculturist finds the labors of the slave unprofitable; it therefore became politic and necessary to do away an evil whose embarrassing effects must continually decrease, in place of adding to the resources of a State.

We here discover a combination of natural and moral causes operating to remove from our country this greatest of evils. And shall we hesitatingly doubt that Providence, having done so much in so short a period, will shorten his purposes in behalf of that unhappy race of men? We cannot; it would be impiety in the extreme, educated as I have been in opposition to slavery. For, "I would not hold a slave for all the gold that sinews, bought or sold, have ever earned." And could I believe the vote I am now about to give would add one more in number to that miserable unhappy race, I would rather perish than it should be uttered. Let us not deceive ourselves. I much doubt whether justice or humanity will be subserved by rejecting this compromise. It has been contended by gentlemen on this floor that slavery, so far from strengthening, has a tendency to weaken those Governments that admit it. Does our desire to circumscribe it wholly within its present limits manifest friendly or fraternal feelings? Has the language used in this debate been of that conciliatory character that tends to harmonize and strengthen the bonds of union? With pain I have heard language that harrows up the feelings of the soul; expressions hostile to the interest of a large portion of the members of this great community. From the North invidious comparisons have been drawn between the Northern and Southern sections, in that ever-memorable contest whose glorious results have bestowed on us the proud privileges of here legislating. Forever perish those odious recriminations! There was no well-fought field in which we have not stood shoulder to shoulder; no battle ground in which our blood has not mingled in common together.

In that great political strife which so long agitated the councils of the nation, and at times threatened to tear asunder the social compact, have our friends of the South ever deceived us? Have they not, at all times, supported the cause of republican principles? In our last war, commenced for aggressions on our maritime rights, States the least commercial were behind none in their patriotic devotion to their country. Kentucky poured forth her best blood at the River Raisin; she conquered at the Thames. The brave and gallant troops of Kentucky and Tennessee repelled the most powerful invasion of the enemy, and, by that victory, erected a trophy to their patriotism as durable as the stream of that great father of rivers; whilst others, the most commercial, shrunk ingloriously from the contest. In drawing the cordon of restriction around the present slaveholding States, are we not violating their rights, increasing their apprehensions, and weakening their moral force? This is not christian charity; it will not ameliorate the condition of the slave; it lightens no burdens; it soothes no pang of his agonized bosom. It appears more like putting in practice the abominable doctrines of Malthus, of reducing their numbers by curtailing their means of subsistence. As you weaken the powers of the master, you increase the infuriated passions of the slave. Fear is the parent of tyranny, and despotism originates from the apprehension of personal security. Having had the honor to be one of the committee of conference, I am convinced it is the only alternative; it is a conciliatory compromise, by which the non-slaveholding States gain much. By rescinding the restriction on Missouri, slavery is abolished forever over a tract of country that is ten times as extensive. And, shall the march of emigration continue to progress westward as heretofore, that wide-spread region will, in a few years, teem with the most enterprising, industrious, intelligent population the world has ever witnessed. And, in yielding the question in the spirit of conciliatory reciprocity, to whom do we concede it but to our brethren? Should we now, numerically, carry the question, it will be a victory snatched from our brothers. Oh! it will be an inglorious triumph, gained at the hazard of the Union. Humanity shudders at the thought. National policy forbids it. It is an act at which no good man will rejoice, no friend of his country can approve. Sir, a number on the part of the majority have openly and repeatedly acknowledged the justness, the propriety, the necessity, of a compromise, and their willingness to adopt it. Should the question of Maine be separated from that of Missouri, they do not object to the principle, but to the manner of effecting their object. And shall we hesitate to effect so desirable an event merely from objections as to form?

And when we return to our constituents, and, with anxious solicitude, they inquire, what have you done for the distressed situation of agriculture? we must answer, nothing: the embarrassments of commerce? nothing: for our mouldering, sinking, ruined manufactures? nothing. The resources of the Government are lessening; the arm of national industry palsied; the whole body politic is seized with a paralysis. Refuse the compromise, and this arena of the national council becomes the theatre of discord. Hesitancy displaces mutual confidence; we doubt each others' motives; distrust each others' views. Objects adverse, produce opposing results; reciprocity of interest destroyed, fraternity of feeling perishes. I much fear, reject the present overture, and the moral cement of the body politic is dissolved; the ligaments of this powerful Confederacy are torn asunder, and this fair and promising experiment of free government, created by the wisdom, sacrifices, and patriotism of our fathers, once divided, a general disintegration ensues. An awful responsibility at this moment rests upon us.

Sir, I stand here as the representative of a State, every member of which is feelingly alive to every subject connected with the interests, the advancement, the consolidation of the Union. Our constituents have reposed in us their most important trusts; and, whatever may be the objects of a few, the great whole expects that we this day will do our duty; and shall we now betray that high confidence—smother the powerful convictions arising from existing circumstances, and shrink from responsibility? No, sir; I cannot, will not, desert what I conceive their highest interests, from the apprehensions of their disapprobation. Their suffrages have placed me in a situation to investigate causes and calculate effects; to trace through all its sinuosities, this, more than all others, most important question.

However my constituents may differ with me in opinion, such are the convictions on my mind, and confident I am, my God, my conscience, and my country, will approve the act. It is a portentous period, in which we ought to be ready to sacrifice our prejudices, our popularity, nay, life itself, on the altar of our country's good.

Mr. STEVENS, of Connecticut, said, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to obtain the floor, a favor I have sought six weeks; but heretofore without success. The unpleasant result has been, I have been compelled reluctantly to record my vote in all the questions taken on the bill under consideration without the very common privilege of recording my reasons for giving such vote. It is perfectly easy to conceive the difficulty in which one is involved by such a train of adverse circumstances; we frequently wonder at an opinion expressed, and condemn the author; but on hearing the reasons for his opinion reverse our own;—whether this would have been my case if I had succeeded in getting a chance to explain my motives will never be known; because I did not obtain that opportunity.

In this question of compromise now to be decided, I am more fortunate, I now have the floor, and must avail myself of this first opportunity to state explicitly that I have listened with pain to the very long protracted debate that has been had on this unfortunate question; I call it unfortunate, sir, because it has drawn forth the worst passions of man in the course of the discussion. I have heard gentlemen, and I must in candor say gentlemen on both sides of the question, boast of sectional prowess, and of sectional achievements; and remind gentlemen from opposite sections of the Union, that they had not so fought and so conquered; or left such conclusion irresistibly to follow.

I want, and manifest public good requires, that the reverse of this language should be holden. Let each gentleman boast the valor of the inhabitants of an opposite section of the Union, then all get the praise due them, and in a way infinitely more acceptable to gentlemen of becoming modesty; and surely if any people ever merited all the praise that has been arrogated instead of being bestowed, the American people do. But it is not the inhabitants of any section of America that exclusively merit all their exalted praise; but the Union collectively. In casting my eye over the map of my country, I scarcely discover a spot on it but is rendered memorable as the birth place of some sage, hero, or philosopher; if these occur most frequently in Connecticut it is very well—if most frequently in some other State, very well; it is still my country. Shall I forego every joy of my life because the immortal WASHINGTON was not born in that State, of very circumscribed limits, in which I was born? Preposterous thought! He was born in America. That is enough for me. His glory reaches us, bottomed on merit, and scorns the proffered aid of mouldering marble to perpetuate it.

If the deadliest enemy this country has, or ever had, could dictate language the most likely to destroy your glory, prosperity, and happiness, would it not be precisely what has been so profusely used in this debate—sectional vaunting? Most undoubtedly it would. If the fell Spirit of Discord, the prime mover of sedition and rebellion in the heavenly realms, should rack his hellish invention for the same malicious purpose, he would undoubtedly pull the cord of sectional prowess; he would magnify the valorous deeds of each particular State or party division, and distort or obliterate all the rest. The arch planner of the first sedition and rebellion must for ever despair of improving on the sad invention.

But, sir, gentlemen start at the mention—Why do this? You hold your seats by the tenure of compromise. The Constitution is a creature of compromise; it originated in a compromise; and has existed ever since by a perpetual extension and exercise of that principle; and must continue to do so, as long as it lasts.

When your Convention met for its formation, they immediately discovered that the general welfare, the object of their solicitude, could not be secured and perpetuated, without giving up something like particular rights; and this giving up of particular rights, to secure the great end and object of their meeting, was called a compromise.

What did they do? They debated some months, and then came to the obviously necessary result—compromise. It was plainly seen then as now that, to obtain the object sought, it was necessary to make some sacrifices and to assume some evils. They thus thought the good sought was worth the sacrifices necessary to obtain it; and now, after thirty years' successful experience, who dare arraign their wisdom or their patriotism? Rashness itself must forever remain dumb to this demand.

If gentlemen are in favor of any compromise, it is a fit time to discuss that subject, and see if any can be hit on that will give general satisfaction.

I am in favor of a compromise, but have strong objections to that now under consideration. I greatly fear it would tend to perpetuate the evil we seek to remedy. The south line of Pennsylvania State and the Ohio waters now form the boundary line between the two parties. If you continue that line by the 36° 30' of north latitude, to the Pacific ocean, I fear it will not prove a pacific measure. This would be to place on your records a perpetual rallying place for party.

It is devoutly to be wished that such compromise might be hit on as would forever put an end to the unhappy existence of parties in their present shape. I should prefer a prohibition of the admission of slaves, into that State, as a measure the most likely to effect that desirable object. The number already there is not so great now as to be a subject of any great uneasiness to those most opposed to the continuance of slavery.

Few gentlemen have risen in debate on this question, without deeply lamenting (and I think with great reason) the existence of parties, designated by geographical lines and boundaries. I also deprecate it, as being a division of the Union into parties so equal in number, wealth, intelligence, and extent of territory. Indeed, sir, there is no view of this unhappy division of our country, but must be sickening to the patriot, and in direct violation of the dictate of wisdom and the last, though not least, important advice of the father and friend of his country. He forbids the use of the words Northern and Southern, Atlantic and Western, as descriptive of the various parts of your country.

And will you forget so important an injunction, from that man, in so short a time? Was there no political wisdom in the command? If none, why has it been so long venerated? I should prefer a compromise forbidding the importation of any more slaves into the State of Missouri. This, I think, would allay party feelings, drive into forgetfulness present feuds, and satisfy my friends to the North and East, with whom I have acted, and delight to act. In common with them, I have an hereditary dislike to slavery, strengthened by a residence all my life, to the present time, in a country where it does not exist. I honor their dislike of slavery, and firmly believe there is not a gentleman in this House but deprecates its existence. Agreeing in this all-important point, let us not separate because we cannot think precisely alike of the means best calculated to eradicate it. Was it ever known that a body so numerous thought exactly alike throughout any one grand, all-important measure for public good, in all the detail? And is not the circumstance of a division in sentiment in so large a body, so equal in point of number, a thing that should lead both to suspect they may be wrong? Gentlemen who have much property of this sort, I agree, are deeply interested; but candor must at the same time admit they have, from the fact of being slaveholders, much practical and useful knowledge on this subject that cannot be claimed by non-slaveholders. And this knowledge is extremely useful, not to say indispensable, especially as to the extent of the evil to the slaves and to the community generally. This knowledge is indispensable when it is sought to effect emancipation, on terms the best calculated to insure infallible success, and to effect it in a way the least likely to hazard any destructive revolution that might, in unskilful hands, insure more evil than the good intended. If we admit slaveholders to have more knowledge on this subject, than, from the nature of the case, we can have, their voice in council should not be entirely unheeded.

But, sir, we have now arrived at a point at which every gentleman agrees something must be done. A precipice lies before us, at which perdition is inevitable. Gentlemen on both sides of this question, and in both Houses, in doors and out of doors, have evinced a determination that augurs ill of the high destinies of this country? And who does not tremble for the consequences?

I do not here speak of that feeling which results from an apprehension of personal danger. No, sir; I speak of that feeling which agitates the soul of every patriot when his country is in danger. I speak of that feeling, without a susceptibility of which a man is no ornament to any country. I wish not to be misunderstood, sir. I don't pretend to say that in just five calendar months your Union will be at an end; your Constitution destroyed; your proud trophies, won in the most valiant combat, profaned; glories of half a century, gained by yourselves and your departed friends, and unequalled in the history of any country or people on the face of the earth, made the sport of an envying world; and all this in a sacrilegious contest, at the end of which no wise man would give a pea-straw for his choice on which side to be found, as the victors would have lost all, and the vanquished have nothing left to excite envy.

But, sir, I do say, and for the verity of the remark cite the lamentable history of our own time, that the result of a failure to compromise at this time, in the way now proposed, or in some other way satisfactory to both, would be to create ruthless hatred, irradicable jealousy, and a total forgetfulness of the ardor of patriotism, to which, as it has heretofore existed, we owe, under providence, more solid national glory and social happiness than ever before was possessed by any people, nation, kindred, or tongue, under Heaven.

However devoutly it is to be wished that men, under the keen anguish of disappointment and mortification, were wise, patriotic, moderate, and obedient to the laws, we have no reason to expect it. A very recent example of the base lengths of depravity to which men suffer their party madness to carry them, and at a time too when the country is in the deepest distress, will forever forbid us to cherish this vain hope. Not according entirely in sentiment with the proposed compromise, and with the hope of obtaining a better by a free communication of sentiment, (and when I say better I do not mean better for any particular part of the Union, but better for the whole,) I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MERCER followed on the same side, with great earnestness; and had spoken about half an hour, when he was compelled by indisposition to resume his seat.

The previous question was then called; and the House having sustained the call by 103 votes, the main question was put on concurring with the Senate in striking out of the bill the slavery restriction on the State of Missouri, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 90, nays 87, as follows:

The question was then stated on the second amendment of the Senate, when—

Mr. TAYLOR moved to amend the amendment by striking out the words "thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude," and inserting a line which would exclude slavery from all the territory west of the Mississippi, except Louisiana, Missouri, and Arkansas.

The previous question was again demanded, and again sustained by a majority of the House. The effect of the previous question being to exclude the question on the amendment, and to bring it back to the main question—

The main question was taken on concurring with the Senate in inserting in the bill, in lieu of the State restriction, the clause inhibiting slavery in the territory north of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude, and was decided in the affirmative—yeas 134, nays 42, as follows:

The amendment to the title to add the words "and to prohibit slavery in certain Territories," was then also concurred in. And so, all the amendments being concurred in, the bill was passed by the two Houses.

FRIDAY, March 3.

The Journal of the proceedings of the House on yesterday being read—

Mr. RANDOLPH rose and intimated an intention now to move the House to reconsider their vote of yesterday, by which they concurred with the Senate in striking the restriction from the Missouri bill.

The SPEAKER declared the motion out of order until the ordinary business of the morning, as prescribed by the rules of the House, should be disposed of. From which opinion of the Chair, Mr. RANDOLPH appealed.

The question being taken on the correctness of the decision, it was affirmed by the House.

The House then proceeded in receiving and referring petitions; when, petitions being called for from the members from Virginia—

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the House retain in their possession the Missouri bill, until the period should arrive, when, according to rules of the House, a motion to reconsider the vote of yesterday on concurring in the first amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill aforesaid, should be in order.

The SPEAKER declared this motion out of order, for the reason assigned on the first application of Mr. RANDOLPH on this day.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the petition of James Shields, accompanied with a bill for his relief; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole, to-morrow.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to continue in force the act, entitled "An act to protect the commerce of the United States, and punish the crime of piracy;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act regulating the Post Office Establishment,'" reported the same without amendment; and it was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate ask a further conference upon the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill of this House, entitled "An act providing for the admission of the State of Maine into the Union," to which they have appointed managers on their part.

MARCH, 1820.

Question of Privilege—Petition of Swiss Emigrants.

H. OF R.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider, the said message; whereupon, it was resolved, That this House do agree to the further conference asked by the Senate upon the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes on the amendments depending to the said bill.

Ordered, That Messrs. HOLMES, HILL, and TAYLOR, be appointed managers at the said conference on the part of this House.

Mr. HOLMES, from the managers on the part of this House to attend a further conference with the managers on the part of the Senate, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments depending to the bill, entitled "An act for the admission of the State of Maine into the Union," made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Walter Channing," in which they ask the concurrence of this House. The Senate concur in the report of the last committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act providing for the admission of the State of Maine into the Union," viz: That the Senate recede from the said amendments, and that the said bill be amended by striking out the word "next," and inserting, in lieu thereof, the words, "in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty," in which amendment they ask the concurrence of this House.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider, the said message; whereupon—

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the bill be indefinitely postponed, and proceeded at considerable length to offer his reasons for wishing to prevent its passage; when Mr. R. was called to order, by Mr. LIVERMORE, for deviating from the question under debate.

The SPEAKER decided that Mr. RANDOLPH was not out of order.

Mr. LIVERMORE appealed from the decision of the Chair, but before the question was put—

Mr. RANDOLPH withdrew his motion for the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The conference was then agreed to, and soon after Mr. HOLMES reported the amendment as above stated, which was agreed to by the House, and the bill was thus finally acted on.

The bill from the Senate entitled "An act for the relief of Walter Channing," was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Frederick Goetz and Carl W. Westphal, and the heirs of Abraham Neppes, deceased," was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The engrossed bill, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to appoint a receiver of public moneys, and a register of the land office, for the district of Laurence county, in the Territory of Arkansas," was read the third time and passed.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. RANDOLPH, being in the majority on that question, moved the House now to reconsider their vote of yesterday, in which they concurred in the first amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, which was to strike out the slavery restriction.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, seconded the motion.

The SPEAKER, having ascertained the fact, stated to the House, that the proceedings of the House on that bill yesterday, had been communicated to the Senate, by the Clerk, and that the bill not being in possession of the House, the motion to reconsider could not be entertained.

Whereupon, Mr. RANDOLPH submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That, in carrying the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the people of the Territory of Missouri to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," after a member from Virginia had given notice of his intention to move a reconsideration of the question decided last evening, in which the said member, viz. Mr. Randolph, voted in the majority on one of the amendments of the Senate thereto, the Clerk is guilty of a breach of the privileges of a member of this House under the rules thereof.

And the question being put whether the House would now consider the said resolution; it was decided in the negative—yeas 61, nays 71.

Mr. RANDOLPH then submitted the following proposition, which lies on the table.

"That so much of the thirty-seventh rule as allows a reconsideration of any question by motion of any member of the majority on such question, on the day succeeding that on which such question be taken, be expunged."

On motion of Mr. GROSS, of New York—

Ordered, That when the House adjourns, it will adjourn to meet again on Monday next.

PETITION OF SWISS EMIGRANTS.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the petition of Charles Henry du Pasquier, and others, Swiss emigrants in the United States; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House. The report is as follows.

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of Charles Henry du Pasquier and others, praying, on behalf of themselves and other Swiss emigrants, that Congress would authorize them to purchase a tract of the public land, lying on the west side of the Mississippi, and between the 30th and 37th degrees of north latitude, sufficient for the settlement of three or four thousand families on terms more favorable than the general laws would permit, have had the same under consideration, and report that the question presented to the consideration of the House involves the expediency of selling the public lands to foreigners on terms more indulgent than those which regulate the sales to native citizens. This committee is very sensible, that the mildness of our Government, its wise and wholesome laws, have produced an emigration, which has gone far to increase the collective talents and industry of the country; some of our most distinguished citizens, as well as most industrious and ingenious mechanics, are among those who have made this country their own, by adoption. But it is thought, that, while we highly appreciate these benefits, we should not change the operation of the general laws of our country to produce the effect. So long as the freedom of our institutions is preserved, and wholesome laws are permitted to have their ordinary effect, the inducements which have heretofore had their influence, will still be sufficiently strong to produce the desired emigration. It cannot be conceded that special provisions, excepting foreigners, however meritorious, from the operation of general laws, and giving them advantages which are denied to the citizens, can be founded in good policy. It is a peculiarity eminently honorable to our country, that the native of Europe possesses, in the acquisition of the soil here, the same advantages which an American citizen does; to give him more, would produce a distinction not only invidious, but most unjust. When the law is now equally open to both, it would be a perverted use of charity to give to the stranger a facility which we deny to the citizen.

It is probable that, during the present session of Congress, the mode of selling the public lands will be so far altered as to demand a cash payment of each purchaser. Every reason which could influence Congress to make that change, would forbid this committee from proposing to sell a large quantity on a credit still more distant than the present laws contemplate. If the public interests should be thought to require a system still more rigorous than the one which now prevails, and this too against petitions of a great number of your citizens, and the memorials of the legislatures of several of the Southern and Western States, it would indeed be an assumption of high responsibility on the part of this committee to recommend, in obedience to the prayer of the present petitioners, that indulgence to them, which the expected bill will deny to your own citizens.

The establishment of a community of foreigners within our country, secluded by their habits, manners, and language, from an intimate association with the great body of our citizens, cannot be an event so desirable as to justify a departure from the general law. An unrestrained intercourse with the body of the American yeomanry affords to the emigrant the best and probably the only means of acquiring an intimate knowledge of our laws and institutions; a knowledge which is not only necessary to give to him the full enjoyment of his situation, but is necessary to render him a valuable and safe citizen to the Commonwealth. It is believed that, if a large settlement was formed, exclusively of foreign families, to most of whom, our language would of course be unknown, many years would elapse before that general intercourse would take place, beyond the boundaries of their own community, which would be essential to give to them full possession of American principles and character; and it is by no means certain that time would in such cases ever have the effect of entirely destroying their foreign character. While, then, this committee rejoice in every opportunity of communicating the blessings of their country to their European brothers, they believe that it can be safely done, only when they enjoy them by indiscriminate association.

The petitioners have (many of them) been heretofore engaged in manufactures; and they rely for much of the support, which they expect to receive, upon the stock of manufacturing skill and industry which they promise to introduce. They have exhibited before the committee some beautiful and very satisfactory specimens of their ingenuity and skill, particularly in silk and cotton goods. Your committee felt the full force of this appeal, and very frankly state, that, if any petition of a similar character can be acceptable to the House, this deserves to be so. Without referring to the known character of the Swiss peasantry, a settlement in the State of Indiana, of emigrants from Switzerland, gives strong evidence that a colony, established under the auspices of the present petitioners, would be characterized by industry and unoffending submission to the laws. They resist the application, however, on the grounds they have stated. The terms of sale held out by the present laws are of the most indulgent kind; and if the public interest should even justify a relaxation from them, it is confidently believed that it should be in favor of American citizens.

In answer to that part of the petition which declares that one of the principal objects is "the domestic manufacture of cotton, wool, flax, and silk," the committee will only say, that it may well be considered, how far it would comport with sound policy to give a premium for the introduction of manufacturers, at the moment when, by the almost unanimous declaration of our manufacturers, it is said they cannot live without further protection.

The committee therefore recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

RULES OF THE HOUSE.

On the motion of Mr. LOWNDES, the House proceeded to consider the amendment offered by him on the 28th ultimo to the rules of the House—the amendment offered thereto by Mr. RANDOLPH, being still under consideration.

Mr. LOWNDES advocated his proposition, and opposed the amendment offered to it, at considerable length.

Mr. PINDALL, moved to refer the present propositions, together with his motion of the 1st ultimo concerning stenographers, &c., to the Committee of Elections, to consider and report thereon. This motion was lost.

Mr. RANDOLPH then moved the indefinite postponement of the whole subject.

On this motion a debate of nearly three hours continuance took place, in which the merits of the original proposition were chiefly discussed. Mr. RANDOLPH spoke an hour and a half against the proposition as submitted by Mr. LOWNDES. It was opposed by Messrs. JOHNSON, WARFIELD, and MEIGS, and was advocated by the mover, and by Messrs. WOOD, CLARKE, and SOUTHWARD.

The question on the postponement was negatived—yeas 70, nays 74.

Mr. RANDOLPH then, willing to let the original motion stand or fall on its own merits, withdrew his amendment.

After some further debate, in which Messrs. JOHNSON and BROWN opposed the proposition, and Messrs. COOK and BRUSH advocated it, the question was stated on agreeing to the motion, in the following words:

"And if any member shall not confine himself to the question under debate, and shall be called to order, if the decision of the Speaker of the House upon appeal, be against the member thus deviating from the question, such member shall not be, at that time, permitted to proceed, without the special leave of the House."

And it was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

MONDAY, March 6.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill to provide for continuing in force (without limit) the act to provide for persons disabled by known wounds received in the Revolutionary war. The bill also contains a provision requiring the agents for paying pensions to give bond in $5,000 each, for the faithful performance of the duties enjoined upon them. It was proposed that this bill be forthwith ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; but that course was overruled, and the bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was recommitted the bill in addition to the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, reported the same, with an amendment; which, together with the said bill, was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Joseph Bruce, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Bowie and Kurtz, and others," made a report thereon, recommending that the said bill be postponed indefinitely.—Laid on the table.

Mr. Hooks, from the committee appointed on the subject, reported a bill for the relief of Ann McIntire, widow and administratrix of Andrew McIntire, deceased; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. SLOCUMB submitted a resolution, authorizing the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives to close this session by adjournment of their respective Houses on the — day of — next. And, at the instance of the mover, the said resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COCKE submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the Naval Establishment of the United States.

Mr. COCKE made a few remarks, in the course of which he stated his object to be to effect a reduction of expense, by a reduction in the number of officers of the Navy, so as to proportion them more equally to the number of vessels in commission. It was to this point only that he wished to call the attention of the Naval Committee.

The House having agreed to consider the motion, by a vote of 67 to 63, it was then, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, with the consent of the mover, ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. COCKE, it was then

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House copies of all contracts which have been made for the building or repairing fortifications, arsenals, or magazines, since the year 1815; and also that he report the amount of moneys actually paid, to whom, and when, and whether public notice was actually given of said contracts, and what surety was given, in what amount, and whether the surety is still solvent; and whether the contracts have been faithfully performed.

On motion of Mr. MCCOY, the Committee on Private Land Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the location of unsatisfied warrants, (issued to the troops of the Virginia State line, for services during the Revolutionary war,) on some of the unappropriated lands of the United States.

On motion of Mr. RANKIN, the Committee on Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a port of entry at the mouth of Pearl river, in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. PINDALL moved that the House do now proceed to consider the resolution submitted by him on the 1st of February last, proposing an amendment to the rules of the House, in relation to the admission of stenographers within the Hall. And, on the question, Will the House now proceed to consider the said resolution? it was determined in the negative.

Mr. BRUSH moved that the House do now proceed to consider the resolution submitted by him on the 23d ultimo, proposing an inquiry into the expediency of designating and marking the northern boundary of the State of Ohio. And, on the question, Will the House now proceed to consider the said resolution? it was determined in the negative.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act regulating the Post Office Establishment,'" was read the third time, and passed.

NAVY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the current year.

On this bill a rather interesting but desultory debate took place, which employed the time of the Committee till past four o'clock. The speakers were, in succession, Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, JOHNSON, STORRS, CLAY, LOWNDES, TRIMBLE, MEIGS, FOOT, SILSBEE, COBB, and FULLER.

Towards the close of the debate, Mr. CLAY moved that "it be recommended to the House to recommit to the Committee of Ways and Means the bill entitled, &c., (the appropriation bill,) with instructions to prepare the same in reference to an occasional, instead of a permanent employment of the squadron in the Mediterranean."

After debate, this motion was negatived, and the Committee rose and reported the bill, with the following appropriations therein, viz:

For pay and subsistence of the officers, and pay of the seamen, $989,320.

For provisions $415,187.

For medicines, hospital stores, and all expenses on account of the sick, including the marine corps, $36,000.

For repairs of vessels, $484,000.

For contingent expenses, $140,000.

For improvement of navy yards, docks, and wharves, pay of superintendents, store-keepers, clerks, and laborers, $100,000.

For pay and subsistence of the marine corps, $177,222.

For clothing the same, $27,205.

For military stores, $1,000.

For the contingent expenses of the same, $20,000.

And, before considering the same, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 7.

Mr. SILSBEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of suspending, for a limited time, so much of the standing appropriation of $1,000,000 for the increase of the Navy as may be consistent with the public service, &c., made a report, the purport of which is, that, after due inquiry, they believe that true economy and the best interests of the nation are opposed to a suspension, even for a limited time, of any portion of the sum annually appropriated for the gradual increase of the Navy; and that they have not been able to ascertain where any essential reduction can be made in the expenses of the Navy, without reducing the establishment.

The report was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing the information required by the resolution of the 20th of January last, of the amount of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, imposed, levied, and collected, in the District of Columbia, by order of the circuit court of the United States for said District, for each year, from the year 1801 to 1819; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House another letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting statements showing the state of the Bank of the United States on the 25th of February, 1819, the 27th of May, and the 29th of November last, made in obedience to the resolution of the 2d instant; which was also ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of War, on the petition of William Lawrence; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. WOODBRIDGE, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision for the more convenient execution of the laws within the Territory of Michigan.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, of New York, the Committee of Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of building a lighthouse at or near the mouth of Genesee river, on Lake Ontario.

Mr. PINDALL moved that the House do now proceed to consider the resolution submitted by him on the 1st of February last, proposing an amendment to the rules of the House in relation to the admission of stenographers within the Hall. And, on the question, Will the House now proceed to consider the said resolution? it was determined in the negative.

Mr. SLOCUMB moved that the House do now consider the joint resolution submitted by him yesterday, to fix a day for the termination of the present session of Congress. And, on the question, Will the House proceed to consider the said resolution? it was also determined in the negative.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill from this House, entitled "An act to provide for taking the fourth census, or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, and for other purposes," with amendments.

The have also passed bills of the following titles, viz:

An act authorizing the Secretary of State to issue letters patent to Richard Wilcox; An act for the relief of Francis B. Languille; and An act for the relief of John Pellett; in which amendments and bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

NAVY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the bill making the annual appropriations for the support of the Navy.

MARCH, 1820.

Military Appropriations.

II. of R.

Mr. COBB moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions so to amend it, as to reduce the appropriation for every branch of the service one-fourth.

This motion produced a debate, in the course of which it was supported by the mover, and Messrs. WARFIELD and CULPEPER, and opposed by Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, SMITH, of North Carolina, TRIMBLE, JOHNSON, FOOT, HOLMES, WOOD, and LOWNDES.

Mr. JOHNSON, desirous to postpone this and the other appropriation bills until the amount of the deficit in the Treasury was ascertained, and the deficit supplied, moved to strike out the proposed instruction to the committee, so as to leave the question one of recommitment merely. This motion was negatived.

The question was then taken on Mr. COBB's motion, and negatived, 15 or 20 members only rising in favor of it.

The report of the Committee of the Whole was then agreed to, and the bill, as it stands, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

WEDNESDAY, March 8.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Jeremiah and David Hunt, and Joseph Forman, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill for the relief of the heirs of Abijah Hunt and William Gordon Forman; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: 1. An act authorizing the Secretary of State to issue letters patent to Richard Wilcox; 2. An act for the relief of Francis B. Languille; and 3. An act for the relief of John Pellett; were severally read twice, and referred, the first to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill of this House of the same title, and the two latter to the Committee of Claims.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for taking the fourth census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, and for other purposes," were read, and concurred in by the House.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act making appropriation for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1820," was read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States.

[To the same Committee was to-day referred the bill "respecting the Military Establishment."]

The last mentioned bill was first taken up, and, having been read—

Mr. CANNON moved to strike out all the first section of the bill excepting the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

"That the Military Peace Establishment of the United States shall consist of such proportions of artillery, engineers, infantry and riflemen, as the President of the United States shall judge proper to retain in service, not exceeding in the whole, including officers, non-commissioned officers and privates, five thousand."

Mr. CANNON said, he had submitted this proposition to the consideration of the Committee, under the presumption that we would continue to enjoy the relations of peace and tranquillity with all nations with whom we had any kind of intercourse. This he had presumed from the silence of the Committee of Foreign Relations on the subject. He himself had, as yet, seen no probability of this country's being, in any short time, involved in war with any nation, although he had not inquired of the Committee of Foreign Relations to know what information they had, or what opinions they might entertain, as respected the relation of this country with any foreign Power. He said it might appear a little astonishing to the people of this country that, notwithstanding the vast revenue that had been brought into the public Treasury, from various sources, since the termination of the late war, to find that we are unable to meet the current demands against the Government; that such has been the extravagance of our public expenditures on this Military Establishment, as well as others equally as useless or unnecessary, that there now seems to be a deficit to the amount of five millions of dollars, and this too during a time when we are enjoying the most perfect peace and boasted prosperity. This seems to be admitted by all to be the situation in which we are now placed. We must borrow money or issue Treasury notes, either of which is an increase of the public debt, or lay taxes on the people, neither of which he was willing to do to keep up an army that was wholly unnecessary during a time of peace.

Sir said he, this state of things is what I have long since anticipated. It is what I knew must happen in consequence of the course of policy that has been pursued, and it was to avoid this state of things that he had advocated the reduction of the Army to five thousand, immediately after the return of peace. He said he then had the honor of a seat in the House, and it would be recollected by all those who were also members at the time he alluded to, that the reduction was then carried in the House of Representatives, down as low as the number he now proposed. The Senate, however, refused to reduce it lower than fifteen thousand, and that it was ultimately settled and left at ten thousand, by way of what is called a compromise between the two Houses. He said he had again felt it is his duty to make an effort to reduce the regular Army of the United States while a member of the Fourteenth Congress. Indeed, he had always been opposed to a large standing army in time of peace. He did not believe the regular Army could be called the main strength of the country, at any time. He hoped it never would be thought so by the people of this Government.

Sir, said he, I cannot believe that the reduction of the Army, in time of peace, is diminishing the strength of the Government; but, on the contrary, he believed it would increase its strength and insure its permanency. This Government, he said, was formed by the people; it was made for the benefit of all, and not a few, who may obtain offices under it; and it is to the people composing the Government that you are to look in time of danger—to the militia of the States and of the United States; and, so long as you retain this Government in its original purity, just so long will it be supported and defended by the people; but whenever you abandon these principles the people will abandon you. Sir, you never can look to any other source for the protection and defence of this Government. You have looked to the people heretofore in times of war, or difficulty, and danger, and you never have looked to them in vain, and I venture nothing when I say you never will look to them in vain.

He said he would not inquire into the capacity of the country to support such an army as we now had, for that was not the proper inquiry to be made. He said the proper inquiry on this subject was, whether or not such an army was necessary for the good of the country in time of peace? Nor would he inquire what was to be the situation of those who were to be disbanded from the service in the event the reduction he proposed should be made. He went on the ground that the Government should retain no person in service, in any office, that was entirely unnecessary. When it became necessary the Government had a right to call into its service any individual, indeed every one, and none should be retained longer than their services were necessary. Because some of the officers of the Army would be left out of the public employment, and would be thrown into a worse situation than they now enjoy, is not an argument with me sufficient to retain this expensive and useless establishment. Had this reduction been made at the time he always thought it ought to have been made—on the return of peace—or even afterwards, when he himself had proposed it, we should have avoided the state of things that we are now compelled to meet—the resort to loans, Treasury notes, or taxes; neither of which he, for one, was willing to adopt. His course of policy, in times of peace, he said, was to retrench the expenditures until he brought them entirely within the means of the revenue of the country. This he would do, not only by reducing the Army, but there were other establishments also, on which he would retrench, and some of which he would abolish. He alluded to the Military Academy at West Point, in the State of New York, on which the Government had already expended millions of money for the benefit of a few favorites of the most wealthy of our country.

Mr. Chairman, we all know that an individual, a citizen, a planter, or farmer, of your country, who expends largely every year over and above the amount he really makes, is in the broad road to ruin and bankruptcy, and so it is with a government. I can perceive no difference, more especially during a time of peace and tranquillity, when, instead of running more and more in debt, as we have done, we ought to be endeavoring, as speedily as possible, to pay off the public debts we have already incurred during a state of war. But, Mr. C. said while he entered his most solemn protest against the doctrine of standing armies, in time of peace, he would also beg leave to say, that he had entertained some doubts and fears respecting the course of policy we were pursuing in regard to our Navy. He had, he said, in common not only with the members of Congress, but also with the people of the whole United States, yielded to the impulse which had been given (and which, he believed, was yet in a great degree felt) by the many gallant and glorious achievements which had been acquired by that species of our force during the late war. So great was its influence at that time, that he believed there was not a single individual in Congress, and he knew of none anywhere else who raised their voice against a rapid increase of the Navy. He said he himself had given his voice most cordially in favor of the measure appropriating eight millions to the increase of the Navy, to be applied to its increase at the rate of one million each year. But, since then, he had often been led to doubt the policy of the course that he himself, as well as others, had pursued in regard to our Navy, which he believed, to a certain extent, would always be found useful to the country.

He said he most decidedly concurred with the honorable gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. COBB,) in some of the views he took while speaking on this subject yesterday; he feared we were increasing the establishment too rapidly. He thought it probably would have been better in the end, if the application of this eight millions to the increase of the navy had been more gradual. He said he was not now opposed to the amount that was appropriated; he was in favor of that sum at that time, and was yet; but he thought, if, instead of applying it in eight years, as was then determined on, it had been applied to the same object in twelve or sixteen years, it would have been better. He rather thought that five hundred thousand dollars a year would have been sufficient to keep pace with the wealth and population of our country. But, said he, in making these remarks, I must not be understood to be in the slightest degree opposed to this establishment, or to its increase in such way as is commensurate with the means of our country. This would be my course of policy. The other course which we have all been pursuing, is, I fear, to result in the most fatal consequences. Its rapid increase will soon bring it to that size which would make it burdensome to the nation, and a permanent system of taxation must then be resorted to in order to support it. This, he believed, would not be borne by the people very cheerfully in times of peace, however willing they are to bear any burdens in time of war. Nor, sir, said he, am I prepared to say that the people of the United States ought to submit to great burdens of taxation in times of peace, to keep up an overgrown and expensive establishment of any kind for defence in time of war. He thought the people of the United States ought to look to themselves, as their own defenders, and their country's defenders too, in time of war. He thought that any course of policy that was calculated to draw the attention of the people to a regular standing army or a navy, as a force to be entirely relied on for defence in time of war, was a dangerous and unsafe policy, contrary to the very principles of our government, and ought never to be attempted to be held out to the people. The Government, he said, was formed for the benefit of the people; therefore, its preservation and defence must rest in their hands; and while he always admitted the utility of a navy, and even a regular army, as an auxiliary force, he never had viewed either, or both combined together, to be sufficient to be considered the main reliance for defence.

Sir, said he, my course of policy, as regards the regular army, is to retain in service as few as possible during a state of peace. Indeed, I believe we could do without any much better than we could with an overgrown, expensive establishment of this kind, notwithstanding I am willing to retain as much of the army as is necessary to occupy those forts and garrisons or fortifications, where our arms and munitions of war ought to be kept and taken care of. I myself am induced to believe that three thousand, properly distributed and properly kept employed, would be amply sufficient for this purpose. But I am, however, willing to retain five thousand, in order to conform to the views of other gentlemen, whose experience and information on this subject is much greater than my own; and I believe it is not in the power of any gentleman to show that a greater number than five thousand is at all necessary in time of peace.

Sir, said he, I cannot give in to the doctrine that we must keep up this regular army of ten thousand in time of peace, in order to acquire or keep up military science. I think it would be better, and a much more correct course of policy for us to pursue, if we undertake to teach military science, and to expend this enormous amount of money for that object, that we should expend it amongst the militia officers of the United States, where the science they might acquire at public expense would be diffused through the whole mass of the people, which cannot nor will not be the case by retaining your regular army. Heretofore the General Government has paid but little attention to the militia. Indeed, it may be said they have been almost entirely neglected: no moneys have been expended to teach them military science, nor will it be done, as I believe, so long as this regular army is made the peculiar favorite on which we determine to expend so much of the public money.

He said he did not like to see the growth of a regular army fostered and cherished by his country, in the manner it had been. He referred to the extent of that army in the year 1803, and compared it with what it is at this time, from which, he said, we might readily estimate its growth in time to come; for, said he, we may expect often to be threatened with wars, and sometimes to be actually involved in war with some of the various foreign Powers with whom we have intercourse; and, if every war is to leave this burden on us, of an increased regular army, to be supported in peace, we may soon expect our Government to leave entirely its first principles, and become as expensive and oppressive as the Governments of Europe; and, rest assured, sir, said he, that, in the same proportion that you increase the burdens on the people, even though you may do it under the pretence of its being necessary for their good, or for their safety, in the same degree you will destroy that zealous attachment and devotion to the Government which has been so eminently displayed in many sections of the United States, during the late contest we have had with a foreign Power.

I lay it down as a correct principle, that that Government which secures to its citizens liberty and independence on the cheapest terms is the best, and always will be held in the highest estimation by the superior intelligence of the people of this country. It will always secure to itself the attachment of the people; and, however necessary government has been found, it is only good to a certain extent, and too much of it is worse than none.

Sir, said he, I very much regret to see so manifest a disposition in favor of a regular army. It was calculated, he feared to prevent any retrenchment on this establishment, also to prevent any thing being done to give arms or discipline to the militia, on which force he would always rely for the preservation of our Government. He did not wish to induce the people of the United States to look to any other force for defence or protection; he wished every man to consider himself the protector and defender of his country; for such, he believed, were some of the principles on which our Government had been formed, and such were the principles he wished to see cherished and preserved.

Mr. Chairman, said he, in deciding what ought to be the extent of the regular army in time of peace, I will not look at all to a state of war, because, in such a state of affairs, any regular army we could have would be entirely incompetent to the defence of the country, however much reliance might be placed on it. I am unwilling to rely on it myself, and I know the people of my country are unwilling to trust their liberty to any force of that description. They think it much safer to take the weapons of war into their own hands, when it becomes necessary, and become their own, as well as their country's defenders.

These, sir, said he, are some of the views which I entertain on this subject; and, fully aware of every feeling that would always be excited on a subject of its kind and importance, he said he had felt it his duty to submit the proposition to the consideration of the House, fully impressed with the most thorough conviction that the policy and interest of our country requires its adoption.

Mr. CLAY avowed himself to be in favor of reducing the Army, in preference to resorting to taxes, loans, or to an invasion of the Sinking Fund, to meet the expenses of the Government—if, on the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, the attitude of the country should not be changed to that of war, or to that which menace war. Meanwhile, he was disposed not to act on the bill now before the Committee, but to defer it for the present, for the purpose of acting on the military appropriation bill. If, after the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations should be made, it should be thought expedient to reduce the Army, the appropriations would shape themselves to what should be the actual force and condition of the Military Establishment. He therefore moved to lay this bill on the table, with a view to take up the appropriation bill.

The question was taken on this motion without debate, and decided in the affirmative.

The bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment, for the current year, was then taken up.

On coming to the appropriation for the support of the Military Academy for the present year.

Mr. CANNON spoke at some length against this appropriation, on the ground of hostility to the institution itself; conceiving that the money levied by taxes on the people, and on the poor as well as the rich, could be better employed than on the gratuitous instruction of a privileged class of youth.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, remarked, that the arguments of the gentleman would well apply to a proposition to abolish this institution, but did not apply with any force to the question in hand, which was not the establishment of the Academy, but the appropriation of money to defray expenses already authorized by law.

Mr. CANNON was so little disposed to continue this establishment, that he was willing to arrest, or at least to reduce, the appropriation. But, in order to get at a proposition to reduce the expense of that establishment, or to abolish it, Mr. C. moved to lay this bill on the table.

After some observation from Mr. STROTHER in opposition to this motion, the question was taken thereon, and decided in the negative.

Mr. CANNON had proposed a sum less than that moved by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means for the support of the Military Academy. So that two questions were presented; the one on a certain sum necessary to the support of the academy as it now stands, and the other on a less sum. The question being taken, according to usage, on the largest amount, it was decided in the affirmative, by a large majority.

Mr. CANNON said, he had entertained some doubts on the policy of keeping up this institution at the public expense; that, in answer to a resolution which he had introduced in the early part of the session, some information had been received from the War Department, from which he had learnt that something like one hundred and fifty thousand dollars was necessary for this institution the present year; that it had been in existence about twenty years, during the whole of which time it had been supported out of the Treasury of the United States, and that it had already cost us some millions of money. This he said, had led him to make some further inquiry about this expensive establishment, which he had heard it said was of so much public utility; and, in order to ascertain more precisely the whole amount of what it had already cost, and also the extent of public good that had been derived from it, he had introduced a second resolution, requiring of the Secretary of War that information which he thought necessary to enable him to form a more correct opinion respecting the benefits that had, or would probably in future, accrue to this nation, by continuing to support this institution. But here, he regretted to have to say, he had been stopped by the decision of the House, which had rejected the resolution, and thereby prevented any further information being obtained on the subject. But, Mr. Chairman, said he, I recollect that some time during the 14th Congress, an honorable gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. ROBERTSON) brought before this House a proposition, the object of which was, to have the orphans of those who had fallen in the defence of their country during the late war, educated at this Military Academy, in preference to any others. I recollect also that this proposition met my warmest approbation; and I well remember the large majority by which it was at the same time rejected, and the benefits still retained for the wealthy part of the community, who, I have no doubt, are at this time enjoying almost exclusively the benefits and advantages of this institution. Nor, sir, have I yet forgotten that, during the present session, a proposition was rejected, which I had submitted to the House, to obtain some further support and protection to the orphans and widows of those gallant men who have fallen in defence of their country during the late war. Thus, sir, you have turned your back on the helpless orphan of your country's defender, while at the same time you are voting thousands for the education of the sons of the most wealthy part of the community; men who are able to educate their sons anywhere, without the assistance of Government. Is this right, I ask? is it just? is it not aristocracy, of the rankest order? For my own part, I can call it nothing else. He said he had made some calculation, from the little information he was allowed to obtain on this subject, from which it would appear that about two thousand dollars is bestowed on each of the cadets, who are admitted to this academy, and receive an education, when you have only given the helpless orphan of the patriot, whose life has been sacrificed in his country's defence, about twenty or thirty dollars each, and have refused to give more, but have left them to perish in infancy, or be supported, as is the case in many instances in our country, by the people of their neighborhood. Sir, said he, what must be the feelings of the patriot, whose blood has flown in his country's cause, when he shall look back on this state of things? Is this agreeable to the principles on which this Government was founded? Is it agreeable to the principles on which any government ought ever to be founded? I think not, said he; on the contrary, I believe it is the duty of this Government to extend support to the orphan of the country's defender, until that orphan shall be able to provide its own means of support. He had thought the Government was for the weak, and not the strong, as seems now to be the case. I have asked, said he, in vain, to know what benefits have been derived by this Government from this expensive Military Academy.

MARCH 1820.

Military Appropriations.

H. OF R.

None have been able to point them out. If you intend to teach military science, it is here only confined to a few, "a privileged order," in our country, who never will, nor never have disseminated any of that science amongst the general mass of the people; and certainly it will not be pretended in this country that we are to confine the military science to such narrow limits; to give it to a few favorites, at the public expense, and refuse it to all others.

Sir, said Mr. C., I believe that our Government has been pursuing the wrong course upon this subject. The military science that has been taught at public expense, he said, ought, in his opinion, to be taught to the officers of the militia, from whom it would be imparted to the citizens generally, the soldiers on whom we must forever depend. This, he said, had never yet been attempted, nor did he believe it ever would be attempted, until this system of privileged military order, and military aristocracy, was pulled down, or put out of existence.

Sir, said he, when you are asked a pittance to support and educate a helpless infant orphan of him whose blood has crimsoned your fields of battle in defence of his country, your ears are deaf to the call, and it is regarded with indifference! But, sir, when thousands are called for, for this Military Academy, (for the benefit of the wealthy,) your sensibilities are awakened, and your feelings are alive to their interests; and numerous advocates are crowding into the debate, and even the emptiness of your Treasury is not an obstacle. What, sir! does this look like the principles of justice and equality? he thought not. He said, he did not intend to go into an inquiry about the manner in which this institution had been conducted, nor any irregularities and misconduct that has been so loudly complained of, and which had loaded our tables with such a mass of pamphlets? nor did he mean to make any reflection on any gentleman, who had heretofore, or might hereafter, obtain the education of his son, or sons, at this Military Academy at the public expense? nor did he mean any reflection on any of the cadets, or young men who had received an education there, or were now enjoying its benefits. He thought, so long as it is kept up at the expense of the Government, that it was fair, and not improper in any individual to enjoy its benefits who has it in his power to do so—for he knew very well, that it was out of the power of the poorest part of the people of our country to obtain any portion of its benefits, and that was one of the strong objections he felt to this institution. It was supported by the funds of the nation—drawn from public lands, and various other sources from which we derive revenue—these funds as much belonged to the poor as to the rich. But when placed in this Military Academy, the benefits cannot, have not, nor will they ever be equally shared between them, but must be obtained almost exclusively by the rich, who are entirely competent to educate their sons without this public assistance. Sir, said he, if this institution could be made a school for the education of the orphans of our country of whom he had spoken, he would he willing to support it? But, instead of that, it is a system by which the poor are robbed, in order to add to the splendor of the rich. He had no doubt some of these cadets would go into the public service provided you make officers of them; but he believed but few would, under any circumstance, serve their country as soldiers. And keep this system up, and it leads to this, that the whole of the profitable or desirable appointments of our Army or Navy are to be taken from these highly favored young men, to the exclusion of all others, no matter what their qualifications may be. He considered such establishments of aristocracy dangerous to the liberties of the people, and the principles of the Government. But he was well aware of the situation any member of this House stood in, that attempts their destruction. He was aware of the growing disposition of the Government towards aristocracy, and was anxious to check it; he thought the sooner, the better. For, said he, if you retain this institution, and add one or two more of a similar character, it will be in vain to attempt to arrest the course of our Government towards aristocracy. It will become so, and perhaps something worse will follow.

Sir, said he, the honorable gentleman who is chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, (Mr. SMITH, of Maryland) who reported the bill containing this appropriation, objects to the course I am taking, and says it is not the proper way to effect the object I have in view. Indeed, sir, I fear no course that can be taken by me to effect my object, will meet the approbation of that gentleman; for, sir, it is my object to abolish this Military Academy entirely, to prevent its being any longer kept up at public expense. And I had supposed, to withhold the appropriation, would have that effect, and in the event the House determined to refuse the appropriation, he would then take the other steps that would be necessary, after such decision was made. This, he said, was the object he had in view, and he had made the motion to strike out this appropriation, in order to ascertain the sense of the House on the subject. He hoped, therefore, that the Committee would now make the decision.

The Committee proceeded to the other items of appropriation.

The item of $21,000 for bounties and premiums on enlistments of recruits to fill up the Army coming up—

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, opposed this item, on the ground that there was no necessity for increasing the number of the Army beyond their present actual amount.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, supported the appropriation as being almost a matter of course, and generally on the ground that the Army ought not to be reduced at all; but, if reduced, that it ought to be by a direct vote.

Mr. TRIMBLE declared himself in favor of a reduction of the Army, but in a practicable way; and he thought that to attempt it in this way would but serve to weaken the efforts which should hereafter be made directly to effect the same object.

H. OF R.

Military Appropriations.

MARCH, 1820.

Mr. SLOCUMB was opposed to this appropriation; and, by way of showing how cautious the House ought to be in making its appropriations, said, that it appeared, from documents laid before the House, that powder and lead belonging to the Government had been loaned to bankrupts to the amount of $240,000; the repayment of which the House is coolly informed, by the officer having charge of that branch of the service, was precarious; and, in order to mend the matter, that $10,000 more had been advanced in money to the same persons.

Mr. COBB made a few remarks against the appropriation.

Mr. LIVERMORE delivered his sentiments in favor of a reduction of the Army. But, he said, though many were in favor of that reduction, there were also many who were opposed to it; and the only way in which the former could secure their object, was to reduce the appropriation. If the appropriations were made, the ground was given up. He was of opinion, therefore, that the friends of the reduction should make use of the weapons which lay in their way. He thought the Army too large, and uselessly employed. It would take longer to collect this army, which was scattered about like the sheep of the shepherd among many hills—to bring them from the Yellow Stone, and the remote corners of the earth—than to raise up a new army. He also complained of the magnitude of the Staff of the Army, as being disproportionate to its numbers.

Mr. BALDWIN made some remarks explanatory of the occasion for this appropriation.

Mr. Foor, with a view to present directly to the House the question of authorizing the enlistment of men to supply vacancies occurring in the ranks, moved to strike out from the bill all that relates to appropriations for recruiting expenses. His object was not to defeat that appropriation, but to postpone it until the proposition for the reduction of the Army should be decided in one way or other, that the main debate might not incidentally arise on this proposition.

Mr. SIMKINS said, that, although the bill relating to the Military Establishment had been postponed, at the instance of the Speaker, to await the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations on our Spanish affairs, that the proposition for the reduction of the army might come up and be met in a distinct shape, yet we find that the question of reducing the army is discussed in almost every clause of this bill. Indeed, on the appropriations for the support of the navy, the army was still the theme, however out of order such a discussion had been. I shall therefore meet some of the arguments urged by those who appear to be unfriendly to the army, and show some reasons why it should not be reduced.

It is no new doctrine, Mr. Chairman, that economy is laudable in any Government, and particularly in a Republic—that a corruption of your officers first, and finally a demoralization of the great body of the people, would be the result of an extravagant and wasteful expenditure of the public money. Hence, it is proper, on any advance towards this state of things, to retrench, curtail, and exact to the last cent: guard your appropriations, and, when the money is voted, impose the most rigid responsibility on your officers for its disbursement. But, remember, when you do this, spare the permanent land and naval defences of the country. Touch not these, which are the surest guarantee for your wealth, peace and safety.

Mr. Chairman, the high tone for economy, and the zealous spirit for retrenchment, now pervading this House, most forcibly reminds me of the weakest point of our Government. It is that of disturbing, weakening, and finally destroying the valuable institutions of the Republic, under the specious, and often deceptive, cry of economy, on the recurrence of every exigency in your Treasury, every embarrassment in your fiscal concerns.

Hence it is, that when you emerge from a war, (as you have done not long since,) and are smarting under the wounds inflicted by a want of due preparation and provident defence, you vote an increase of your navy, and a due organization of, and improvement in your army, and the fortification of all our exposed points. This you then intend as a permanent system, to be increased and perfected with your increasing numbers, wealth, and foreign relations. The system goes on well enough whilst you have a full Treasury. Indeed, sums may then be voted which are not only sufficient for your purposes, but which, all things considered, may even savor of extravagance. But, sir, fluctuations in prosperity and wealth are the lot of all nations; and now, when our agriculture and commerce do not so much prosper, and the Treasury is not so full—when borrowing or taxes may be the consequences, we become alarmed; economy and retrenchment take so deep a hold on our feelings, and the tide becomes so strong and overwhelming, that nothing can resist it. Your navy, your army, your fortifications, and other means of permanent defence, are likely to be swept away. And I do very much question, Mr. Chairman, whether, in five or ten years, you will have a vestige of your army left, should your Treasury present the aspect which to many now seems so appalling. This, I say, emphatically, is the weakest point of your Government. In proportion as you are distant from war, you gradually lose sight of its terrors and desolation; you slide into a defenceless state, preaching up the odium against standing armies, against large expenditures, the terrors of taxing the people, and all the other frightful pictures which make us quake for our popularity.

But is this true economy? It is with pain I feel compelled to resort to scenes so recent as the late war, and which should be strong in the mind of every member. I am no adept at calculation, but I do believe that the interest of the money spent, (to say nothing of the lives sacrificed,) for the first two years of our last struggle, by reason of a want of due defence and preparation, would support your army in its present extent. Still the doctrine is, reduce, knock down the army, because we are too poor to support it, and try the experiment again.

Mr. Chairman, you know it is hard, if not impossible, to lay taxes and prepare for war, when you are in a defenceless state. Your taxes render you so unpopular before you declare war, that you cannot, or dare not, do it. Is it not then best, cheapest, most wise, to keep as well prepared for such an event as possible? Is it not wisest to appreciate the maxim of the Father of his Country, that the most certain and effectual way of avoiding war is to prepare for it in time of peace.

Military Appropriations.

H. OF R.

What is our situation in regard to foreign Powers? Are your relations with Spain certain, settled, or pacific? Are you sure of maintaining any thing like a durable peace with your great rival in commerce, trade, and naval supremacy? Have you not been told, from the most unquestionable authority, that that nation is building large numbers of new ships, on improved plans, for the very purpose of meeting yours? Do you not know that she is increasing her munitions of war, and improving her military strength? Can you be insensible that every movement of yours is watched; that your fortifications, your whole coast, and the state of your army, are regularly made known to her; and, above all, do you not know that she will strike you when you are weakest, most embarrassed, and most off your guard? Can you be insensible that the reduction of your army, and other means of defence, invites the blow?

The state of our Treasury, I well know, demands economy, and I am ready as any one to pursue it. But is it really so lamentable, so beggarly, as to lead us to jeopardize the valuable institutions of your country? Your Treasurer reports a deficiency of five millions; and is this so alarming as gentlemen represent? It is said the Sinking Fund cannot be touched. I would not meddle with it if any breach of the public faith is to be the consequence. This, however, is not demonstrated by any reasoning which I have heard. You cannot, previously to the year 1824, use it to purchase in the public debt, unless your stock is under par; an event altogether improbable, unless a war intervenes. Will you then let it lie idle in your Treasury, without yielding a cent of interest, till it accumulates to $22,000,000? I cannot see the indispensable policy of this course.

If, then, you appropriate the balance of that fund for this year—for, let it be remembered that a part of it has already been used, however sacred—it will amount to about - - - $1,600,000

Modify your pension law, which will give you at least - - - 1,500,000

And appropriate the sum reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, which makes a saving from the annual estimate of the War Department, of about - - - 2,600,000

And you have - - - $5,700,000

But, suppose this not to be correct, and nothing whatever saved by this means, will you weaken and destroy the permanent defence of your country, rather than borrow money or lay taxes? Sir, I am not so alarmed at the responsibility of taxation as some gentlemen from almost all sides of the House. I would lay taxes rather than encounter a greater evil. Neither do I believe the state of the country so distressing and impoverished as gentlemen have represented. We have, to be sure, with all other nations, our fluctuations from a greater to a less degree of prosperity. But who can with truth say, that this nation is poor? It is admitted that in many parts of the country the times are a little hard; the pressure greater than usual; but is this a reason for abolishing the great national system of defence settled four or five years ago, after the most mature deliberation, upon the most perfect information and estimates, and guided by the wisest counsels—the counsels of age and dear-bought experience?

But, gentlemen say, standing armies are dangerous; rely on the militia. Can a single gentleman in this House believe that ten millions of enlightened freemen are endangered by an army of ten thousand men, divided at eighty-five posts, and spread over a space of several thousand miles? I will not discuss the proposition.

And can gentlemen be more correct when they speak of relying on the militia, in the first onset of a war, and before they have had time for discipline or camp duty? Every body must know the disorganized, unregulated state of the great body of the militia in the Middle and Southern States. Congress is charged by the Constitution with the defence and protection of the country. They have utterly failed to establish any uniform system, so as to render the militia really efficient; so as to do away the necessity of regular troops; and yet they are for reducing and destroying the Army.

We are, however, told, that it is not intended to destroy the Army, only to reduce it. Sir, by reducing it, you will destroy it. You destroy its permanency and respectability, by making it uncertain how long you will keep it up; by discussing the propriety of its existence every session of this body; by rendering the tenure by which officers hold their offices, utterly uncertain. Who will spend a laborious life in gaining military knowledge? Who will give up domestic ease and happiness? Who will forsake lucrative employments, to drill, discipline, and perfect your army, for offices, the very existence of which is jeopardized every year?

It has been intimated, that your soldiers have nothing to do but sit in garrisons and rub bright their muskets. Sir, this is not the fact. The camp of your army will not be a seat of idleness and corruption, if it is properly organized and judiciously attended to; and is it not true, that your soldiers are already employed in constructing valuable roads; in raising provisions for their support, by which they are not only preserved from idleness and dissipation, but their own pecuniary emolument advanced? Has not an entirely new and valuable system been introduced, and in a most gratifying progress of execution?

Sir, your Army in 1817, cost	-	5,133,994
In 1818	-	3,613,803
In 1819	-	3,344,616

And in 1820, if the appropriations reported by the Committee of Ways and Means are voted, its cost will be reduced several hundred thousand dollars.

From the most accurate estimate which can now be made, the expenses for 1821 and 1822 will still be diminished. Will you then destroy your army rather than touch five millions of your sinking fund, which will probably lie idle?

Will you hazard its existence rather than modify your enormous pension list, by which the reward given to your really meritorious Revolutionary soldiers will still not be taken away; and many abuses corrected?

Rather than even borrow money or lay taxes—events not conceived to be necessary—

Will you impair its natural energy because it costs you less and less every year?

Because your soldiers are employed in improving your military frontier, advancing their own pecuniary interest, and saving themselves from idleness and ruin?

Because your numbers, wealth, extent of country, and number of posts rendered necessary for protection, are continually increasing?

Because the state of your militia is so efficient and flattering?

Because there already exists too much military skill and science? And, above all, will you reduce and weaken your army because you have no foreign enemies, no political and commercial rivals, who are watching your military movements, and who will strike you at your weakest and most unwary moment?

Sir, I see a strong disposition to reduce, and to gauge your national defence, by the supposed strength of your Treasury. I have raised my voice against such a course of policy, not only as most extravagant in the end, but as ruinous and destructive of the best interest of the country; be the result what it may, I shall be consoled by having done my duty.

Mr. RHEA said a few words in defence of the militia, as compared with the regular force.

Mr. SIMKINS disclaimed any intention to depreciate the militia.

Mr. CLAY said a few words expressive of his hope that this bill would be permitted to take its course. These broken efforts, he said, of the friends of a reduction of the Army, would have the effect to weaken their strength. For himself, he could not vote to reduce a man of the Army in the present posture of our affairs. Even if the Army were to be reduced, he did not know that he should vote against this item of appropriation, as it might yet be necessary to have such an appropriation, let the force of the Army be greater or less. In relation to all expenditures already authorized by law, he thought the House should go on and make the appropriations. In relation to the items of appropriation not previously authorized by law, such as that for fortifications, &c., the House was at full liberty to use a discretion.

Mr. CANNON said he could not yield to the suggestions of the honorable Speaker, (Mr. CLAY, who seemed to think he was not pursuing the best course to effect his object; but who, he said, he was glad to find, was also in favor of retrenching the expenditures of the Government; for, he said, he had no fears of "wasting our strength." He said he knew that some objections would be found by some of the advocates of retrenchment to any course that would probably be proposed; but, for his own part, he thought the course he was pursuing was such as the situation of the country required, and was, indeed, the only one that could effect the object that they had in view. He said he had listened with some degree of attention to the arguments of several gentlemen who had spoken in favor of this appropriation for the recruiting service the present year, but, he said they had all fallen very far short of convincing him that it was really necessary, in these times of profound peace and tranquillity, to appropriate this large sum of $21,000 for the recruiting service the present year. Sir, said he, the gentlemen must first show that these recruits are necessary for the good and safety of the country before I can yield my assent to the measure. This, he said, they had not undertaken to show, nor did he believe it possible for the advocates of a standing army to do so, notwithstanding the ingenuity they possessed and had shown in this debate. He said they had not shown that the present number in the Army was necessary in time of peace; and he thought it would puzzle them a good deal to show that a Military Establishment, to the amount he had proposed to reduce it to, (five thousand,) was indispensably necessary to this Government in time of peace; and he thought, on the subject of a standing army, no more should ever be kept up, in time of peace, than was indispensable to the security of the public arms and munitions of war, or to take care of the public property of this kind. Sir, said he, the honorable gentleman who is chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means (Mr. SMITH, of Maryland,) had contended that this appropriation was necessary to keep the Army full, in order to supply all the forts and garrisons in the United States with men. He said he knew that we had a great many forts and garrisons, and he knew, also, that it would not be difficult for the President and Secretary of War to increase them to double the number we now have, and to continue increasing them, until a regular standing army of twenty thousand would be necessary to supply these forts and garrisons with men; and it would then be contended that all this was necessary for the good and safety of the country. But, sir, said he, I do not believe that it is necessary, in time of profound peace, to keep up more than one-half of the forts and garrisons we now have. They had been necessary, he had no doubt, in time of war, but thought it could not be shown that they were all necessary now; although he was willing to admit that we ought to keep up some of them, where it would be convenient and proper to keep our arms and other munitions of war, with a sufficient number of men in each to take good care of those arms and other public property. This, he thought, was all that could be said to be really indispensably necessary to be kept up and retained in service during a state of peace; and, said he, we must suppose that we are in no immediate danger of being involved in war with any nation on earth, when we look at the documents which have been drawn from the War Department on the subject of the vast loans of ammunition that have been made, (whether by authority, or not, he did not know.) But we are told that the officers of our Government, the agents of the War Department, have loaned an enormous amount of our powder and lead, and, also, that the Government will lose many thousands of dollars by this novel transaction; that such has been the anxiety of our officers of Government to get rid of this part of our munitions of war, that they have loaned to persons (to speculate on) that are unable to pay it again, and probably never will be able. This conduct, he said, did not warn us that we were about to be involved in war, nor that there was the least probability of such a state of things taking place.

But, sir, said he, I have risen, in part, for the purpose of noticing some of the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. SIMKINS.) That gentleman seems to entertain great fears that the spirit for economy and retrenchment will destroy the "valuable institutions of our Republic." Sir, said Mr. C., my fears are of a different kind to those which have been expressed by that gentleman. I fear the destruction of the principles of our Government by its course of extravagance and folly. He is alarmed with fears of the destruction of the Army; I am alarmed to see its nourishment and growth. But, sir, could I believe that the safety of our country depended on this regular army, or that it really was what the gentleman seems to believe it to be, the "permanent defence" of our country, I might, indeed, be also in favor of retaining and increasing it. But, sir, I have been taught to believe differently; my political opinions have been drawn from entirely a different source from that of the honorable gentleman. Indeed, he said, he felt astonished to hear such doctrines advanced by that gentleman—the doctrine of large standing armies in time of peace was abhorrent to his most deliberate judgment, and it was the first time he had heard such opinions advanced on that floor, and he hoped such opinions never would be entertained by a majority of the House. Sir, said he, I had always thought that the people of this country, the militia, was the most safe and permanent defence. I always understood this to be the doctrine of him who has been called the Father of his Country. It is the doctrine of the Constitution, and, therefore, is my doctrine.

Sir, I should entertain no such fears as the gentleman from South Carolina does, even should no vestige of a standing army be left. I know, sir, that the people, the citizens of our Government, will defend it, will preserve it, as long as we preserve them from the pressure of unnecessary taxes and burdens. But, to support and maintain large standing armies in time of peace, is not my way to prepare for war. I would take a more safe course, and one more congenial to the principles of our Government; to arm and discipline our citizens, for I am unwilling to trust the safety and preservation of my Government with any regular army that can be supported; but he said he would not repeat more of the opinions and doctrines he had before advanced on this subject: the increase of the regular army in time of peace is diminishing the strength of the nation, instead of adding to its safety. But, said he, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. SIMKINS) has spoken of the inefficiency of the militia in the Middle and Southern, or Western States. Sir, said he, while I admit that Congress has heretofore, in my opinion, failed or neglected to do its duty towards the militia, I must say that I believe this will continue to be the case as long as we keep up and rely on a standing army. It has been made the favorite, while the other species of force has been, and no doubt will continue to be, neglected. I at the same time most decidedly differ with the gentleman in the opinion he entertains of the inefficiency of the militia of the Southern and Western States. In cases of sudden emergency, or any other cases where they have been required to act during the late war, sir, said he, the reverse is found to be the fact. It has proved to be the most prompt and efficient force in many instances. Look, said he, for a moment at what took place in the State he had the honor in part to represent. On the news of the massacre at Fort Mims, during the late war, being received and made known through the medium of the newspapers, to the people, the citizens equipped and furnished themselves, formed and organized themselves into volunteer companies of mounted riflemen throughout the various sections of the State, without any orders or request from the Governor or the commanding General. Fourteen companies voluntarily precipitated themselves into the enemy's country, with a determination to inflict chastisement on these savages for their horrid deeds; they were followed by the commanding General, with other volunteer and militia forces, called out, with whom they co-operated, and, notwithstanding the regular troops that were stationed in the same country where these troops went from, many battles were fought and complete victory obtained, before the regular forces of the United States could reach the field of action.

Sir, said he, there are many other instances where their superiority has been shown. New Orleans could bear testimony of another, sufficient to show the correctness of my opinions. It is the feelings of men or armies that makes them encounter difficulties and dangers, and it is the attachment of the people to the Government, will make them always defend it. Sir, said he, I will not adopt the doctrine that you must retain these officers of the regular army in service in time of peace, because you may want them in time of war. In time of war, all are subject to be called to the defence of the country; every citizen has to leave his home and every thing near and dear to him; he has the greatest sacrifice to make, and I cannot presume that these officers possess so much less patriotism, as to suppose they would refuse again to enter your service, whenever the situation of the country required it.

Sir, said he, the gentleman from South Carolina has made an allusion to the dread of laying taxes, which he supposes to be felt by the advocates of retrenchment. This he thought scarcely worthy of a reply; for his own part, he did not feel it to be necessary, as the course he had pursued while a member of the House during the late war, would show that he did not fear to encounter that responsibility, whenever the situation of our country might require it. He said he did not believe the situation of our country at this time to be such as to require laying taxes, but he thought it did require retrenchment, so as to reduce our expenditures to the amount of our revenue at least, and he would prefer being a little under that amount, than to permit them to remain so far beyond the extent of our present resources as they were. This, he said, was the course he had determined to pursue, and he should persist in it until he could be convinced of his error; he would oppose every appropriation which he believed to be unnecessary, or subversive of the true interest and prosperity of his country.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, also again spoke to the same effect as Mr. C. at some length, and concluded by a motion that the Committee rise, with the express view of laying this bill on the table, in order to take up the proposition to reduce the Army.

The question on this motion was decided in the negative, by no large majority.

The question on Mr. FOOT's motion was then decided in the negative by a decided majority; and the item of appropriation for bounties, &c., for the recruiting service, was agreed to.

The other appropriations in the bill were then agreed to, until the House came to the appropriation for fortifications; for which object the Committee of Ways and Means propose the sum of eight hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to fill the blank with the sum of eight hundred thousand dollars, being the sum which the Committee of Ways and Means had thought it proper to recommend. A larger sum had been estimated to be necessary by the War Department, but the Committee had thought this would be sufficient, particularly after deducting the sum estimated for the fortification at Dauphin Island, the prosecution of which, in the opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means, was not important. Mr. S. entered into a variety of statements of the estimated cost of the various fortifications now erecting, and of the contracts already made, to show that this sum was necessary, and would be sufficient.

Mr. BALDWIN was desirous of knowing, if the appropriation was limited to the sum of eight hundred thousand dollars, what was to be done with the contracts which had been made, and under which a larger sum would be necessary. Unless it could be shown, that contracts made by the Executive are not binding on the Government, he should be in favor of filling the blank with the sum estimated by the proper authority to be necessary. To bring this question fairly before the House, he moved to fill the blank with that sum, viz.: one million five hundred and twenty thousand dollars.

Mr. CLAY did not concur, he said, in the idea that any contract made by an officer of the Government was binding on Congress. If contracts were made, for example, for the erection of fortifications where they were not wanted, was the Government bound to execute the work? Certainly not. They might take back the contract, paying the other party all damages and cost he may have sustained by the annulment of the contract. So far from enlarging the appropriation, he would rather diminish it. The better way, he thought, would be to fill up the blank with four or five hundred thousand dollars; if, in the course of the session, the state of the Treasury, or the aspect of the times, should justify the appropriation of a larger sum, a supplemental appropriation might be made. The contractors, he said, gentlemen might rely on it, would not throw up their contracts because a less amount was allowed to be expended within a given period. They would be content with half a million of dollars. Let us, said Mr. C., hold on to the purse-strings until we get further into the session, and see what is to be done in respect to the ways and means.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said that he, for one, did not acknowledge the right of the Executive officers to make contracts which would anticipate the revenue, and paralyze the operations of the Government. They had a right, he admitted, to make contracts under appropriations actually made by Congress, but to no greater amount.

A motion was made for the Committee to rise, (about four o'clock,) and agreed to.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, which, with accompanying documents, will show that the act of the 20th of May, 1812, respecting the northern and western boundaries of the State of Ohio, has been executed.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 8, 1820.

The Message and accompanying documents were laid on the table.

THURSDAY, March 9.

The SPEAKER communicated to the House a letter from the Governor of the State of Ohio, enclosing an act passed by the General Assembly of that State, entitled "An act respecting a navigable communication between Lake Erie and the Ohio;" and a resolution passed by the said General Assembly, asking a donation of, grant, or right of pre-emption in the purchase of, certain lands, agreeably to the provision of the said act; as, also, for the right of pre-emption to purchase twelve sections of land, for the purpose of establishing seats of justice thereon for new counties which have been formed; which letter, with the said act and resolution, was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. SILSBEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred, on the 18th ultimo, the petition of sundry fishermen of Gloucester, in the State of Massachusetts, reported a bill to amend the second section of the act, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. RANKIN, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of James Wilkinson, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill for the relief of General James Wilkinson; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to examine and report to this House, whether, in their opinion, cents, or copper coins, are by law made a tender, and whether the existing laws regulating the coins of the United States require amendments.

Mr. STRONG, of Vermont, submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House such information as he may think proper relating to the progress, proceedings, and final accomplishment, of the Commissioners appointed agreeably to the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th articles of the Treaty of Ghent, in ascertaining and settling the boundary line between the United States and Great Britain, in conformity to the second article of the treaty of 1783, and whether it is ascertained that the fortification at Rouse's Point, (so called,) on Lake Champlain, near the 45th degree of north latitude, is within the boundary limits of the Government of Great Britain, and what has been the amount of the expenditure in erecting said fortification; and, also, to give such further information as he may think proper as to the whole amount of the expenditure already accrued to the United States, in carrying into effect said treaties, subsequent to the appointment of said commissioners, including their annual salaries or perquisites.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

I transmit to the House of Representatives, in pursuance of their resolution of the 22d of last month, a report from the Secretary of State, with the papers containing the information requested by that resolution.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 8, 1820.

To the President of the United States:

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 22d ultimo, requesting the President to impart to that House any communications touching the Florida Treaty, which have not heretofore been communicated, and the communication of which, in his opinion, may not be prejudicial to the interests of the United States, has the honor of submitting to the President the papers containing the information in possession of this Department requested by the resolution.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 7, 1820.

The documents accompanying this report were ordered to be printed.

Mr. PINBALL moved again, (having on several previous days made the same motion unsuccessfully) that the House do now proceed to consider the resolution submitted by him on the 18th ultimo, proposing an amendment to the rules of the House in relation to the duties of stenographers, admitted within the House; and the motion was negatived.

The resolution lying on the table to authorize the publication of part of the Secret Journal of Congress, under the Articles of Confederation, and the amendments reported thereto by the select committee, being read, were concurred in by the House, and the resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

RELATIONS WITH SPAIN.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, made a report upon the state of the relations between the United States and Spain, accompanied by a bill to authorize the President of the United States to take possession of East and West Florida, and establish a temporary government therein; which bill was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The report is as follows:

The committee to whom has been referred so much of the President's Message, at the commencement of the session, as relates to foreign affairs, respectfully report—

That their attention was directed, immediately upon their appointment, to the state of the relations of the United States with Spain, and that their delay in making a report upon them must be attributed to their wish "to afford an opportunity for such friendly communications, during the present session of Congress," as the Government of Spain had authorized us to expect. They thought it better that Congress should postpone its determination until events might enable it to make that determination definitive, than that it should pass a contingent act for authorizing measures which it was not proposed immediately to execute; that it should found its determination upon relations ascertained to exist, than upon a calculation of events which might be expected to occur during its sitting.

But more than a year has passed since the signature of the treaty by which it was proposed to terminate the long differences between the United States and Spain. More than six months since, the appointment of a new Minister from Spain, who was "forthwith" to make known to the United States the intentions of his Government, and we have advanced so far in the session as to make it necessary to propose, without further delay, any measure on which it is expected that Congress shall act before its adjournment.

The committee will not attempt to add any thing to the exposition of the rights of the United States and the obligations of Spain, which is contained in the correspondence between the two Governments. We can hardly expect, from continued negotiation, the redress which has been claimed for twenty years, and promised for eighteen—which has been a second time promised, and a second time withheld. In such a negotiation, the signature of a treaty seems to be a mere incident, and not its term.

For the spoliation which have been committed upon the property of our citizens, for the invasion of our soil, for the weakness or partiality which has made a Spanish territory the place of rendezvous and encampment of an enemy, and which has still more lately permitted the Indian inhabitants of that territory, (whom Spain was bound by treaty to restrain,) to engage in savage hostilities against us; for all these acts of war, a people less attached to peace, would seek redress only by war. To capture and confiscate the ships and property of the wrongdoer, would be admitted to be a policy of mildness and forbearance. But, by such reprisals, the Government that does the wrong suffers less than the unoffending subject. It seems a more just reprisal to occupy the province which has been made an instrument of injury, which has been designated by Spain herself as the fund for our indemnity, and whose occupation by the United States will stop the accumulation of those claims for compensation and redress, which the misgovernment of that neglected colony continually produces. The committee submit to the House a bill to authorize the President of the United States to take possession of East and West Florida, and establish a temporary government therein.

There appears too much reason to believe, from the mistake of the Spanish negotiator, as to the dates of the Spanish grants, which it was intended to annul, if the projected treaty had been ratified, that the Crown lands in Florida may be insufficient to provide the expected indemnity for our losses. But these may be applied, as far as they will go, to the compensation of our citizens, and for the excess of our claim, Spain, by whose act the domain of Florida has been rendered inadequate, must expect us to look westward. Perhaps, when our attention is thus forced to a direction more interesting to Spain, her Government may at last admit that it is as much her interest as ours, that the just claims of the United States should be provided for by friendly convention, and we may hope that the next treaty between the two nations may be executed as well as signed.

The following is the bill accompanying the report:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to take possession of, and occupy, the territories of East and West Florida, and the appendages and appurtenances thereof; and he is hereby authorized, for that purpose, to employ any part of the Army and Navy of the United States, and the militia of any State, which he may deem necessary.

Sec. 2. And be it enacted, That, until the end of the next session of Congress, unless provision for the temporary government of the said territories be sooner made by Congress, all the military, civil, and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the existing government of the same territories, shall be vested in such person and persons, and shall be exercised in such manner, as the President of the United States shall direct, for maintaining the inhabitants of said territories in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion; and the laws of the United States relative to the collection of the revenue, and the importation of persons of color, shall be extended to the said territories; and the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized, within the term aforesaid, to establish such districts for the collection of the revenue, and during the recess of Congress to appoint such officers, whose commission shall expire at the end of the next session of Congress, to enforce the said laws, as to him shall seem expedient.

Sec. 3. And be it enacted, That the sum of — dollars is hereby appropriated, for the purpose of carrying this act into effect, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill appropriating moneys for the support of the Military Establishment for the year 1820.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, took a historical view of the legislation of Congress on the subject of fortifications, to show under what authority the Executive had heretofore proceeded in the erection of fortifications. In 1794 a law had passed authorizing the fortifying, from time to time, of certain points therein mentioned. In 1798 the President was authorized to erect fortifications in any other place that the public safety might require. In 1808 the President was further authorized by law to complete the maritime fortifications, &c. No other positive statute existed on the subject, but the President of the United States, under his general powers, had caused fortifications to be erected at certain points, and Congress had sanctioned it by successive appropriations. With respect to the later fortifications, under a resolution of Congress, the maritime coast had been surveyed with a view to its complete fortification—the report of the engineers was laid before Congress, with a plan of fortifications, indicating those now contracted for, and stating the sum which, under this view, would be necessary for the current year. The sum was appropriated by Congress, who thus sanctioned the proposition; and the Executive had in pursuance of this intimation of the disposition of Congress, directed the works to proceed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, spoke in favor of the largest sum proposed to be appropriated. He particularly referred to the fortification of Dauphin Island, which the Committee of Ways and Means seemed to suppose might be dispensed with. This fortification, he said, was a part of a system of defence for the entrance to Mobile Bay, and, if any part of it was executed, the whole ought to be. He pointed to plans lying before him, showing the relation of the two forts proposed to be erected there, to one another, and their mutual dependence, for the protection of a passage which could not be otherwise effectually protected, being five miles wide.

Mr. MCCOY rose to ask a favor and to enter a protest. The favor he had to ask was, that gentlemen who were for keeping in service a large navy, a standing army, and other expensive establishments, would not attempt more than the resources of the country would bear them out in. The protest he had to enter was, against the practice of permitting the Heads of Departments to legislate for Congress, and to pledge the funds of the Government to any extent, at their pleasure. As a general principle, contracts ought not to be made by officers of the Government but under the authority of law.

Mr. LOWNDES then delivered his sentiments on the subject. He was in favor of the sum proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means, because he understood that it would be sufficient for the purposes of carrying into effect existing contract. With regard to the system of contracts, &c., which had been the subject of animadversion, he said, if the matter were closely examined, he believed it would be found that the laws on the subject were exceedingly defective; and that, if there had been any irregularity, it had been made unavoidable by the omission of Congress to legislate on the subject. In the nature of things, contracts must be made by the Government in regard to certain expenditures; and such had been made in certain branches of the public service from the commencement of the Government, without objection—of which he quoted examples, among which was that of the expenditure for timber for the Navy, under the act appropriating a million of dollars annually for the object. Contracts, he said, might be made in two ways: on objects specially recognised and directed by acts of Congress; and on objects within the legitimate authority of the Executive, and to amounts within the compass of the usual annual appropriations by Congress. Applying these principles to the case before the House, he thought that contracts for the expenditure of $800,000 within the year might have been made on every reasonable calculation, being about the amount which Congress had lately appropriated for successive years, except where a surplus of appropriation rendered a less sum necessary. On the subject of fortifications generally, he said, he did not dwell, because it required a sort of knowledge which he did not possess. But, with regard to some points of our maritime frontier, he felt a particular solicitude that they should be completely fortified at any expense.

Mr. MCCOY said, that his objection to the system of contracts was, that they exceeded, in this case at least, the sums appropriated and designated by Congress for that object of expenditure. Contracts ought not to be made in anticipation of appropriations hereafter to be made; because circumstances might arise in the following year to prevent Congress from appropriating any thing. Nearly such a state of things indeed now existed. In time of war, necessity might justify a departure from a rigid adherence to this rule; but in time of peace there was nothing to justify it.

Mr. LIVERMORE expressed his wish that this item of appropriation should be so worded as that no part of the amount should be disbursed but in pursuance of "contracts previously authorized by law."

Mr. CLAY said, it must be quite obvious to every one, from daily experience, that the practice of exceeding appropriations was one which called loudly for the interposition of Congress. This excess was not confined, he said, to one Department of the Government, but the disease seems to have pervaded all the branches of the Executive Department; and, unless the House should, on some occasion, withhold an appropriation in some case wherein an expenditure had been made without authority, he had no doubt the evil would go on to the utter subversion, if not of the Constitution, of all law on the subject. The sum of five hundred thousand dollars, which he had proposed for this object, he said he considered sufficient. It was at least as much as could be expended before the end of the present session; and if, after the ways and means for the current year were provided, it should be thought proper to appropriate more money for this object, it would be completely within the power of Congress to do so. With regard to retrenchment, Mr. C. said he knew that Congress had much difficulty to encounter. All the Heads of Departments would agree that there ought to be a retrenchment of the expenses of the Government; but none of them would agree that his particular department should be the object of it. We, said Mr. C., have to perform all the ungracious offices of the Government; we have the painful duty of imposing taxes, they the pleasure of recommending their repeal; we have the labor and responsibility of raising money, they the gratification of spending it. Mr. C. said he was therefore disposed to take care that there should not be a wasteful expenditure of the public money. With regard to Mobile Bay, Mr. C. said the House were at last presented with the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations; and, if that committee could succeed in persuading the House that we may take pacific possession of Florida with or without a treaty, the fortifications of Pensacola would perhaps afford a sufficient protection to Mobile Bay. On the subject of fortifications generally, Mr. C. said there had been, heretofore, he would not say a wasteful extravagance, but an improvident profusion. We were making fortifications everywhere, and a large amount of money had been expended on one fortification (Rouse's Point) which was understood to be actually within the British line. He concurred with the gentleman from South Carolina, that two or three great points ought to be fortified; but he would not, therefore, expend such sums of money on points which were not so important.

Mr. LOWNDES said, he should himself perhaps believe that not more than five hundred thousand dollars ought to be appropriated for the erection of fortifications during the present year, did not the existing contracts require the appropriation of a larger amount. With respect to the proposed appropriation, it was not, as might be supposed, from the remarks of some gentlemen, to meet an expenditure beyond the appropriation. It was a case in which, with a due forecast and attention to economy in the expenditure of public money, contracts have been made, founded on a rational expectation of appropriations being made by Congress—an expectation justified by the sanction given by previous appropriations to the prosecution of these works. Analogous cases frequently occurred. The gentleman from Kentucky, he was sure, would recollect the case of the Cumberland road, in which contracts had been made involving the expenditure of money beyond the amount appropriated by law, and depending on future appropriations for their fulfilment.

Mr. CLAY again spoke upon the subject. If, he said, the Executive was authorized to make contracts, relying on appropriations usually made, what ought, in this case, to have been its guide? The appropriation of last year, amounting to five hundred thousand dollars, the sum with which it was proposed to fill this blank. Between the present case and the Cumberland road he said there was no analogy. There was a positive law authorizing the road, and a certain sum appropriated; under that law contracts had been made, under which the expenditure had exceeded the amount appropriated. The case now under consideration was that of an attempt to expend the public money without the authority of any law.

Mr. MALLARY spoke in favor of the smallest sum proposed. It was time, he said, to put an end to the excessive expenditures of public money. He found, on consulting the documents on the table, that already contracts had been made by the War Department for fortifications, which would involve the expenditure of two million seven hundred thousand dollars. It was time, he said, to determine whether contracts made by agents of the Government, at all times, for all purposes, and to any amount, should be considered as binding on the Government.

Mr. STORRS made some remarks on the relative responsibility of this House and of public officers, and on the ease with which it was sometimes evaded. For example, in the case of the public gunpowder loaned to certain persons, the head of the ordnance department said he had nothing to do with it, but remonstrated against it. Another officer in that department says it was done with the approbation of the Secretary of War, and all unite in saying that some part of the responsibility for the transaction properly belonged to an officer of the Army who had since been dismissed the service. Mr. S. then proceeded to quote the sentiments contained in the Inaugural Speech of the present President of the United States, on the subject of responsibility and the duty of the Executive in this respect. With respect to the present House, he said, if there had been any irregularity or excess in the expenditure of public money, it was not to blame for neglect in preventing it; for no House he had ever seen or read of had been so faithful in the performance of this part of its duty as (so far) this House had been.

Mr. BALDWIN said that he was in favor of the sum proposed, because the faith of the Government was pledged for so much, and the state of the Treasury was not such as to require it to be violated. He was not disposed, he said, to protect any Executive officer in the abuse of power; but, in relation to this subject of fortifications, it was no more than just that the state of it should be fairly understood. He then proceeded to take a review of the course of the Government on this subject, from the instructions to the Board of Engineers to survey the coast and their report, to the laying of the same before Congress, with all the plans of the fortifications and estimates of their probable expense; after which the sum required for the then ensuing year (1819) was deliberately appropriated by Congress. There are two ways, Mr. B. said, in which the sanction of Congress may be given to any measure—by passing a special law directing a thing to be done, or by an appropriation for the purpose of doing it. With all the information on the subject before them, and with a full knowledge of the extent of the plan for the fortification of the coast, the three branches of Congress had passed an appropriation to commence the work, thereby ratifying the plan. Previous to this act no contracts had been made; after its passage, it became the duty of the Executive to go on to execute the work. With respect to the deficiency in the revenue, Mr. B. intimated that that might be supplied without resorting to either of the three alternatives of the honorable Speaker. We own seven millions of stock in the Bank of the United States. It yields no dividend this year, and but little in the last. If we want money, said he, let us take a fund of no use to us, which brings us in nothing, and which may be sold at nearly its par value. He was, as other gentlemen professed to be, a friend to economy, but true economy. He would leave untouched every thing necessary to the usual and regular operations of the Government, and every thing which was connected with the common defence and general welfare.

Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, made some further remarks in favor of the appropriation of an adequate sum for the object now under consideration. He again dwelt on the importance of the fortification on Dauphin Island. With regard to the suggestion of the Speaker on this head, Mr. B. said the port of Pensacola, when in our possession, will no more protect the Bay of Mobile than the fortifications at New York will protect the Delaware.

Mr. NEWTON delivered his sentiments in favor of an adequate appropriation for fortifications. He enlarged on their importance to the protection of our seaports—to the interests of commerce—and, as connected with them, to the interests of agriculture. A few millions, expended for the permanent and perfect protection of such interests, ought to be no object. He dwelt particularly on the importance of the fortifications at Old Point Comfort, &c., at the mouth of the Chesapeake, and said that true economy required the prosecution of all which are commenced to completion as speedily as practicable.

Mr. TRIMBLE spoke at some length in explanation and confirmation of what had been said by other gentlemen as to the authority by which the Executive had entered into contracts for the erection of fortifications. The sum proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means, he thought, ought to be granted, as not being more than necessary to pay for work done and in a course of performance.

Mr. CLAY repeated the idea, that the money appropriated ought to be considered the limitation of the power of the Executive to make contracts. With respect to the deficiency in the revenue, so far from taking hold of the stock of the Bank of the United States, he had been in hopes, as there seemed to be great difficulty what to do with the Sinking Fund, that Congress would have consented to appropriate it to the payment of the debt which we owe to the Bank of the United States for that stock, having due regard to the five per cent. interest which only we had stipulated to pay on that part of the public debt.

Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia, spoke at some length in favor of a sufficient appropriation. The only question ought to be, is the expenditure proposed necessary for the public welfare. There was no money which this Government could lay out to so great an advantage as in erecting fortifications. They were a cheap defence in war; and whatever other gentlemen might believe, he thought he saw a large "speck of war" in the horizon, and not with Spain alone. We ought, in due time, to make preparation for a contest which sooner or later must come. In illustrating the importance of fortifications, Mr. S. said that during our history three of our largest and most important commercial cities had been saved by them—alluding, in the Revolutionary war, to Charleston, and, in the late war to Baltimore, and New Orleans—for, much as was due to the bravery and skill of its defenders at the entrenchments, it was also true that Fort St. Philip below had been equally necessary to, and efficient in the preservation of New Orleans. Resorting to foreign history, he quoted that of France, to show that she had been saved by her engineers, artillerymen, and fortifications, &c. He hoped the appropriations necessary to this important object would not be withheld.

The question was then taken on filling the blank with $1,520,000, and negatived by a large majority.

The question was then taken on filling it with $800,000, and decided in the affirmative, by a vote of 73 to 61.

The appropriation for repairs, &c., at West Point, was moved by Mr. CANNON to be stricken from the bill; but the House decided to retain it.

The appropriation for completing the arsenal at Augusta, Georgia, next came up. Mr. COBB stated, and Mr. REID confirmed the statement, that, however eligibly situated, its location was in so unhealthy a site, as to make it unfit for occupation, and that there was no prospect of this objection being obviated. The appropriation was, after hearing a statement of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, in defence of it, stricken from the bill, by a vote of 56 to 48.

Mr. TRIMBLE then moved the following amendment to the bill:

"To enable the Secretary of War to renew and extend a contract with John P. Garresches, of Delaware, for one thousand barrels of powder, if he shall so choose to renew and extend; and the said Garresches shall secure the loan of powder already made to Peter Bauduy, 22,000 dollars. Provided, that this appropriation shall not be construed to sanction the original loan of powder to Peter Bauduy, or to exonerate any person or persons from their liability to the United States for making said loan."

A debate of one and a half hour's duration arose on this amendment. It was supported by Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, and Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, and opposed by Mr. MCCOY, of Virginia, Mr. WALKER, of North Carolina, Mr. CANNON, of Tennessee, Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, Mr. SLOCUMB, of North Carolina, Mr. STORRS, of New York, and Mr. ROSS, of Ohio.

The proposition was finally rejected, by a considerable majority.

Mr. CLAY, in offering the following amendment, briefly adverted to its importance and interesting nature. There were, he said, eleven States, (counting Missouri and Arkansas,) more or less interested in it. Many steamboats were employed in this navigation, and many more would be; and he did verily believe that, by an expenditure of a hundred or a hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and an annual expenditure thereafter of ten or fifteen thousand dollars, the navigation could be made perfectly safe. He hoped, as this appropriation was analogous to one or more contained in the bill, there would be no objection to it.

"For making a survey, maps, and charts, of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, from the Rapids of the Ohio at Louisville, to the Balize, for the purpose of facilitating and ascertaining the most practicable mode of improving the navigation of those rivers, five thousand dollars."

The motion was agreed to, without a division.

Mr. COBB then offered the following amendment to the bill:

"For the purpose of holding treaties with the Creek and Cherokee tribes of Indians, for the extinguishment of the Indian title to all the lands within the State of Georgia, pursuant to the fourth condition of the first article of the Articles of Agreement and Cession concluded between the United States and the State of Georgia, on the 24th day of April, 1802, the sum of thirty thousand dollars."

When the Committee rose, and reported progress, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 10.

Mr. WARFIELD presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and of Montgomery county, in the State of Maryland, praying that so much of an act of Congress of the last session as authorizes a turnpike company to make a road from Tenny Town to Georgetown, and to collect toll thereon; as also to erect toll-gates on the roads leading from Tenny Town to Brookville, and to Leesburg, may be repealed, for reasons set forth in the petition; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act making further provision for the sale of the public lands; and an act further to suspend for a limited time the sale or forfeiture of lands for failure in completing the payments thereon; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said bills were read twice, and severally referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

MARCH, 1820.

Mr. CANNON submitted the following resolution, viz :

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole House who have under consideration the bill making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the year 1820, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the Military Academy at West Point, in the State of New York; also, of repealing all laws in relation to said Academy, from and after the first day of May next, and exposing to sale, to the highest bidder, all the property of the United States in and about the same, in such manner as may be directed by the President of the United States.

The resolution being read, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved that it lie on the table; which motion was rejected; and the question was taken to agree to the same, and passed in the affirmative.

JOURNAL OF THE OLD CONGRESS.

Mr. STROTHER rose and said, that he thought it indispensably his duty to call up a motion he had made some time before; that certainly the time had arrived, when no reason could longer exist for refusing to publish the Secret Journal of the Old Congress; that, in making this motion, he did not mean to allude to any particular measures or the actors in them. All he should say on that subject was, that whatever they contained should be known to the people; that, if it appeared from them, there were subjects of great national concern agitated, the consequences of which would have been of the highest importance, and there were men who, on those occasions, have rendered great services to their country by their exertions in defending their rights, Mr. S. said it ought to be known, that every man might have that credit with his country he is entitled to. If, on the contrary, there were men who, in their opinion, had acted wrong, or wished to sacrifice any of the interests belonging to the Union, and which they did not consider as peculiarly favorable to the States they represented, but which might be injurious to them—if there were such men still alive, and who might possibly be brought forward as candidates for office, was it not equally proper that the whole of their public conduct should also be known; or how can the public judge, while the veil of secrecy is still thrown over it? Mr. S. thought that it was highly proper that nothing which was of importance to the country, and which had been previously agitated in our public councils at that distant day, should be kept from the public eye. He adverted to the strange appearance it might have that the Secret Journal of Congress should be published during the Revolutionary war, when the secrets might be considered as of more delicacy and importance than in time of peace, when there was reasons to suppose none such, or at least none of equal importance, could have existed.

Mr. S. made many other remarks on the subject, tending to prove the extreme impropriety of any longer withholding from the public a view of the Secret Journal, which he contended would cost but very little, and did not consist of more than sixty or eighty pages, and were all transcribed and ready for publication; to prove which, he read a letter he held in his hand, from Mr. Secretary Adams, to that effect.

Mr. S. then moved to take up the resolution he had himself moved, for the publication of the Secret Journal.

After he had closed, some desultory conversation took place, which, showing that many members would vote against it—

Mr. C. PINCKNEY said, that he hoped the motion would prevail; that it was difficult to see what reasons could exist against it; that, if the Secret Journal of the Old Congress, from 1775 to 1783, (the conclusion of the peace) were ordered to be published, why not these? In the former, it might have been much more improper than in the latter, because the whole of the Secret Journals contained the secret proceedings of Congress during the war, in which there may have been many private negotiations with different States in Europe, which those States might not wish to have exposed. That was the time also when spies, and private emissaries, and agents were necessary, and in many cases indispensable, some of whom might be alive, or their families, who would not wish it known that their friends had been engaged in practices generally not deemed honorable. But, from the year 1783 to 1789, the commencement of the new Government, no such secret could exist. He understood, from information which came from the Secretary of State, that the whole of the remainder did not contain more than sixty or eighty pages—not the size of many of the voluminous documents published this session—the expense, therefore, would be but small. As to the contents, Mr. P. said, he was only in Congress about half the time from 1783 to 1789; but, during that time, an event occurred which must be recorded on the Secret Journal, which, in his judgment, alone made it necessary that this part of the Journal should be published. It was a long time since it had occurred, and therefore what he stated would of course be to the best of his recollection. If there should be any mistakes, he would be willing to correct them; it was an event of great importance, in his opinion, in the civil history of this country, and to which he had alluded, in his observations on the Missouri bill, but which he would now more particularly state, as he had heard that what he had said before must have been misunderstood.

Mr. P. said, that, in 1785-'6, he believed '6, two or three years after the peace, Spain being very anxious on the subject, sent out Don Diego de Gardoqui, as her Minister, to this country, with instructions to offer to the United States a treaty of commerce, which she said was an advantageous one, if we would, in the same treaty, consent to give up the navigation of that part of the Mississippi, which ran through the Spanish dominions, for twenty-five years. Mr. John Jay was the Secretary of Foreign Affairs. The treaty, according to the then routine of business, was referred to him to report his opinion, and, to the best of his remembrance, he recommended its adoption. Seven, being all Eastern and Northern States, did vote for it: but owing to the Confederation requiring nine States as necessary to form a treaty, it was defeated.

Military Appropriations.

H. OF R.

Mr. P. said, that, if any part of the public business of this country, in which he had any agency, gave him more pleasure than another, it was the agency he had in association with the distinguished gentlemen now high in office in Washington, in preventing it. He believed he might venture to say, it was owing to them and another, now gone, that the whole of the Western country was saved to us; that the Mississippi still flows through American lands, and that her members here, so honorably fill these seats. And having, as he observed on the Missouri question, and, he said, let him here repeat it, contributed, at that distant day, to save the parent, he felt great pleasure on the late great occasion, in contributing his humble efforts to save her children.

The resolution was taken up and passed.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the annual military appropriation bill.

Mr. COBB withdrew the motion which he yesterday offered to amend the bill, under the impression that it had better be annexed to the bill making the civil appropriations for the current year.

Mr. COCKE submitted a motion to amend the bill, so as to appropriate eighteen hundred dollars, for a survey of the Mississippi river, from the mouth of the Missouri river, to the mouth of the Ohio, with a view to the practicability of improving its navigation. After some observations from Mr. CLAY, and others, which went to show that this object was already provided for, Mr. C. withdrew his proposition.

Mr. COCKE then inquired, from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, what portion of the appropriations contained in this bill related to the expenses of the expedition up the Missouri river; his object being to strike out that part of the appropriation.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, answered, that he could not say more on this subject than was disclosed by the report on this subject from the War Department, in pursuance of the requisition of this House, and which was in the possession of the House.

After some conversation, it appeared to be settled that the proper time for Mr. COCKE's motion would be when the question came before the House of concurrence in the appropriations agreed to by this Committee.

And, on motion of Mr. CLAY, this bill having been gone through, it was ordered to lie on the table.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the proposition of Mr. CANNON, directing the Committee of the Whole to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the Military Academy; whereupon a debate of three hours arose.

Mr. CANNON said, in reply to the arguments of those who had spoken in favor of keeping up the Military Academy, if any thing could deter him from pursuing the course pointed out to him by what he believed to be his duty as a member of the House of Representatives, it would be that of differing in opinion with the honorable gentleman from Maryland, who is chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, (Mr. S. SMITH,) also that of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SMYTH,) and the gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. BLOOMFIELD,) all of whose opinions he held in the highest respect, and he was well aware had great influence in the House, more especially on the subject of military affairs or military science; to the superior knowledge and experience of those honorable gentlemen he would always yield, for he felt it to be the height of presumption to oppose his opinions on any subject to those of the gentlemen whose names he had mentioned. But, said he, the gentlemen I have alluded to, as well as all others who have spoken on the subject, have not stated my arguments correctly; they seem to have misunderstood me entirely, however explicitly I have attempted to state my opinions to the House. The gentlemen are quite mistaken if they suppose that I am opposed to the accumulation of military science. Sir, said he, I have never expressed such opinions on this floor or elsewhere; nor, said he, shall any gentleman understand me to entertain such opinions. He said he had distinctly told the House, on a former occasion, that he was decidedly in favor of the diffusion of military science amongst the general mass of the people of the United States. But he was opposed to confining it to a favorite few—a privileged order—and to this course of teaching the sons of our most wealthy citizens at public expense, while you neglect the helpless orphans of those whose blood has crimsoned your fields of battle in the defence of our country—while you not only refuse to expend a single dollar for their education, but you have even refused to give them bread until they shall be able to procure subsistence for themselves. These were the opinions he had before expressed on this subject, and he hoped they would not again be misstated or misunderstood. He said if the Government of the United States undertook to teach military science, which he thought himself necessary, it ought to be taught to the militia officers at public expense, by whom it would be taught to the citizens generally, and diffused and expanded through the whole mass of the people; and these arguments, he said, no gentleman had undertaken to answer. But gentlemen, he said, had advocated this enormous expenditure of the public money at the Military Academy on the ground that it was necessary for the defence of the country. But, sir, said he, I for one do not believe this country will ever be defended by this Military Academy; nor did he believe we could depend, for the defence of the country, on those persons who have been or may hereafter be educated there; nor did he believe this country ought ever to depend on a regular army for defence; nor did he believe we ought to depend on military fortifications for our defence. Sir, said he, I for one cannot rely on any of the modes of defence I have mentioned; nor can I rely on the whole of them put together, notwithstanding the vast amount of money we are annually expending on them. I believe the defence of this Government, said he, rests on a more safe and secure foundation. It at last rests on your militia, the people, the citizens of these United States. They have heretofore defended our Government in the most trying times of difficulty and danger; and, sir, they will defend it again whenever it becomes necessary. You never have yet called on them in vain, (notwithstanding your neglect to qualify them to discharge this duty at public expense,) and let me tell you, sir, that you never will call on them in vain. So long as this Government shall be preserved in its original purity, every man will be his own and his country's defender. He did not, he said, wish to induce the people of his country to look to any other source for the defence of our Government. Arm and instruct your militia, and we are safe from invasion of any description and from any quarter. This he was aware would not be done so long as we lavished away our money on regular armies, fortifications, and military academies. But, sir, said he, if we go on with our system of aristocracy, we may soon lose sight of first principles; we may pamper a few favorites of the wealthy at the expense of the Government, and neglect the poor and the orphan, until our Government may become so corrupt and oppressive that the people ought not to defend it.

H. OF R.

Proceedings.

He said he believed the tendency of all Governments was towards aristocracy, and he feared our Government was going the same course. He believed it was our duty to guard against such things; for, said he, if we nurse them and encourage their growth a little longer, they will acquire such strength, such an interest will be interwoven and formed around them, as to bid defiance to all attempts to put them down. This, he said, must be obvious to all who have turned their attention in the least to the progress of the European Governments. He said he knew the task he had taken on himself was a very unpleasant one; that he would be subjected to the remarks of many who felt a deep interest in this institution, but it would not deter him from the discharge of his duty. His own situation in life, he said, would probably enable him to enjoy the benefits of this institution, should it be kept up, at some future day; and, could he be influenced by his own personal interest, he could, without running even the risk of being charged with a neglect of duty, have remained silent on the subject. But, sir, said he, so long as I entertain the opinions I now do respecting this monstrous system of aristocracy, that many gentlemen are so fond of, I cannot, in the discharge of that duty I owe to myself and my country, look on this growing evil without at least making an effort, however feeble it may be, to check its growth or put it out of existence, whatever feelings may be excited among honorable members of this House, or those who enjoy the benefits of this institution, or are concerned in its direction or administration. He thought some regard ought always to be had to the equal distribution of the favors and benefits of this Government; but that, if any partiality or favor was shown, it should be in favor of the weaker part, and not the strong; and he hoped this principle would never be lost sight of. But, said he, we all know that the benefit of this institution has not been enjoyed by the poor nor the helpless heretofore. It is placed entirely out of their reach. It has been, with very few exceptions, enjoyed by wealthy people, who are competent to educate their sons at their own expense anywhere without any assistance from the Government. And, sir, said he, turn and twist it which way you will, I can view it as nothing more or less than robbing the poor to increase the wealth and splendor of the rich. This course, he said, had been pursued too long already, and he called on gentlemen to consider the consequences that would inevitably result from such a course of legislation, and pause before they made the decision.

Mr. CLAY submitted a resolution "that it is inexpedient at this time to abolish the Military Academy at West Point."

Those who supported the affirmative and negative sides of this proposition, in debate, were as follows: Affirmative—Messrs. CLAY, WOOD, CAMPBELL, FOOT, TOMLINSON, FULLER, SMITH of Maryland, SMYTH of Virginia, BLOOMFIELD, BROWN, and CASE. Negative—Messrs. LIVERMORE, ROSS, STEVENS, WALKER, SMITH of North Carolina, and CANNON.

Among the supporters of the Academy, Mr. CAMPBELL, and perhaps others, were of opinion the number of students might be reduced one half, and of course the expenditure proportionably.

A motion was made to strike out the syllable in from Mr. CLAY's motion, so as to make it read expedient instead of inexpedient. This motion was negatived, after a division, in which it was supported by forty-one votes, and Mr. CLAY's motion prevailed by a like majority.

The Committee then rose and reported their agreement to this resolution; and also reported, with amendments, the Military Appropriation bill.

SATURDAY, March 11.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting to Congress a report from the Director of the Mint, of the operations of that institution during the last year.

Among the petitions to-day, was one from the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Philadelphia, praying that the system established by law of allowing a credit for the duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, may not be changed to a cash payment of said duties; which was referred, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, the Committee on Roads and Canals were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the appointment of commissioners to view and mark out a road, as a continuation of the national road from Wheeling, in Virginia, to the seat of government of the State of Ohio; thence to the contemplated seat of government of the State of Indiana; thence to the seat of government of the State of Illinois; and thence to St. Charles, on the Missouri river, on the nearest direction, and on the best ground that can be selected.

A motion was made by Mr. RHEA, that the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill to revive and continue in force an act, entitled "An act to provide for persons who were disabled by known wounds received in the Revolutionary war, and for other purposes," be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

And, the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

The Committee on Roads and Canals were discharged from so much of the resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, referred to them on the 9th instant, as relates to a pre-emption in the purchase of lands for sites of courthouses for certain counties in that State, and it was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Claims, made on the 28th January last, unfavorable to the petition of Phineas Andrews, and Mr. CULPEPER moved to reverse the report; which motion was negatived, and the report was agreed to.

On motion, the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill making further appropriations of money for continuing the work upon the centre building of the Capitol, and for other purposes, was discharged from the consideration thereof, and it was committed to the Committee of the Whole to whom is committed the bill making appropriations for the support of the Government for 1820.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment for the year 1820.

On the question to concur in filling the blank for medical, hospital, and quartermaster's stores, with $500,000, a debate was commenced by Mr. COCKE, of Tennessee—opposition being made to it by him on the ground of hostility to the Missouri expedition.

The further prosecution of that expedition was supported and opposed by the following gentlemen: Affirmative—Messrs. SIMKINS, STROTHER, SMITH of Maryland, COOK, QUARLES, SMITH of Virginia, RHEA, and SERGEANT. Negative—Messrs. COCKE, STORRS, HARDIN, ROSS, and FOOT.

The question being taken on agreeing to the proposed sum of $500,000 for this item of expenditure, it was decided thus: For this amount 70, against it 75.

So the House refused to concur with the Committee of the Whole in filling the blank with this sum. And, without proceeding further in the bill, the House adjourned, at near 4 o'clock.

MONDAY, March 13.

On motion of Mr. PINDALL, the House proceeded to the consideration of the motion submitted by him some weeks ago, for amending the rules of the 16th Con. 1st Sess.—52

House, so as to oblige the Stenographers admitted within the walls to be under oath, &c.

This proposition was supported by Messrs. PINDALL and CANNON, and was opposed by Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, SIMKINS, WARFIELD, and WALKER.

On the question to agree thereto, it was decided in the negative, without a division. So the motion was rejected.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit "An act for the relief of John Harding, Giles Harding, John Shute, and John Nichols;" "An act for the relief of Gabriel Godfrey;" and "An act for the relief of Joseph Lefevre"—in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House then again proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment for the year 1820.

And the question being on filling the blank for the amount of appropriation for the Quartermaster's Department—the House having on Saturday refused to fill it with $500,000—

Mr. COOK moved to fill it with $400,000; thus reducing it a hundred thousand, with a view to arresting the Missouri Expedition.

Mr. TRIMBLE moved to fill it with $480,000. He intimated his opinion, that, after what had passed indicative of the views of this House, and particularly under the present aspect of our foreign relations, the expedition would be restricted to the Council Bluffs. But, even in retracing its steps, &c., certain expenses must be incurred, to the same amount, or very nearly, as if the expedition had gone on.

Now again commenced the debate on the merits of the expedition to the Yellow Stone, or rather to the Mandan villages; when the following gentlemen supported and opposed the prosecution of the expedition. Affirmative—Messrs. HOLMES, STROTHER, BROWN, FORD, GROSS of New York, COOK, NELSON, and RHEA. Negative—Messrs. SOUTHARD, FLOYD, JOHNSON, COCKE, FOOT, and STORRS.

Mr. HOLMES had moved to fill the blank with $495,000; being, in effect, a proposition to retain the appropriation for the prosecution of the Missouri expedition to its ultimate objects.

At the close of the debate, the question on this proposition was decided, by yeas and nays, by the following vote: For that sum, 77; against it 85.

On Mr. TRIMBLE's motion, the vote was for his motion, 77; against it, 84.

On motion of Mr. COBB to fill the blank with $450,000, (predicated on the maintenance of the expedition at the Council Bluffs,) the question was not taken by yeas and nays, but was decided affirmatively, by a large majority; and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 14.

Mr. SMYTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill concerning the Military Academy; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. SLOCUMB, the Committee on the Judiciary were directed to inquire, and report to this House, whether any, and, if any, what, measures are necessary to be taken for the greater security of debts due the United States in consequence of certain loans of powder, lead, and other munitions belonging to Government, having been made to private citizens, by an officer of the United States.

On motion of Mr. COBB, the President of the United States was requested to communicate to this House any information which may have been received by the Department of State, or other Executive department, of the amount of claims of the citizens of the United States for Spanish spoiliations upon their property and commerce, or those for which the Spanish Government are held responsible.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the satisfaction of unlocated warrants, which have issued to officers and soldiers of the Virginia line on continental establishment; and, also, for the emanation of patents, in cases where locations have been made, and patents not obtained; and Messrs. CAMPBELL, BEECHER, NELSON of Virginia, BROWN, and SLOAN, were appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. BLOOMFIELD submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That Brigadier General Boyd, of the Army of the United States in the late war with Great Britain, be admitted within the House of Representatives.

The said resolution being read, Mr. FLOYD moved to lay the same on the table; which motion was negatived, and the resolve was agreed to.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of John Harding, Giles Harding, John Shute, and John Nichols; An act for the relief of Gabriel Godfrey; and An act for the relief of Joseph Lefevre, were read twice, and severally referred to the Committee of Claims.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Mary Cassin, widow and administratrix of Patrick Cassin, deceased; An act for the relief of Robert Swartwout; and An act for the relief of Rosalie P. Deslonde; in which last mentioned bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury, "relative to the progress that has been made in building the lighthouse at the mouth of the Mississippi," rendered in obedience to the resolution of the 9th instant; which was ordered to lie on the table.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment for the year 1820.

The item of fortifications next presenting itself for consideration—and the question being on concurrence with the Committee of the Whole, in filling the blank for the amount with the sum of eight hundred thousand dollars—

Mr. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, said he was opposed to the appropriation of $800,000 for fortification; $500,000 only was appropriated last year, and that sum will continue the work this year. You cannot expect to complete your works of defence, on an extensive coast, in one year, nor in many years. Very large sums have been expended in works of defence annually, and more than twelve millions have been expended since the year 1789. Now our Treasury is empty, we are required to increase this expenditure $300,000. You are told that contracts are made; that the Secretary wants the money; that he must have it; nothing less than he demands will do. This plea of necessity you have at every session. If you propose a reduction of the expenditures, you are charged with want of confidence in the departments. Thus, sir, you are the humble servant of the Executive. Passing appropriation bills has become a matter of course. It is even considered uncivil to hesitate in giving the sum demanded. You may as well authorize, by a general act, each Department to use what money they may want, if it is in the Treasury, and, if not, to loan it. You are told that you cannot refuse the money they ask. If you believe they waste the money, you must impeach them, or pass resolutions about them. Sir, the Treasurer informs us that there will be a deficit of five millions of dollars: that "whether we augment the revenue or diminish the expenditure, a loan will be necessary." If you propose a reduction of the Army, there is a cry of war, and a war bill is laid on your table. If you propose to abolish the Military Academy, that sink of dissipation, you are told that military science will be forgotten, and martial spirit and ardor will become extinct in your country. If you propose to stay your hand in fortifying your extensive coast and building islands in the sea, large specks of war are seen; your cities will be demolished, unless the work is done without delay. Sir, your expenditures are increasing faster than your revenue. The Treasurer informs us, in his report on the bank, that our currency has fallen, in three years, from one hundred and ten millions to forty-five millions of dollars, and that our exports have sunk in foreign markets fifty per cent.; that general distress pervades our country. If this be correct, his estimate of the revenue from customs will prove too high, and, I fear, from the sale of public lands also. He says, in the same report, "whether commerce, splendid mansions, or public lands, be the object of desire, the means by which the gratification is to be secured are bank credits." Sir, the Government, as well as individuals, must economize, or our situation will become deplorable. A public debt is not a public blessing. Your debt is now about ninety millions of dollars. Make another war, and add ninety millions more, and the fate of the nation is fixed. Economy and retrenchment seemed to be the order of the day at the commencement of the session. These are delicious words to the readers of Congressional speeches; but they will soon depreciate, like your currency, unless you give them force and meaning by your acts. Long speeches about economy, such as we had about slavery, will not suffice with the people. You must curtail your expenditures, or the people will not submit to your power. They will elect men who will diminish their burdens.

Mr. COCKE, opposed the filling the blank with the amount, and Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, defended it.

The question was decided affirmatively, by yeas and nays, 103 votes to 51, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Archer of Virginia, Baldwin, Barbour, Bateman, Bayly, Bloomfield, Boden, Brown, Brush, Buffum, Butler of Louisiana, Case, Cobb, Cook, Crawford, Crowell, Cushman, Cuthbert, Darlington, Davidson, Dennison, Dewitt, Dickinson, Dowse, Earle, Edwards of Connecticut, Fisher, Floyd, Folger, Ford, Fuller, Fullerton, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of Delaware, Hibshman, Hill, Holmes, Hooks, Hostetter, Johnson, Kent, Kinsey, Kinsley, Lathrop, Little, Linn, Lowndes, Lyman, Maclay, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Kentucky, Mason, Meech, Meigs, S. The question was taken to concur with the Committee of the Whole in their amendment to fill the blank attached to the item "for cannon and shot, to fulfil existing contracts, and for the purchase of flints and timber for travelling carriages," with the sum of "forty-three thousand dollars;" and determined in the negative.

The blank was then filled with the sum of "fifty-three thousand dollars."

On the question to concur with the Committee of the Whole in striking out the clause making an appropriation for the completion of the arsenal at Augusta, in Georgia—

Some debate took place between Messrs. COBB, SMITH, of Maryland, REIN, and CUTHBERT, on the subject. When, on the question being taken, the House refused to strike out that clause; and agreed to fill the blank with the sum of $27,000, viz: $25,000 for the completion of the arsenal, and $2,000 for draining the marsh near it.

The next item which excited attention, was that which embraces an appropriation of $2,776,000 for the payment of the military and Revolutionary pensioners. Hereupon arose a debate. It began by Mr. BARBOUR's objecting to the amount of this appropriation, because of his intention to propose certain restrictive provisions on the subject, which, if adopted, would reduce the number of Revolutionary pensioners. The debate was kept up with some animation until near four o'clock; when the House decided, by yeas and nays, to agree to the above amount of appropriation, being necessary to the payment of the pensions actually granted.

The yeas and nays stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Allen of Tennessee, Baker, Baldwin, Bateman, Bayly, Bloomfield, Boden, Brush, Buffum, Butler of New Hampshire, Butler of Louisiana, Case, Clagett, Clark, Cook, Cushman, Cuth-

Smyth of Virginia, Smith of North Carolina, Strother, Swearingen, Tarr, Terrell, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Walker, Williams of Virginia, and Williams of North Carolina—57.

The amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole being gone through, the said bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, March 15.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting statements of the sums which have been actually paid, since the peace establishment, to the general officers and their staff, specifying particularly on what account, to whom, and when paid, rendered in obedience to the resolution of the 7th of January last; which was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. HOOKS, the Committee were instructed to inquire into the expediency of having buoys placed on certain parts of the coast and inlets of the State of North Carolina, to direct vessels in to the different channels.

Accompanying the above resolution, is a letter from the Governor of North Carolina to Mr. HOOKS, enclosing a report of the civil engineer of that State, showing the necessity of placing buoys on its coast and inlets.

On motion of Mr. RANKIN, the Committee of Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a port of entry at the mouth of Pascagoula, in the State of Mississippi.

On motion of Mr. SHAW,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to lay before this House the amount of money received under the act providing for the deduction of two per cent. from the sale of prizes captured by private armed vessels, and condemned under the laws of the United States of America, for the benefit of the disabled officers and seamen of such private armed vessels;

also the number of invalids, together with the amount of the pensions charged upon that fund, as well as the amount paid to the widows and children of such officers and seamen, slain in such service, and the amount of the balance, if any, remaining in the hands of the Treasurer, of the above fund unapplied.

Mr. SLOCUMB moved that the House do now proceed to consider the joint resolution submitted by him on the 6th instant, to fix the period for the termination of the present Congress. The motion was negatived.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: 1. An act for the relief of Mary Cassin, widow and administratrix of Patrick Cassin, deceased; 2. An act for the relief of Robert Swartwout; and, 3. An act for the relief of Rosalie P. Deslonde; were severally read twice and referred, the first and third to the Committee of Claims, and the second to the Committee of Ways and Means.

An engrossed bill, entitled, "An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1820," was read the third time, and passed.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The remainder of the day was spent in Committee of the Whole, on the appropriation bill for the payment of the civil list.

Considerable discussion took place on some of the items of the bill; particularly on that appropriating the salary of a thousand dollars to the reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court. A motion to strike out that clause failed by a large majority.

The Committee had not gone through the bill at half-past three o'clock, when the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, March 16.

Mr. BEECHER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported "A bill to authorize the Secretary of State to cause the laws of Michigan Territory to be printed and distributed;" which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. ERVIN, the Committee on the District of Columbia were instructed to inquire into the expediency of so far altering the law for selling real estate for taxes, in the said District, as to allow to minors the right of the equity of redemption, two years after they shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, by complying with the conditions now required by law.

Mr. FOOR submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing, or amending the act, entitled "An act to regulate and fix the compensation of the clerks in the different offices," passed April 20, 1818.

The resolution being read, was amended, by striking out the Committee of Ways and Means, and inserting a select committee; and the question being taken on agreeing to the said resolution, as amended, it was determined in the negative.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The remainder of the day was occupied in debate on the civil appropriation bill; and chiefly on the clause which proposes an appropriation of one hundred and forty-one thousand dollars "for completing the contracts for constructing the road from Washington, Pennsylvania, to Wheeling, made during the year 1817."

On this there was a rather animated debate; Mr. SLOCUMB having moved to strike it out of the bill. The objections to it were, principally, 1. To the power of Congress to construct roads at all; and, 2. To the nature of the contracts, some of which it was suggested had originated in collusion and fraud.

After deciding the question on Mr. SLOCUMB'S motion in the negative, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 17.

Mr. SAMPSON presented a petition of Moses Elias Levy, stating that he has lately arrived in the United States, and intends to become a citizen thereof, as soon as the laws upon the subject of naturalization will permit; and praying that he may, in the mean time, be authorized to purchase and hold real estate in the territories of the United States.—Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of Frederick Goetz and Carl W. Westphal, and of the heirs of Abraham Neppes, deceased;" and "An act for the relief of Gabriel Godfroy," made reports thereon, and recommending that the said bills be postponed indefinitely.

The said bills and reports, severally, were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS also reported the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Mary Cassin, widow and administratrix of Patrick Cassin, deceased," without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Robert Swartwout," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. ROBERTSON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the consent of Congress be, and the same is hereby, given to a compact, or agreement, made and concluded by and between the States of Kentucky and Tennessee, at Frankfort, in Kentucky, on the second day of February, 1820, to adjust and establish the boundary line between them, and for other purposes.

The resolution was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill to authorize the Secretary of State to cause the laws of Michigan Territory to be printed and distributed, was read the third time, and passed.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which is as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

It being stipulated by the fourth article of the articles of agreement and cession, entered into on the 24th of April, 1802, with the State of Georgia, that the United States should, at their own expense, extinguish, for the use of that State, as soon as it might be done on reasonable terms, the Indian title to all lands within its limits; and the Legislature of Georgia being desirous to make a further acquisition of said lands at this time, presuming that it may be done on reasonable terms; and it being also represented that property of considerable value, which had been taken by the Creek and Cherokee Indians from citizens of Georgia, the restoration of which had been provided for by different treaties, but which has never been made, it is proposed to hold a treaty with those nations, and more particularly with the Creeks, in the course of this Summer; for the attainment of these objects, I submit the subject to the consideration of Congress, that a sum adequate to the expenses attending such a treaty may be appropriated, should Congress deem it expedient.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 17, 1820.

The Message was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Another Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which is as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with statements of the annual expenditures made in the construction of the road leading from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio, from the year 1806 to the year 1820.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 17, 1820.

The Message was read, and also ordered to lie on the table.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the appropriation bill for defraying the civil expenses of the Government.

Mr. CORB, of Georgia, moved to amend the same, by inserting the following appropriation:

"For holding a treaty with the Creek and Cherokee nations of Indians, for the purpose of procuring a further extinguishment of the Indian title to all the lands within the limits of Georgia, pursuant to the fourth condition of the first article of the articles of agreement and cession concluded between the United States and the State of Georgia, on the 24th day of April, 1802, the sum of thirty thousand dollars."

Mr. CORB followed his motion with the following remarks:

Mr. Chairman, although the subject-matter of the motion just submitted may excite but little interest in the Committee, on account of its local application, yet it is one of very great importance to the State of Georgia. It is the same which was submitted by me a few days past, during the discussion of the military appropriation bill, but which was withdrawn, from a suggestion that it could be attached to this bill with greater propriety. Uninteresting as my remarks may prove, I ask the patient indulgence of the Committee to a plain statement of facts, showing not simply the propriety of the appropriation, but an undoubted obligation on the General Government to accomplish the purposes for which it is asked, as soon as possible. If this obligation is not shown, I shall not expect my motion to succeed.

H. OF R.

General Appropriation Bill.

The object of the appropriation is to defray the expenses of a treaty or treaties with the Creek and Cherokee Indians, for obtaining an extinguishment of their title to all the lands within the limits of Georgia, according to the stipulations of the agreement referred to in the motion. From the public prints my colleagues and myself have learned that this subject has engaged the serious attention of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, at their late session, and that a memorial has been addressed by that body to the Executive of the United States, remonstrating against a longer delay in fulfilling this agreement. Although it would seem, from the terms in which this document is mentioned in the newspapers, that the Senators and Representatives from Georgia were required to afford their aid in giving to it some effect, it is acknowledged on my part, and I presume I may make the same acknowledgment for the whole delegation, that no notice of its transmission has been received, either from any person in the State of Georgia, or at this place. But a knowledge, however derived, that the Legislature of Georgia have acted upon this subject, is deemed of sufficient authority by me for bringing the claims of that State before Congress, which is the only branch of the Government before which I could venture to offer them, without being deemed officious. It is true that claims from Georgia have not heretofore met with the most favorable reception even from Congress, but this circumstance shall not deter me from discharging my duty.

At the close of the Revolutionary war, and indeed at a much later period, the State of Georgia found herself possessed of an extensive territory, with very limited pecuniary resources, and a population inconsiderable as to numbers. In addition to the extent of surface now embraced within her boundaries, she claimed, by an undoubted title, all that fine region of country now forming the States of Mississippi and Alabama, with the exception of that portion of West Florida which has been added to them. By the adoption of the Federal Constitution, in common with the other States, she imposed upon herself a prohibition to make war, or conclude treaties, and thus lost the power to extinguish the Indian title to the lands she thus claimed, by conquest or purchase; and it is worthy of remark, that, after this event, the General Government never did extinguish the Indian title to one acre of her lands for her benefit, until after the conclusion of the articles of agreement and cession. The consequence was, that her population and resources were but little increased for a period of fifteen years. Her wish, united with her inability, to increase them, induced her to yield to the invitation of the Government of the Union, and on the 24th April, 1802, the cession was made. It is true that, in this instrument, another consideration ($1,250,000) is mentioned. But it will not be contended that this inconsiderable sum can be declared an adequate price for the relinquishment of a territory so extensive and valuable. Indeed, it is mentioned in the first condition of the first article, that this sum was paid by the United States "as a consideration for the expenses incurred by the State of Georgia in relation to the said territory." How and upon what account these expenses were incurred, I am not fully informed, nor is it necessary to be shown. That considerable debts were contracted, and that some of them probably yet remain unpaid, I have strong reasons to believe. There can be no doubt that the leading consideration was that which I have mentioned—a desire to extend the bounds of her white population, and thus to increase her strength and her respectability in the Union.

To judge simply by the face of the map, it would appear that the State of Georgia yet has an extent of territory reserved to herself equal, or nearly equal, in square miles to any other State in the Union. This is admitted. But let it not be thence inferred that she will be equally rich and populous. Fully one-half, and perhaps more, of that surface, is of that description of land called pine barren, and is remarkable only for its poverty. Another portion is too mountainous and sterile to admit of a dense population. Perhaps, also, it may not be generally understood in the Committee, that the Indian title to fully one-half, and probably the most valuable half, of the lands within the boundaries of the State is yet unextinguished. Fully two-thirds of the part to which it has been extinguished is of the description I have mentioned, to wit: a wild barren waste of pine lands, or mountain peaks and ridges not more susceptible of cultivation. Her valuable lands are yet possessed by the Indians. To these circumstances are to be attributed the small population of the State, and the paucity of her Representatives on this floor. Surpassed in extent of surface by few other States, Georgia is yet called one of the small States. The Committee will be able to judge whether she intended to fix upon herself this title, after hearing the following portion of the articles of cession read. The fourth condition of the first of those articles is as follows:

"That the United States shall, at their own expense, extinguish, for the use of Georgia, as early as the same can be peaceably obtained on reasonable terms, the Indian title to the county of Tallassee; and the lands left out by the line drawn with the Creeks, in the year 1798, which had been previously granted by the State of Georgia, both which tracts had formerly been yielded by the Indians, and to the lands within the forks of Oconee and Oakmulgee rivers, for which several objects the President of the United States has directed that a treaty should be immediately held with the Creeks, and that the United States shall, in the same manner, also extinguish the Indian title to all the other lands within the State of Georgia."

MARCH, 1820.

H. of R.

Before I proceed further, to inquire whether the United States have fulfilled, as far as they could, this condition, it may not be improper to mention that the "county of Tallassee" was a strip of pine barren land of little value. "The land left out by the line drawn with the Creeks in 1798" was another strip of about thirty miles in length and four in breadth, also of little value. Although once yielded by the Indians, possession of these had been resumed, in consequence of an improper marking of the line between the whites and Indians. The "lands in the forks of Oconee and Ocmulgee rivers" were obtained soon after the execution of the articles, and are the only valuable lands which have been since acquired "for the use of Georgia."

In remarking upon the clause of the article just read, I request the Committee to observe, that in another part of the contract it is called an "express condition," and that the cession of territory by Georgia is declared to be "subject thereto." Nothing can be more explicit than is the nature and extent of the obligation imposed upon the Government of the United States by this condition. "They shall, in the same manner, that is, "at their own expense," and "as early as the same can be peaceably obtained upon reasonable terms," also extinguish the Indian title to all the other lands within the State of Georgia." The words sufficiently explain themselves, and lead at once to the inquiry, Has this condition been complied with by the Federal Government? Has this obligation been discharged, or even facilities to its speedy discharge created? It is demonstrable that the United States have done neither the one nor the other. A particular reference to the words and terms of all the treaties which have since been held with the Creek and Cherokee Indians would prove more tiresome than instructive. I will only advert to them from memory, promising to give more particular explanations if necessary. With the exception of the treaty or treaties alluded to in the clause as being "directed" for obtaining the lands in the forks of the Oconee and Ocmulgee rivers, no others were subsequently held with the Creek Indians by which any lands were acquired for Georgia until the Treaty of Fort Jackson, in 1814. By that, the United States acquired, for themselves, that fine rich region since formed into the State of Alabama. Could not this obligation of the General Government have then been discharged? Could not an extensive and valuable acquisition have then been obtained, of lands within the limits of Georgia? What cause could have prevented it? If it was thought impolitic that the whole acquisition should be within Georgia, why not a part? Shall I be told that a part was in Georgia? It is true—but such a part! so poor, so barren is its quality, (circumstances that must have been known,) as that, instead of being of use, and valuable, it proved a burden upon the people of the State. If brought into market tomorrow, it would not command a price sufficient to discharge the expense of surveying it: and it is a fact, that, for this very reason, the Legislature of Georgia have never directed it to be surveyed until within the last year. It may be possible, however, that more could not have been acquired in Georgia. I will not say it could. But I can discover no reason why it could not. Since this period, some other lands have been purchased of the Creeks, but they are too inconsiderable to be further noticed.

With the Cherokees also, various treaties and various purchases of land have been made, but not for the "use of Georgia," or in the fulfilment of the articles of cession. The lands situated in the Great Bend of Tennessee, forming the rich county of Madison, have been purchased. At that time an extinguishment of Indian title to lands in Georgia could have been obtained. The Cherokee land, adjacent to the Georgia frontier, is of a quality inferior to those of Madison county. The Cherokees could, therefore, have had no objection to selling the former in preference to the latter. It may well be doubted, however, whether this contract with Georgia was then even thought of. Since that period other purchases have been made of the Cherokees, but for whom? Partly for Georgia, I admit, but the land is of little value. With the exception of the reservations made in favor of particular Indians, the larger portion of it is unfit for profitable cultivation, and none of it rich. It differs from the land obtained for Georgia, by the Treaty of Fort Jackson, in this—the one is a flat pine barren country; the other scarcely less barren, but mountainous. The purchases of value which have been made are situate, not in Georgia, but in Tennessee, with whom, or whose parent, (North Carolina) no such contract exists, for the extinguishment of the Indian titles. In thus alluding to the acquisition of land made by Tennessee to the evident injury of Georgia, I would not be understood as envying the prosperity of that State; I feel no such envy, nor do the people of the State I in part represent. On the contrary, I but use their own language, in saying that they always rejoice on beholding the rapid march of any of the States to respectability. But, as I have said, by express contract no obligation is imposed upon the United States to extinguish the Indian title to lands in Tennessee; yet it has been rapidly extinguished to the whole of them, with a very small exception, and the population of Tennessee now does, or shortly will, extend from North Carolina to the Mississippi; and after the next census, in all human probability, her representation upon this floor will be double that of Georgia. In adverting to this system of favoritism, (I know no better name for it,) I would do it rather as a fact, by which to show the obligation of the United States, under this contract, to be increased and strengthened, if possible, and not for the purpose of manifesting any jealousy at the rising greatness of that State. It is her duty to promote her own interests in the best manner she can. But I have a right to show, that, in thus contributing to the prosperity of Tennessee, the General Government have forgotten their obligations to Georgia, who was one of "the good old thirteen States," as they have been called; who aided in the struggle for independence; feebly indeed, but with all the resources she possessed, and who yielded a country almost a little empire in itself for the express purpose of obtaining the means of more speedily acquiring the portion she had reserved for herself. To this very end were the articles of cession concluded. She, however, has the mortification to discover that her exertions have been in vain, or have only retarded the end she had in view. States whose names were scarcely known a few years past, have sprung up around her. Kentucky, Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, and in the very territory she ceded, Mississippi and Alabama, have all been formed and admitted into the Union since the adoption of the Constitution. With an extent of boundary that should place her upon an equality with any, she is likely to be outstripped by all of them. She alone, of all these, seems doomed to be a "small State."

I have, heretofore, inquired whether the United States had increased the facilities to the discharge of their obligation under these articles? I much fear that all the measures they have pursued with Indians have had a contrary tendency. Let us look at the facts. Two-thirds of the Creek nation, and the whole of the Cherokee nation, with one exception, are within the State of Georgia. By wars, and by treaties, the Indians, instead of having been driven from her frontiers have been driven upon them. Urged from the confines of Tennessee, Alabama, and Florida, they are now pent up within that portion of their nation which is in the limits of Georgia, within that very portion to which the United States, eighteen years ago, engaged to extinguish their title. If rumor is to be credited, their numbers are soon to be increased by the Indians of Florida, who are to be removed in the event of the ratification of the late treaty with Spain. I will say no more on this subject, except to call the attention of the Committee to one other act to which the United States are a party; I mean an article of the Treaty of Fort Jackson, upon which I shall leave the Committee to place their own construction. The second article of that treaty is as follows:

"The United States will guaranty to the Creek nation the integrity of all their territory eastwardly and northwardly of the said line, to be run and described as mentioned in the first article."

Now, the Creek territory east and north of this line is, for the most part, in the State of Georgia. To suppose that this article means nothing, would be doing injustice as well to those who negotiated the treaty as to the Government which ratified it. Against whose claims or pretensions, unless those of Georgia are intended, or for what objects, was this "guaranty of integrity of territory" made? It is not my intention to answer the question. The words are plain, and can as well be understood by the Committee as by me. I will only observe that the article has a strange coincidence with other acts of the Government, inspiring a belief that the power of executing its contract with Georgia has been voluntarily placed beyond its control.

At present, I know of no other method by which this condition of the cession, on the part of the United States, can be performed, but by a removal of the Indians. That this measure, under any circumstances, would be good policy, will not be doubted. In 1817, the people of Georgia were inspired with a hope that this would be speedily done, under a treaty concluded with the Cherokees by Governor McMinn, and Generals Jackson and Merriwether. By this an arrangement was made for the removal of a large part of that nation to territory of the United States west of the Mississippi. A part of the nation have removed. The arrangement, substantially, was an exchange of territory. A census was to be taken, and in the proportion of the numbers who might migrate to the west, lands on the east of the Mississippi should be ceded to the United States. However great the hope of substantial benefit the State of Georgia might sustain from this treaty, she has been disappointed in the result. Indeed, the whole arrangement seems to be at an end. Although all the Indians inhabiting the "lower towns" (and, of course, principally in Georgia,) were desirous of removing only twelve months before, it seems by a subsequent treaty, concluded at this place in 1819, that a "greater part of the Cherokee nation" now desire to remain on the east of the Mississippi "in order to commence those measures necessary for their civilization, and the preservation of their nation." It is true that by each of these cessions more lands were yielded by the Indians. But, as usual, the valuable part of them is within other States, with whom the United States have no contract. Unproductive hills and mountains are the portion of Georgia. When she may look forward for the execution of this contract, so necessary for her prosperity, I cannot tell. Of one thing I am certain, if not speedily done, I shall lose all hope of its ever being performed.

The motion was supported also by Mr. CUTHBERT and Mr. ABBOTT of Georgia. Messrs. RHEA, LIVERMORE, and CAMPBELL, also engaged in the debate.

The motion was agreed to by a large majority.

In the progress of the bill, a motion was made to strike out of the appropriation for the expenses of the commission under the 5th article of the Treaty of Ghent, so much as provides a compensation for an agent under that treaty; and, after a short debate, the motion was agreed to without a division.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE moved to amend the bill by introducing an appropriation of twenty thousand dollars, to defray the expenses of extinguishing the Indian title to land in the Territory of Michigan.

The motion was supported by Mr. WOODBRIDGE and Mr. Ross, and was agreed to without a division.

The bill was then reported to the House with sundry amendments; and the question presented itself on concurring in certain of the amendments.

Some discussion took place on several of them.

On the question to concur with the Committee of the Whole in filling the blank for the appropriation of one hundred and forty-one thousand dollars, to be applied to the payment for contracts made in the year 1817 for making the great Cumberland road, the yeas and nays were taken, and stood—for the appropriation, 90; against it, 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Virginia, Bayly, Beecher, Bloomfield, Brown, Brush, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Case, Cobb, Cook, Crawford, Crowell, Culpeper, Cushman, Cuthbert, Darlington, Davidson, Eddy, Ervin, Fisher, Fuller, Fullerton, Gross of New York, Guyon, Hall of Delaware, Hardin, Hazard, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibbsman, Hill, Holmes, Hostetter, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Kent, Kinsey, Lathrop, Little, Lincoln, Lowndes, Lyman, Maclay, McCreary, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Kentucky, Mason, Mercer, Metcalf, Murray, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Newton, Patterson, Philson, Pinckney, Pindall, Pitcher, Plumer, Rankin, Reed, Rich, Robertson, Ross, Sergeant, Silsbee, Simkins, Sloan, Smith of New Jersey, Smith of Maryland, B. Smyth of Virginia, Stevens, Storrs, Street, Strong of New York, Swearingen, Tarr, Terrell, Tomlinson, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Warfield, and Williams of Virginia.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Baker, Baldwin, Barbour, Bateman, Boden, Bryan, Buffum, Burwell, Butler of New Hampshire, Cannon, Clagett, Clark, Cocke, Crafts, Dennison, Earle, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of North Carolina, Fay, Floyd, Folger, Foot, Ford, Forrest, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hall of New York, Hall of North Carolina, Heister, Hooks, Johnson, Kendall, Kinsley, Linn, McCoy, Mallary, Marchand, Meigs, R. Moore, S. Moore, Morton, Nelson of Virginia, Overstreet, Parker of Massachusetts, Parker of Virginia, Phelps, Randolph, Rhea, Richards, Richmond, Rogers, Russ, Sampson, Settle, Shaw, Slocumb, Smith of North Carolina, Strong of Vermont, Strother, Tompkins, Tracy, Tucker of South Carolina, Wendover, Williams of North Carolina, and Wood.

So the appropriation was concurred in.

Objection was made to the appropriation of six thousand dollars for paying to Mr. Trumbull the third payment on account of his contract for four National Paintings; on the delivery of the second of which, now nearly completed, this money will be payable to him. The principal objection to the appropriation was, that the money is not yet due.

The appropriation passed, in the end, by 76 votes to 54; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SATURDAY, March 18.

On motion of Mr. CROWELL, the Committee on Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a lighthouse on Mobile Point, in the State of Alabama.

On motion of Mr. ANDERSON, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law more effectually for reclaiming persons held to service or labor in one State, and escaping therefrom into another State, and that the Committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise; and Messrs. ANDERSON, PINDALL, and STORRS, were appointed the said committee.

The bill from the Senate to suspend, for a further time, the sale or forfeiture of lands for failure in completing the payments thereon, was reported by Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, without amendment.

After some conversation between Messrs. COBB, HENDRICKS, MCCOY, and TAYLOR, as to the proper course to be given to it, whether it should be committed, read a third time at once, or laid on the table; the last course was adopted, yeas 66, nays 52, and the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom had been referred the bill to change the mode of disposing of the public lands, (from credit to cash, &c.,) reported the same with amendments.

[The amendments propose to strike out all that part of the bill which changes the sales from credit to cash payments.]

After a short discussion, as to the proper disposition of the bill, it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The engrossed bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1820, was read the third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

The bill making appropriations for the centre building of the Capitol, and for other purposes, passed through a Committee of the Whole, the sums inserted by the Committee, ($111,789 for the centre building,) agreed to by the House, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to amend the act of March 18th, 1818, providing pensions for persons engaged in the land and naval service in the Revolutionary war. This bill provides—

SEC. 1. That to all persons who are now, or may hereafter be, placed on the pension list of the United States by virtue of the act of the 18th of March, 1818, there shall be paid the following sums, to wit: to every officer who served for the term of nine months, and for a term less than three years, the sum of two hundred and forty dollars per annum, to be paid for and during the term of three years only; to those who served for the term of three years or longer, the sum of two hundred and forty dollars per annum, to be paid for and during the term of three years only; and afterwards, during life, the sum of one hundred and eighty dollars per annum; to every non-commissioned officer, musician, mariner, marine, or private soldier, who served for the term of nine months, and for a term of less than three years, ninety-six dollars per annum, to be paid for and during the term of three years only; to those who served for the term of three years or longer, ninety-six dollars per annum, to be paid for and during the term of three years only; and afterwards, during life, seventy-two dollars per annum: And, provided, That the sums already paid to any pensioner under the said act, shall be considered as constituting part of the sums directed to be paid as aforesaid.

SEC. 2. That the pensions allowed by virtue of the act of 1818 shall be paid to such persons only as shall, in addition to the oath required by that act, take and subscribe, in open court, in the county in which they reside, the following oath: "I, A B, do solemnly swear that I was a resident citizen of the United States, on the 18th day of March, 1818; and that I have not, since the said 18th of March, disposed of my property, or any part thereof, except for the necessary support of myself, (or myself and family, as the case may be,) or in the payment of my just debts, and that I do not now possess, nor have I power to command the means for obtaining for myself (or myself and family, as the case may be,) a comfortable support for the time being. So help me God." The original of which said oath shall be filed in the office of the clerk of the county, for the inspection of grand jurors and others, and a certified copy transmitted to the Secretary of War: and the court shall have direction either to prevent or refuse the oath, as the facts shall appear to justify; the party taking the oath, to be subject to the pains and penalties of perjury for false swearing. And in every case where the pensioner is insane, and incapable of taking an oath, a certificate of the facts, under the direction of the court, shall be deemed equivalent to the above recited oath.

Mr. BLOOMFIELD rose, and, after stating the contemplated effect of this bill, entered into a particular history of the progress of the act of 1818, through the two Houses, the different features it assumed, and its ultimate shape, compared with the bill originally reported by the committee, of which he was chairman, to show that that committee are innocent of having produced the embarrassments which had grown out of that act. To try the question whether the House was willing to repeal the existing act, he concluded by moving to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. CANNON moved to amend the section, by striking out all that part of the first section which allows to officers higher pensions than what is allowed to privates. It would be perceived, Mr. C. said, that the object of this amendment was to place the officers of the Revolutionary army, on the same footing as the soldiers of the Revolutionary army. He had no wish to repeal the act, but this bill contained a principle—that of discrimination—which he could not reconcile to his mind; any other mode would be better than this—they were all citizens and were all entitled, in an act of bounty, to an equal quantum of relief, and to enforce this opinion Mr. C. argued at some length. Mr. C. however, waived his motion to give way for an amendment, which Mr. BARBOUR intimated his intention to offer, which embraced what Mr. C. had in view.

Mr. BARBOUR then submitted, by way of amendment, the following provisions, in lieu of those contained in the bill:

Be it enacted, &c., That every person who now is, or hereafter may be, placed on the pension list of the United States, by virtue of an act of Congress, entitled "An act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States, in the Revolutionary war," passed the 18th of March, 1818, who served for the term of nine months, and for a term less than three years, shall, so soon as he shall have received the amount of two years' pension, as allowed him by the said act, be forthwith stricken from the pension roll; and every person who now is, or hereafter may be, placed on the pension list of the United States, under the act aforesaid, who served for the term of three years, or longer, shall be entitled to receive the amount of the pension allowed him by said act, for the term of two years, from the date of his declaration, and afterwards, during life, — dollars per annum.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no person who now is, or hereafter may be, placed on the pension list of the United States, by virtue of the act aforesaid, shall hereafter receive any part of the provision to which he may be entitled by the said act, as amended by the provisions of this, which shall be due and payable after that which became due 4th March, 1820, until he shall have exhibited to some court of record in the county, city, or borough, in which he resides, a schedule, subscribed by him, containing his whole estate, (wearing apparel excepted,) and shall have, before the said court, taken and subscribed the following oath or affirmation, to wit: "I, A B, do solemnly swear or affirm, (as the case may be,) that I was a resident citizen of the United States on the 18th day of March, 1818, and that I have not, since that time, by gift, sale, or in any manner whatever, disposed of my property, or any part thereof, with intent thereby so to diminish it, as to bring myself within the provisions of an act of Congress, entitled "An act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States, in the Revolutionary war," passed the 18th March, 1818; and that I have not, nor has any person in trust for me, any property; nor have I any securities, contracts, or debts due to me, other than what is contained in the schedule now delivered, and by me subscribed"—nor until the person applying for payment of a pension, shall produce to the Secretary of War a copy of the aforesaid schedule and oath or affirmation, duly certified by the clerk of the court to which the said schedule was delivered, and before which the said oath or affirmation was taken and subscribed, together with the opinion of the said court, also certified by their clerk, of the value of the property contained in the said schedule: Provided, That in every case in which the pensioner may be insane, the court may receive said schedule without the aforesaid oath or affirmation, from the committee or other person authorized to take care of such insane person.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the original schedule, and oath or affirmation, shall be filed in the clerk's office of the court, to which the schedule should be exhibited, and before which the said oath or affirmation shall be taken and subscribed; and any person who shall swear or affirm falsely in the premises, and be thereof convicted, shall suffer as for wicked and corrupt perjury.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the act to which this is an amendment, shall be so construed as that no person shall be entitled to its provisions, whose property is of the value of — dollars, which value shall be taken from the estimation of the court, to which the schedule shall exhibited, and which is heretofore required to be certified to the Secretary of War.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act of the 18th of March, 1818, entitled "An act to provide for certain persons in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war" as is inconsistent with the provisions of this act, shall be and the same is hereby repealed.

Mr. BARBOUR explained to the Committee the substantial object of his amendment. The first object, as would be seen by the first section, was to repeal the law, as to all those who had served for a term less than three years after they shall have received their pensions for two years, and to continue pensions for life to all those who had served three years and upwards, to officers and soldiers an equal sum, after they also shall have received two years' pension according to the act of 1818.

Mr. B. then proceeded to state a good deal at large the inducements which operated on him in voting for the act of 1818. He had voted for that law under the best feelings. He was willing to do an act of benevolence; and he had been influenced, he confessed, not a little by the impressive language of his honorable friend from New Jersey. (Mr. BLOOMFIELD,) who had himself been a conspicuous actor in the scenes of the Revolution, and who had introduced and advocated the bill of 1818; but in giving his sanction to that act of benevolence, Mr. B. had no idea that it would produce so vast a consumption of the public resources. According to the report of the committee of 1818, it was expected that the maximum of pensions to be allowed would be about two hundred thousand dollars; but what was the fact? It was now found that they exceeded that amount by about fifteen times. Mr. B. was then, and was yet, willing to perform towards the soldiers of the Revolution an act of benevolence, but not at a cost which the nation was not prepared to pay.

As to the proposed repeal being inconsistent with the honor of the nation, or, as was said, inconsistent with a vested right, Mr. B. observed, he was not among those would do any thing that was inconsistent with either, and yet he was prepared to vote for a very considerable modification of the law. He argued that the pensions granted could not be deemed a vested right; that the act was one of gratuitous bounty, and not of justice; because, had it been demanded by justice, it could have known no distinction; that, being an act of charity, it continued at the option of the Government; and this opinion Mr. B. illustrated by various arguments. In voting for this modification he did no violence to the benevolence which dictated the first act, because a man was not bound to extend charity to the injury of his own family. To continue the act unmodified would be injurious and unjust to a large portion of the people of this nation, as it would be necessary to raise the amount required by it by laying taxes either directly or indirectly; and he wished that the state of the Treasury might not be such as to coerce the House into the imposition of direct taxes. Let the Committee, Mr. B. said, cast a look over the country and see if there were not thousands and tens of thousands on whom the tax would fall, who were as poor, and infinitely poorer, than thousands of those pensioners for whom the tax would be laid, &c.

Mr. B. again adverted to the details of his amendment. He had singled out those who had served three years and upwards, because it was they who bore the heat and brunt of the war—the campaigns of '77, '78, and '79—in the fields of Monmouth, of Princeton, of Bennington, of Brandywine, &c. A great part of the nine and twelve months' men, were substitutes, and in addition to their pay from their country, received pay as substitutes—in many cases, he had understood, they were double substitutes, serving successive tours as such. Mr. B. thought all who continued to receive pensions, ought to be put on an equal footing; the sum allowed, he would make sufficient to provide for them food and clothing; further than this, it was utterly impossible for the Government to go. In fixing the allowance, the comfortable subsistence of the individuals was all that could be provided for: he could not think of taking their families into view, or entering into considerations of former affluence, &c. To provide relief with such views, or to that extent, would be beyond the ability of the nation to pay, without resorting to the means before alluded to, of laying taxes on the people, &c. In support of the opinions which he advanced in the course of his remarks, Mr. B. entered into a number of arguments and illustrations which, in this brief notice, cannot be presented.

Mr. CULPEPER was willing to strike out the first section of the bill, not however to accept the substitute offered by Mr. BARBOUR, but to agree to the best provisions to guard against imposition. He wished the act, in other respects, to stand as it was; he would not strike off one cent of what these men were justly entitled to by the existing act. Mr. C. said he knew what it was to be a soldier himself, and to serve when a morsel of bread was a luxury. Many, however, took the benefit of this act who were not entitled to it, and he would do every thing to guard against that abuse; but further he would not go. He was against reducing the officer to the level of the soldier. Their habits were different, Mr. C. said, and their talents, and their wants: the officer was of more value to the country, and it would be a bad example, and injurious hereafter to the interest of the nation to put them on the same footing. He thought the distinction made in the act was a good one, and he would not consent to change it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, avowed himself decidedly opposed to the repeal of the law, and consequently against Mr. BARBOUR's amendment, but he would support every proposition tending to give the act a fair and strict construction; and he would therefore take those parts of Mr. B.'s amendments which went to that object. Mr. A. said he was afraid he might have been wrong in voting for the act of 1818, but he was sure he should be right in voting against its repeal. The bounty had been freely offered and continued two years, and, whether right or wrong originally, he would not withdraw it. He was also opposed to the levelling principle. That feature he had been in favor of when the act was under consideration; but Congress then determined against it—the distinction between officers and privates had existed two years, and he was averse now to disturbing it. Mr. A. said, the bounty had been voluntarily offered by Congress; the soldiers of the Revolution had been invited to come forward and receive this boon at the hands of a grateful country; and would it be generous or becoming, because it was found to take more money than was expected, now to revoke the bounty? Mr. A. thought not, and spoke at some length in support of his opinions. He concluded by saying that if the law was defective, or not sufficiently guarded, he would give it additional safeguards; but he would not repeal it, or so modify it as to reduce the allowance of an officer from two hundred and forty to ninety-six dollars.

The Committee then rose, obtained leave to sit again, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, March 20.

Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, presented a remonstrance and memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, remonstrating against the existing mode of adjusting claims to land of a particular description in that State, and suggesting sundry improvements in such system; which remonstrance and memorial were referred to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the "Bill supplementary to the several acts for the adjustment of land claims in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri."

Mr. B. also presented another memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, praying a grant of a lot of public land, as a site for a seminary of learning at Point Coupee; and, also, for a grant of forty acres of public land, as a fund to enable the inhabitants of Point Coupee to keep up a certain portion of the adjacent levee; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of War upon the petition of William Esenbeck, referred to him on the 10th instant; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SILSBEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill to amend the act entitled "An act authorizing the employment of an additional naval force;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole, to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to consider the expediency of providing by law for the payment of a gun and gun-carriage, taken by the enemy and destroyed, at the battle of North Point, on the 12th September, 1814.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act making further appropriations for continuing the work upon the centre building of the Capitol, and other public buildings," was read the third time, and passed.

PROMULGATION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. PINDALL, from the select committee to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of State, of the 7th ultimo, in relation to the publication of the laws in the newspapers, made a report thereon; which was read; when Mr. P., by leave of the House, reported a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the laws of the United States, and for other purposes;" which bill was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table. The report is as follows:

The committee to whom was referred the letter of the Secretary of State, of the 7th February, 1820, in relation to the publication of the laws in the newspapers, report: That the act of the 20th of April, 1818, made an unnecessary increase of the compensation payable to the proprietors of newspapers for the publication of the laws. There had been no difficulty in procuring the publication at the price previously established, and it is believed that the Secretary of State, who is now forced by law to give the increased compensation, could, if authorized to use his discretion, have the business performed on as reasonable terms as before the act of 1818.

The committee cannot believe that the act of 2d March, 1799, (since re-enacted and extended to the Territories,) providing for the publication, in one newspaper of each State, and authorizing the publication in three of the papers, when the publication in one should be found insufficient, was passed, under any expectation that the expense of publication in three newspapers of every State would be incurred, or that it would at any time be found requisite to employ two newspapers in each of the towns of New Haven, Wilmington, Lexington, and Natchez, whilst none were employed in Richmond, Fredericksburg, Petersburg, Fredericktown, Lancaster, or Louisville; or that the publication of the laws in the city of Richmond should be suspended, merely that they might be printed in a county adjacent to the District of Columbia, where three newspapers were engaged at the expense of Government in the same business; or that newspapers, scarcely known out of the county in which they were published, and of a very limited circulation within, would have been selected for this purpose; but, that the law has been thus executed, is evidenced by the letter referred to the committee.

Newspaper publication might afford a cheap method in multiplying copies of the public acts. Few, however, in proportion to the whole number of the patrons of the press, read those publications, and still fewer preserve them; and, for all practical purposes, the publication in volumes or pamphlets is found to be more advantageous.

On subjects of great national concern, the interest of popular editors usually will (as it has hitherto done) furnish a sufficient inducement to inform their customers of the transactions of the Government.

The public derives but small, if any, advantage, from the newspaper publication of Indian treaties; although their insertion, as appears by the letter of the Secretary of State, is among the causes of increasing the expenditure for promulgating the laws, from less than five five thousand dollars in 1816, to near twenty thousand dollars in 1820.

The sum payable on each newspaper is, in most instances, sufficiently large to make Government the best customer to the proprietor; and has sometimes been found sufficient to establish or continue small printing establishments in the country. In the opinion of the committee, the present law is not less objectionable by reason of its evident tendency to confer on the State Department a direct patronage and influence (useless or pernicious) over many of the sixty-nine presses which the Government has taken into its employment. But, as the laws in relation to the imposts and public lands, sometimes, on their passage, become of immediate public interest in certain sections of the country, the committee think a modification will be preferable to a repeal of the law.

MARCH, 1820.

Cumberland Road.

H. OF R.

Assuming the estimate of the Secretary of State, it will be found, that, by reducing the number of newspapers to twenty-five, in the States and Territories, and one in the District of Columbia, restoring the old price for the printers, and dispensing with this manner of publishing Indian treaties, the expenditure in relation to the laws of the present session will be reduced from 19,750 dollars, to 4,678 dollars and thirty-four cents; and, with a view to effect that object, the committee herewith report a bill.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

Mr. STORRS, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported the following bill:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be erected on the national road leading from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the river Ohio, so many toll-houses, gates, and turnpikes, as in his opinion will be necessary and sufficient to collect the duties and tolls hereafter mentioned, from all persons travelling on the same, to be erected at such places as he shall determine: Provided, That the number of such gates and turnpikes shall not exceed twelve, nor be less than six; and such gates and turnpikes shall be erected at a distance not less than ten miles from each other.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, as soon as the said gates and turnpikes shall be erected, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint toll-gatherers to collect and receive, of and from every person or persons using the said road, the tolls and duties hereinafter mentioned, at each of the said gates—that is to say: For each score of sheep or swine, six cents; for each score of cattle, twelve cents; for every chariot, coach, coachee, or phaeton, twenty-five cents; for every stage, wagon, or other four-wheeled carriage for the conveyance of passengers, drawn by four horses, twelve cents; for every cart, sleigh, or sled, drawn by two oxen or horses, six cents; and for every additional horse or ox, two cents; for every wagon drawn by two horses, eight cents; and for every additional horse, four cents; for each person and horse, six cents; for each chaise, sulky, or one-horse wagon, six cents. And it shall be lawful for any of the toll-gatherers to stop any person or persons riding, leading, or driving, any horses, cattle, sheep, swine, sulky, phaeton, coach, coachee, chariot, chaise, cart, wagon, sleigh, or other carriage, of burden or pleasure, from passing through the gates or turnpikes, until he or they shall have respectively paid the toll above specified: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed so as to authorize any tolls to be received or collected from any person passing to or from public worship, or to or from his common business on his farm, or to or from a funeral, or to or from a mill: And provided, further, That no toll shall be received or collected for the passage of any wagon or carriage laden with the property of the United States; or any cannon or military stores belonging to the United States, or any of the States composing this Union; or any person or persons on duty in the military service of the United States; or the militia of any of the States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, if any of the toll-gatherers shall unreasonably delay or hinder any passenger or traveller at any of the gates, or shall demand or receive more toll than is by this act established, he shall, for each and every such offence, forfeit and pay to the party so aggrieved the sum of ten dollars.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any person who shall use the said road, shall, with a view to evade the payment of the tolls required by this act, leave the said road, and go round the said gates, every such person shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay to and for the use of the United States the sum of twelve dollars.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the toll-gatherers on the said road shall respectively receive compensation for their services at the rate of twelve per centum on the amount of tolls by them respectively received: Provided, That the annual compensation of any toll-gatherer shall never exceed the sum of three hundred and fifty dollars; nor shall the same be less in any one year than one hundred and twenty dollars. And, in case of any deficiency in the amount collected by any toll-gatherer below the sum of one hundred and twenty dollars, the residue shall be paid out of the tolls collected at the other gates on said road.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the amount of tolls collected on said road shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States semi-annually, by the toll-gatherers on said road, and a separate account kept thereof; and the said moneys, after deducting therefrom the expenses and charges of collecting the same, shall be applied, under the direction of the President of the United States, to the repairs and preservation of said road, in such manner and under such regulations as he may prescribe, and to no other purpose whatever.

The bill having been read, and its second reading being in due course proposed, Mr. BARBOUR moved to reject the bill.

This motion gave rise to a short debate, in the course of which it was supported by Messrs. BARBOUR and RANDOLPH, and opposed by Messrs. HARDIN, LIVERMORE, and B. SMITH.

In general, the motion to reject the bill was supported on the ground that the question which it involved had been as much discussed as any ever presented to the view of the Legislature; that the discussions and solemn decisions had gone forth to the world; that the mind of every member was made up on it, and therefore there was no need of delay for reflection; and that the principle of the bill was, in the opinion of the advocates of its rejection, so obnoxious that it ought not to be entertained by the House for a moment.

The motion to reject was opposed on the ground that the question was one of much importance, and ought not to be hastily disposed of; that the preservation of a national work which has already cost so much money was an object of importance, if within the Constitutional power of Congress; that, in fact, the question involved in the bill had never yet been decided by Congress; that, being but this day presented, it would be unreasonable to call upon the House to say it was so odious they would not look at it.

The question on the motion to reject the bill was then put, in this form—"Shall this bill be rejected?" on which the votes were as follow:

The said bill was then read the second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

The remainder of the day was occupied in debating the bill for amending the pension law, and the proposition of Mr. BARBOUR to substitute for it a different bill. MESSRS. REID, HILL, FULLER, TRIMBLE, BARBOUR, LIVERMORE, and BLOOMFIELD, engaged in the bill; among whom Mr. HILL, Mr. FULLER, and Mr. LIVERMORE, earnestly opposed any invasion of the principle of the present pension law, though willing to make any necessary amendment to its details. Mr. FULLER spoke on the subject considerably at large.

Before coming to any decision on the subject, the Committee rose, and reported progress, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 21.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Thomas C. Withers, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. STORRS, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to whom was referred the communication from the Secretary of the Navy, on the 19th of January last, and the petition of the inhabitants of the borough of Erie, in the State of Pennsylvania, relative to the improvement of the harbor of Erie, made a report thereon; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be discharged from the further consideration of the communication to this House from the Secretary of the Department of the Navy on the 18th day of January last, and the petition of the inhabitants of the borough of Erie, in the State of Pennsylvania, relative to the improvement of the harbor of Erie.

Mr. STORRS, from the same committee, to whom was also referred the petitions of sundry inhabitants of the State of Pennsylvania, the inhabitants of the counties of Jefferson, Oneida, and Oswego, in the State of New York, sundry inhabitants of the District of Maine, and of the President and Directors of the Milford and Owego Turnpike Company, respectively praying the aid of Congress in the construction and improvement of certain roads, made a report thereon; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be discharged from the further consideration of the said petition.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the better regulation of the trade with the Indian tribes," reported the same, without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. MEIGS, from the Committee on the Expenditures on the Public Buildings, made a report in obedience to the resolution instructing them to ascertain whether the expenses upon the public buildings cannot be lessened without arresting their progress; as also, upon the subject of the said buildings generally; which report was read, and ordered to lie on the table. The report is as follows:

The Committee on the Expenditures upon the Public Buildings respectfully report:

That they have, in pursuance of their duty generally, and in obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives, requiring the committee to ascertain whether the expenses upon the Public Buildings cannot be lessened without arresting their progress, made such inquiries as seemed to the committee necessary to attain the requisite information. That the paper annexed, marked A, containing an account of the expenditures from the 13th of February, 1815, to the 1st of January, 1820, was, at the request of the committee, rendered to them by Samuel Lane, the Commissioner of Public Buildings. This statement exhibits an expenditure of one million four hundred and ninety-one thousand three hundred and sixty-three dollars and twenty-four cents, of which nearly one million of dollars was expended on repairs of the damage done by the enemy in 1814.

The paper annexed, marked B, also rendered by request, from the Commissioner, exhibits a view of the total expenditures upon the public buildings in the City of Washington, from the commencement to the first day of January, 1820; and also a view of the value and proceeds of the public lands in the District of Columbia. The latter statement is exhibited, in order that the House of Representatives may know the just relation of the national expenditures upon edifices in the District to the national acquisitions in the same. According to this view it appears that the valuation of the public lands, and actual amount of sales, added to donations from the States of Virginia and Maryland, exceed the national expenditure upon public buildings within the District by nearly four hundred thousand dollars.

The committee, having obtained this general information relative to the subject of their appointment, proceeded to ascertain, so far as was in their power, the relative prices of materials, and wages of artists and laborers, at different periods, during the progress of the works done in the District, and present a table thereof, which is annexed, marked C; also a letter from the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, with another table, marked D, in which the estimate of prices of materials is not made for 1820, but it is stated that these are reduced, particularly the price of brick. The wages of workmen are here estimated much lower than they have been in former years, as will appear on examining the same.

It does not appear to the committee that lower wages than those exhibited for 1820, can be expected in this District; and the committee believe that the Commissioner has used every exertion in his power to regulate these expenditures, by similar expenses, in Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York, and has obtained workmen and materials upon as good terms as could reasonably be expected, when it is considered that many of the workmen and some of the materials are not to be obtained, except from distant parts of the country.

The committee have endeavored to make themselves acquainted with the general character of the work which is designed to be bestowed upon the Centre Building of the Capitol, and it appears to them that it cannot properly be conducted with less attention to ornament than is designed, without injury to that fitness of parts which becomes a whole; and they are pleased to find that the principal ornament of this centre work will consist, not of expensive sculpture, but of its simple form, the rotunda. The committee think proper to suggest to the House, however, that, as it is contemplated to form the dome of the centre of brick work, in imitation of the Pantheon at Rome, and as such work will, when added to the great weight of the edifice, require the most serious attention to the foundations of the whole edifice to secure its safety; and as from the examination which the committee have had occasion to make, they feel convinced that these foundations require attention, that it is worthy the consideration of the House, whether effectual means should not be taken to give perfect security, especially on the westerly side of the edifice, by means of walls of sufficient weight and compactness to counteract the apparent tendency of damage to the Capitol in that direction.

This consideration ought to precede the execution of the massive work which is destined to complete the centre building.

The latter suggestion may not appear to fall precisely within the bounds of duty prescribed to the committee, but as the prevention of damage to the Public Buildings will be a saving of expense in the end, they have thought it not proper to omit it.

It appears to the committee desirable that the Capitol should be finished as soon as may be conveniently done with regard to the goodness of the work. It is evident that the unfinished parts are injured every Winter by that exposure to the weather which they seem unavoidably to sustain. And the prosecution of the work ought to be encouraged by the reflection that the national acquisition in the District approaches so nearly its expenditures, that it may be presumed the total expenditures will not (when the Capitol shall be finished) much, if at all exceed the acquisition, and would not have equalled it, unless that expenditure had been swelled one million, by the ruthless vandalism of the enemy, who applied the torch of destruction to the first national ornaments he approached.

All which is respectfully submitted.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to amend the Revolutionary Pension Law.

Various amendments were offered, proposing all sorts of modifications of the present law; all which were successively rejected.

Until at length a motion was made to strike out the whole of the bill except the enacting clause, so as to leave a blank to be filled with any thing the House should choose.

This motion was agreed to, (at about the usual hour of adjournment,) by a vote of 75 to 41.

The Committee then rose, reported progress, and the Chairman asked the usual leave to sit again. Before it was granted, however, a motion was made to adjourn, and was carried.

WEDNESDAY, March 22.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting statements of the importation of goods, wares, and merchandisc, in American and foreign vessels, and an aggregate view of both, for the year ending on the 30th of September, 1818; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Francis B. Languille, made a detailed report thereon, recommending that the said bill be postponed indefinitely; which report was read, and, together with the bill, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, to whom was recommended the bill for the relief of Daniel Converse, with additional testimony, made a further report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Daniel Converse and George Miller; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. SLOCUMB moved that the House do now proceed to consider the joint resolution submitted by him on the 6th instant, to fix a period for the termination of the present session of Congress. The motion was negatived.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider, the amendment reported on the 2d instant, by the Committee of the Whole, to the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act establishing a circuit court within and for the District of Maine;" and, the said amendment being read at the Clerk's table, was concurred in by the House, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the officers and volunteers engaged in the late campaign against the Seminole Indians;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported a bill to regulate the duties on imports, and for other purposes; which was read, and committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill to regulate the payment of duties on merchandise imported, and for other purposes. The bill is as follows:

A Bill to regulate the duties on imports, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That from and after the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, the duties heretofore laid by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, shall cease and determine, and there shall be levied, and collected, and paid, the several duties hereinafter mentioned, that is to say:

First. A duty of $12\frac{1}{2}$ per centum ad valorem on all dying drugs and materials for composing dyes not subject to other rates of duty; gum arabic, gum senegal, saltpetre, jewelry, gold, silver, and other watches, and parts of watches; gold and silver lace, embroidery, and epaulets; precious stones and pearls of all kinds, set or not set; Bristol stones or paste work, and all articles composed wholly or chiefly of gold, silver, pearl, and precious stones; and laces, lace veils, lace shawls, or shades, of thread or silk.

Second. A duty of twenty per centum ad valorem on gold leaf, and on all articles not free, and not subject to any other rate of duty.

Third. A duty of twenty-five per centum ad valorem on hempen cloth, or sail cloth, except (Russia and Holland duck,) printing types, all articles of brass, copper, iron, steel, pewter, lead, or tin, or of which these materials, or either of them, is a competent material; brass, wire, cutlery, pins, needles, buttons, button moulds; buckles of all kinds, japanned wares of all kinds; cannon, muskets, fire-arms, and side-arms, and Prussian blue: Provided, That where any person who has imported copper in sheets or plates, shall, within twelve months after such importation, produce to the collector satisfactory evidence that the same was imported subsequently to the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, and that the duties thereon have been paid, and that the same has been actually used in the building or repairing of ships or vessels, there shall be allowed a drawback of the duties herein imposed, in the manner and under the same regulations, as are provided for by the existing laws.

Fourth. A duty of thirty-three per centum ad valorem on woollen manufactures of all descriptions, or of which wool is a component material, and on cotton manufactures of all descriptions, (except of the growth or the manufacture of any place or country beyond the Cape of Good Hope,) or of which cotton is a component material, and on cotton twist, yarn, or thread, and cotton manufactures of all descriptions, or of which cotton is a component material, the produce or manufacture of, or imported from any place or country beyond the Cape of Good Hope, a duty of forty per centum ad valorem: Provided, That all cotton cloths, or cloths of which cotton is a component material, the cost of which at the place whence imported, with the addition of twenty per centum, if imported from the Cape of Good Hope, or from places beyond it, and of ten per centum if imported from any other place, shall be less than twenty-five cents per square yard, shall, with such addition, be taken and deemed to have cost twenty-five cents per square yard, and shall be charged with duty accordingly: Provided, also, That all unbleached and uncolored cotton twist, yarn, or thread, the original cost of which shall be less than sixty cents per pound, shall be deemed and taken to have cost sixty cents per pound, and shall be charged with duty accordingly; and all bleached or colored yarn, twist, or thread, the original cost of which shall have been less than seventy-five cents per pound, shall be taken and deemed to have cost seventy-five cents per pound, and shall be charged with duty accordingly; a duty of twenty-five per centum ad valorem on all manufactures of linen, or of which flax is a component material: Provided, That all linen cloths, or cloths of which linen is a component material, from whatever place, the cost of which at the place whence imported, with the addition of ten per centum, shall be less than twenty-five cents per square yard, shall, with such addition, be taken and deemed to have cost twenty-five cents per square yard, and shall be charged with duty accordingly.

Fifth. A duty of forty per centum ad valorem on clothing ready made; on all bonnets, hats, and caps, of wool, fur, leather, chip, straw, or silk, or of which either is a component material: Provided, That if the same at the place whence imported, with the addition of ten per centum, shall be less than one dollar each, they shall be deemed and taken to have cost one dollar each, and shall be charged with duty accordingly; a duty of thirty per centum ad valorem on all manufactures of silk, from any place or country beyond the Cape of Good Hope; a duty of thirty-five per centum ad valorem on printed books, painted, stained, or colored paper, or paper hangings, clocks, and time-pieces; on umbrellas, parasols, (of whatever material made,) and sticks, stretchers, and other parts, and all furniture for umbrellas and parasols; on bonnets and caps for women, not otherwise enumerated; fans, feathers, ornaments for head dresses, artificial flowers, millinery of all sorts, cosmetics, washes, balsams, perfumes, painted floor cloths, oil cloths, mats of grass, or flags, salad oil, pickles, capers, olives, mustard, comfits, and sweetmeats, preserved in sugar or brandy, confectionery, wafers, cabinet wares, and all manufactures of wood; coach lace, carriages of all descriptions, and all furniture, trimmings, and parts thereof; leather, and all manufactures of leather, or of which leather is a component material; saddles, bridles, harness, parchment, brushes, canes, walking sticks, whips, gilt and plated wares, cut glass, china wares, earthen, crockery, and stone wares; marble, alabaster, and all work or manufactures thereof. And in all cases where an ad valorem duty shall be charged, it shall be calculated on the invoice price of the articles at the place whence imported, or on the estimated price, according to the provisions of this act, (exclusive of packages, commissions, and all charges,) with the usual addition established by law, of twenty per centum on all merchan-

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the following articles shall be free of duty; that is to say, all articles imported for the use of the United States: philosophical apparatus, instruments, books, maps, charts, statues, busts, casts, paintings, drawings, engravings, specimens of sculpture, cabinets of coins, gems, medals, and all other collections of antiquities; statuary, modelling, painting, drawing, etching, or engraving, specially imported by order and for the use of any society incorporated for philosophical or literary purposes, or for the encouragement of the fine arts, or by order and for the use of any seminary of learning; specimens in natural history, mineralogy, botany, and anatomical preparations, models of machinery and other inventions, plants, and trees; wearing apparel, and other personal baggage, in actual use; and the implements or tools of trade of persons arriving in the United States; regulus of antimony; bark of the cork tree, unmanufactured; animals imported for breed; burr stones unwrought; gold coin, silver coin, and bullion; clay; unwrought copper, imported in any shape for the use of the mint; old copper and brass, and pewter, fit only to be remanufactured; brass, copper, and tin, in pigs and bars; furs, undressed, of all kinds; raw hides and skins; lapis calaminaris; plaster of paris; rags, of any kind of cloth; sulphur or brimstone; barrilla; Brazil wood, braziletto, red wood, camwood, fustick, logwood, Nicaragua, and other dye woods; wood, unmanufactured, of any kind; zinc, teutenague, or spelter; raw silk.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That an addition of ten per centum shall be made to the several rates of duties above specified and imposed, in respect to all goods, wares, and merchandise, on the importation of which in American or foreign vessels a specific discrimination has not been herein already made, which, after the said thirtieth day of June, 1820, shall be imported in ships or vessels not of the United States: Provided, That this additional duty shall not apply to goods, wares, and merchandise, imported in ships or vessels not of the United States, entitled by treaty or by any act or acts of Congress to be entered in the ports of the United States, on the payment of the same duties as are paid on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported in ships or vessels of the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed a drawback of the duties by this act imposed, on tin in sheets, which may be manufactured into articles for use, and on brazier's copper, manufactured into stills, boilers, pipes, or tubes, by, for, or on account of the person or persons importing the same, upon the exportation thereof within the time and in the manner prescribed by the existing laws, so far as the same may be applicable, and under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and also on all other goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, upon the exportation thereof within the time and in the manner prescribed by the existing laws, subject to the following provisions, that is to say: that there shall not be an allowance of the drawback of duties in the case of goods imported in foreign vessels from any of the dominions, colonies, or possessions of any foreign Power to and with which the vessels of the United States are not permitted to go and trade; that there shall not be an allowance of the drawback of duties for the amount of the additional duties by this act imposed on goods imported in vessels not of the United States; that there shall not be an allowance of the drawback in case of foreign dried and pickled fish, and other salted provisions, fish oil, or playing cards; that there shall be deducted and retained from the amount of the duties on goods exported with the benefit of drawback, (other than spirits,) two and a half per centum; and that there shall be retained in the case of spirits, exported with the benefit of drawback, two cents per gallon upon the quantity of spirits, and also three per centum on the amount of duties payable on the importation thereof. But, nevertheless, the provisions of this act shall not be deemed in anywise to impair any rights and privileges which have been, or may be, acquired by any foreign nation, under the laws and treaties of the United States, upon the subject of exporting goods from the United States, with a benefit of the drawback of the duties payable upon the importation.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That, after the 30th day of June next, in all cases of entry of merchandise, for the benefit of drawback, the time of twenty days shall be allowed from the date of entry, for giving the exportation bonds for the same: Provided, That the exporter shall, in every other particular, comply with the regulations and formalities heretofore established for entries of exportation for the benefit of drawback.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the duty on the tonnage of vessels, and the bounties, advantages, and drawbacks, in the case of exporting pickled fish, of the fisheries of the United States, in the case of American vessels employed in the fisheries, and in the case of exporting sugar, refined within the United States, shall be and continue the same as the existing law provides: Provided, always, That this provision shall not be deemed, in any wise, to impair any rights and privileges which have been, or may be, acquired by any foreign nation under the laws and treaties of the United States, relative to the duty of tonnage on vessels.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the existing laws shall extend to, and be in force for, the collection of duties imposed by this act, on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States; and for the recovery, collection, distribution, and remission, of all fines, penalties, and forfeitures, and for the allowance of the drawbacks and bounties, by this act authorized, as fully and effectually as if every regulation, restriction, penalty, forfeiture, provision, clause, matter, and thing, in the existing laws contained, had been inserted in, and re-enacted by, this act. And that all acts, and parts of acts, which are contrary to this act, and no more, shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the act passed the third day of March, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, entitled "An act to repeal so much of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, as imposes a discriminating duty on tonnage between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, and between goods imported into the United States in foreign vessels, and vessels of the United States," shall apply and be in full force as to the discriminating duties established by this act on the tonnage of foreign vessels, and the goods, wares, and merchandise therein imported.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the same duties which are by this act imposed on any manufactured articles, shall be levied and collected on articles in part manufactured; and that all goods, wares, merchandise, which shall be imported in any ship or vessel from any foreign port or place, or which, in her voyage, shall have touched at any foreign port or place, shall, to all intents and purposes, be deemed and taken to be of foreign growth, produce, and manufacture.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That no goods, wares, or merchandise, manufactured in whole or in part, shall be permitted to be entered at any custom-house, or landed at any port or place within the United States, unless the same shall be imported directly from the place or country where the same shall have been produced or manufactured; and it shall be the duty of the collectors to seize such goods, and the same shall be forfeited.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That all laws, and parts of laws, now in force, which are inconsistent with, or which may be supplied by, the provisions of this act, and no more, be, and the same are, repealed, from and after the thirtieth day of June next.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSION LAW.

The House having proceeded to the order of the day, on the bill to amend the Revolutionary pension law,

MR. WHITMAN moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill, and to postpone the same indefinitely.

This motion caused considerable debate.

A division of the question being called for, the question was taken on discharging the committee, and decided in the negative.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. BEECHER in the chair, on the bill.

Various amendments were proposed and debated, some of which were agreed to, and others not. The result was, that the bill was brought to the shape which it wears, as follows:

That the Secretary of the War Department be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause examinations to be made into the circumstances of such persons as have been, or shall be, placed on the pension list of the United States, by virtue of the act, entitled "An act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary War," passed on the 18th day of March, 1818, and if it shall satisfactorily appear to the War Department that any of the said persons are not proper subjects of the said law, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the War Department, to cause the names of such persons to be stricken from the said list; and the pension allowed to such persons, shall thenceforth cease and determine; and no person who has an income equal to one hundred dollars per annum, or an estate of the value of two hundred dollars, shall be considered in such reduced circumstances as to entitle him to a pension under the said recited act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That such examinations shall be had in conformity to such rules and regulations relating thereto as shall from time to time, be established by the Secretary of the War Department.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the examination contemplated by this act, shall be had before some court of record within the United States, or before a judge of such court in vacation, and the facts established by evidence as in other cases, and such court or judge shall cause the same to be certified officially to the Secretary of War.

In this form the bill was when the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 23.

As soon as the sitting was opened—

MR. RANDOLPH rose, and, after some feeling remarks, expressive of the grief with which he was filled, by the recent melancholy occurrence, of the death of that distinguished naval officer, Commodore Decatur, which he rather alluded to than announced, called the attention of the House to sundry resolutions, the import of which was, that, when it adjourns, it will adjourn to meet again on Saturday; that it will attend the funeral of the late Commodore Decatur on to-morrow; and that its members will, in respect to the memory of the deceased, wear crape on the left arm, for the remainder of this session.

MR. TAYLOR, of New York, required a division of the question on those resolutions, to take it separately on each.

MR. RANDOLPH intimated that, if there was the least objection to the resolutions as moved, he should withdraw them.

MR. TAYLOR, of New York, said that, in opposing this motion, he felt it due to himself to state, that, in respect for the memory and public services of the deceased, he yielded to no member of this House—not even to the honorable gentleman from Virginia. But it is with the most painful regret (said Mr. T.) I am constrained to say, that he died in the violation of the laws of God and his country. I therefore cannot consent, however deeply his loss is deplored by this House, in common with the nation, to vote the distinguished and unusual honors proposed by these resolutions.

MR. RANDOLPH then withdrew the resolves he had offered, and moved that the House do now adjourn.

The question on this motion was taken, by yeas and nays, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 50, nays 83.

MR. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Moses Elias Levy; which was concurred in by the House.

MR. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made an unfavorable report on the petition of the president and corporation of Washington College, in the State of Ohio; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee on Elections, reported "that the committee had examined the certificate of election of James Woodson Bates, returned as the Delegate from the Territory of Arkansas, and find the same sufficient to entitle him to a seat in this House;" which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to provide for repairing the roof of the General Post Office, and to procure an engine for the protection of said building; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace, in the recovery of debts in the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Two additional members were ordered to be added to the committee appointed on the 14th instant, to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the satisfaction of unlocated warrants, issued to officers and soldiers of the Virginia line, on continental establishment, &c.; and Mr. PINDALL and Mr. TYLER were appointed of said committee; and Mr. HARDIN was also appointed of the said committee, in the place of Mr. BROWN, who is absent.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of requiring the register of the land office at Vincennes to furnish the Executive of the State of Illinois with an abstract of the lands which have been purchased at that office, lying within the State of Illinois; and also of requiring the Commissioner of the General Land Office to furnish him with an abstract of the lands which have been patented to the soldiers of the late army lying within said State.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of certain persons who have paid duties on goods imported into Castine," be discharged from the further consideration of the said bill, and that it be committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Alexander Worster.

Mr. LIVERMORE submitted the following, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table for one day, viz:

"That so much of the rules of this House as prescribes the duty of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be expunged, and the following words inserted:

"It shall be the duty of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, on application made to them, in writing, by any member or delegate in Congress, to inquire into the expediency of establishing, altering, or discontinuing, any post route, and to report thereon, by bill or otherwise; and also to consider and report as aforesaid on all other subjects referred to them by the House."

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the officers and volunteers engaged in the late campaign against the Seminole Indians," was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act establishing a circuit court within and for the District of Maine," was read the third time, and passed, as amended.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, entitled "A bill in addition to the several acts for the establishment of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments;" which bill relates to transfers of appropriations and the carrying of balances of appropriations to the surplus fund.

After some discussion, and some amendments made to the bill, it was reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PROPOSED TERM OF THE SESSION.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, in the hope and belief that the adoption of the following proposition would have the effect to accelerate the progress of the business of the session, submitted it to the House:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to take into consideration and report what business is necessary to be acted upon before the close of the present session, and also to report on what day it will be proper, consistently with the public interest, for the Congress of the United States to adjourn, and close the present session.

Mr. BALDWIN said he hoped the resolution would not be adopted. The House ought, before adopting such a resolution, at least to have progressed so far as to be able to see its course clear. We have in fact, said he, but just commenced the main business of the session. He was not willing to talk of adjourning, until some progress forward had been made, so as that a reasonable prospect might appear of such a despatch of the public business as might justify an adjournment.

Mr. HARDIN also opposed the proposition. At a future day, he said, he should have no objection to the adoption of such a proposition. In all probability Congress would yet remain in session for six weeks; and to raise a committee now to report what bills it is necessary to pass before adjournment, would be at once to legislate out of the House all bills of a private nature, so important to the individuals concerned in them, and many other matters, already reported on by committees. He therefore moved that the resolve should lie on the table.

Mr. LIVERMORE objected to the resolution's lying on the table, desiring an early day to be appointed, for the adjournment.

The question on laying the resolve on the table was decided in the affirmative, by a large majority.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONERS.

The bill to amend the Revolutionary pension law was next in the orders of the day.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, said that another day's experience had convinced him of the propriety of the motion which he had suggested yesterday, and now made, to recommit the bill to a select committee for the purpose of remoulding it.

The question on discharging the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. HARDIN immediately moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill indefinitely.

The question was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, 109 to 41, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of New York, Baldwin, Bloomfield, Boden, Buffum, Case, Clagett, Cushman, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Fay, Fuller, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hardin, Hill, Holmes, Kendall, Kinsley, Livermore, McCreary, Mallary, Mason, Meech, Meigs, Monell, Moseley, Nelson of Massachusetts, Pindall, Rogers, Sampson, Sergeant, Smith of New Jersey, Stevens, Street, Strong of New York, Upham, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, and Whitman—41.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Ball, Barbour, Bateman, Beecher, Brevard, Burwell, Butler of New Hampshire, Butler of Louisiana, Cannon, Clark, Cobb, Cocke, Cook, Crafts, Crawford, Crowell, Culbreth, Cuthbert, Darlington, Davidson, Dennison, Dewitt, Dickinson, Dowse, Earle, Eddy, Edwards of North Carolina, Ervin, Fisher, Floyd, Folger, Foot, Ford, Forrest, Fullerton, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hall of Delaware, Hall of North Carolina, Hazard, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Heister, Hooks, Hostetter, Jones of Tennessee, Kent, Lathrop, Little, Lincoln, Linn, Lyman, Maclay, McCoy, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Kentucky, Marchand, R. Moore, S. Moore, Morton, Murray, Neale, Nelson of Virginia, Parker of Massachusetts, Parker of Virginia, Patterson, Peek, Philson, Pinckney, Pitcher, Plumer, Rankin, Rhea, Rich, Richards, Richmond, Ringgold, Ross, Russ, Settle, Simkins, Sloan, Slocumb, Smith of Maryland, B. Smith of Virginia, Smith of North Carolina, Southard, Storrs, Strong of Vermont, Swearingen, Tarr, Taylor, Terrell, Tomlinson, Tompkins, Tracy, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Walker, Wendover, Williams of Virginia, Williams of North Carolina, and Wood—109.

The motion to refer the bill to a select committee was then renewed, (the discharge of the Committee of the Whole having the effect to divest the bill of its amendments, and restore it to the House in the shape in which it first stood,) and the bill was voted to be referred to a select committee.

On motion of Mr. WHITMAN, the committee were instructed to report a bill making more definite the description of persons to be admitted on the pension roll under the act of the 18th of March, 1818, entitled "An act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war, and for the detection of frauds and impositions which have been or may be practised by applicants under that law."

Messrs. WHITMAN, BARBOUR, McLEAN, of Kentucky, FOOT, STORRS, FORREST, and TOMLINSON, were then appointed the said select committee.

And the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 24.

Mr. RICH presented a memorial of Alden Partridge, late captain in the corps of engineers, complaining of acts of oppression on the part of his superior officers, and soliciting that justice which he conceives has been denied him by those from whom he had a right to expect it; which memorial was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SAMPSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to alter and establish certain post roads; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole tomorrow.

Mr. NEWTON from the Committee of Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of Elkanah Finney, and others; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill for the relief of William Coffin and others.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the House do now adjourn, and, the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to which have been referred bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of Joseph McNeil," "An act for the relief of John Pellet;" and "An act for the relief of Joseph Lefebvre;" made reports thereon, recommending that each of the said bills be postponed indefinitely; the said reports were severally read, and, together with the said bills, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, to whom was also referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of John Harding, Giles Harding, John Shute, and John Nichols," reported the same, without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole tomorrow.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, who were instructed by resolution of the 24th of January last, to inquire into the expediency of allowing to the clerks of the circuit court the same fees, in all cases except in causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, as were allowed to the clerks of the county courts within the States of Maryland and Virginia, before the cession of the said District; and, also, into the expediency of repealing so much of the laws of the United States as give a daily compensation to the district attorney, clerks, and marshal, for their attendance in the circuit court of the District of Columbia," made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KENT, from the same committee, who were also instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws of the District of Columbia as that the expenses of the jurors and witnesses attending the circuit court, in all cases except such as are cognizable in a district or other circuit court of the United States, shall be paid by the respective counties of Alexandria and Washington," made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NEWTON laid before the House a letter addressed to the Chairman of the Committee of Commerce by the Register of the Treasury, transmitting several statements in relation to the trade of the United States with the West Indies and British American colonies, for four years, ending on the 30th September, 1818; which were committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill concerning navigation.

FUNERAL OF DECATUR.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose, and, after a speech of some length, principally growing out of the remark of Mr. TAYLOR, on the preceding day, on the manner of the death of the late Commodore Decatur, moved a resolution to this effect:

"That the Speaker, officers and members of this House will attend the funeral of the late Stephen Decatur, Esq., of the United States Navy, from his late residence, at four o'clock, this afternoon."

As soon as the motion was stated from the Chair—

Mr. HOLMES rose. Apprehending, he said, that the proposition might not receive an unanimous vote; fearing to hear either yea or nay on such a question; and at the same time wishing to give every gentleman of the House an opportunity of indulging his own inclination, on this solemn and melancholy occasion, he moved that the House do now adjourn.

This motion supersedes all others, and precludes all debate.

It was decided affirmatively, without debate, and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, March 25.

Another member, to wit, from North Carolina, LEMUEL SAWYER, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill further to regulate the entry of merchandise imported into the United States from any adjacent territory; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole, on Monday next.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of Elizabeth Braden; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time on Monday next.

Mr. COOK, from the same committee, reported a bill to authorize the Governor of Illinois to obtain certain abstracts of lands from certain public offices; which was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR submitted the following, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the business referred to the Committee of the Whole House shall be called, for consideration, in the following order:

1. Private bills which have passed the Senate, and have been reported favorably by a committee of this House.

2. Private bills reported by committees of this House.

3. Bills of a public nature.

4. Bills which have passed the Senate, and have been reported against by a committee of this House.

5. Reports unfavorable to petitions.

Resolved, That the Clerk, under the direction of the Speaker, so arrange the business in the preceding order, for Monday next.

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, the Committee on Manufactures were instructed to inquire into the expediency of furnishing the trading-houses established by the United States for carrying on trade with the Indian tribes, with articles of American manufactures.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of prescribing the manner in which the State of Illinois shall take possession of the salt springs, in the said State, which were guaranteed by the second proposition in the sixth section of the act entitled "An act to enable the people of the Illinois Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States," and of designating the quantity of land to be reserved for the use of the same.

On motion of Mr. TRACY, the Secretary of War was directed to transmit to this House a statement showing the amount and costs (including transportation and other charges) of the goods furnished annually to each factory, or Indian trading-house, since the peace of 1815; specifying, also, the kind and quantity of furs, peltries, or other property annually received, since that period, at each factory; also, the amount of the sales of such furs, peltries, or other property, and the balance, if any, now due from such sales to the Government.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider, the resolution offered yesterday by Mr. RANDOLPH, and depending at the time of adjournment, that the Speaker, members and officers of this House attend the funeral of the late Captain Stephen Decatur; and, the said resolution being read, was ordered to lie on the table.

The House also took up, and proceeded to consider, the amendment proposed, on the 23d instant, by Mr. LIVERMORE, to the standing rules and orders of the House in relation to the duties of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; and, the said amendment being read, the question was taken to agree thereon, and determined in the negative.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act in addition to the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments," was read the third time and passed.

The Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill respecting the Military Establishment of the United States, was discharged from the further consideration thereof, and the said bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC DOCUMENTS AND LAWS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill authorizing a subscription to five hundred copies of the 11th and 12th volumes of Waite's compilation of Congressional Documents. A good deal of debate took place on the expediency of this bill, which, after rejecting a motion to strike out the first section, (to destroy the bill,) resulted in reducing the subscription to eighty copies, and the appropriation from two thousand two hundred and fifty to four hundred dollars.

The Committee then proceeded to the bill to amend the act providing for the publication of the laws of the United States in newspapers, &c. After considerable debate on this bill also, the Committee rose and reported the bills to the House.

Mr. PINDALL moved to postpone the first bill (authorizing the subscription to the State Papers) indefinitely; which motion was decided in the affirmative—ayes 113, noes 30.

The bill was of course rejected.

A motion was also made to postpone the second bill indefinitely, but failed—ayes 58, noes 71; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MONDAY, March 27.

The SPEAKER presented a memorial, remonstrance, and protest, of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Georgia, detailing several violations of the territorial rights of that State in treaties concluded between the United States and the Creek and Cherokee Indians; as, also, of violations of the articles of agreement and cession of 1802, and remonstrating and protesting against an article in the treaty concluded in 1817 between the Cherokee nation and the United States, which invests a fee simple right to lands in certain Indians of that nation; and soliciting that commissioners may be appointed to treat with the Creek and Cherokee nations of Indians, for further cessions of territory, for the use of Georgia; which memorial, remonstrance, and protest, was ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Elizabeth Braden," was read the third time, and passed.

ST. DOMINGO SPOILIATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of State on the petition of sundry merchants of Boston, by Henry Rice, their attorney, and on the petition of sundry merchants of Baltimore, complaining of spoliations on their commerce by Christophe, the black ruler in the Island of Saint Domingo; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.—The report is as follows:

The Secretary of State, to whom, by resolution of the House of Representatives of the 7th of February last, the petitions of Samuel G. Perkins and others, merchants of Massachusetts, and of William Patterson and others, merchants of Baltimore, were referred, has the honor of submitting to the House the following report:

In the month of January, 1817, in consequence of a memorial to the President of the United States from sundry persons, interested in the claims set forth in these petitions, Septimus Tyler was appointed an agent to proceed to the Island of Saint Domingo, for the purpose of claiming the indemnity which appears to be justly due to the petitioners, for property so unjustly taken from them. He accordingly proceeded thither; but was denied access to the government of Christophe, upon the alleged ground of informality in the style of his powers. Mr. Tyler did not live to return to the United States.

In the spring of the year, 1818, a second attempt was made to send an agent to make the demand, and authority was given him to present himself in a manner, which there was reason to expect would have discarded every question of form. The result, however, was a refusal, again to receive him. A formal recognition of the kingdom of Hayti not being deemed expedient, no further measures have been found practicable on the part of the Executive, in the case; those suggestions by the memorialists being within the exclusive authority of the legislature.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 20, 1820.

LOSSES IN SEMINOLE WAR.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, who were, on the twenty-eighth ultimo, instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the compensation of losses occasioned by the impressment and application of private property to the military service of the United States in the late Seminole war, made a report, concluding with the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it is inexpedient to pass any general law on the subject, and that the committee be discharged from its further consideration."

Mr. COBB moved to strike out the word inexpedient and insert the word expedient.

After a short debate, Mr. COBB's motion was negative; and the report of the committee was concurred in.

Mr. WILLIAMS, also, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the Senate's bill for the relief of the officers and volunteers engaged in the late war with the Seminole Indians, made a report thereon, concluding with a recommendation that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

This report was opposed by Mr. JONES, Mr. ALLEN, and Mr. CANNON of Tennessee, Mr. McLEAN of Kentucky, Mr. WARFIELD of Maryland, Mr. STEPHENS of Connecticut; and was supported by Mr. MERCER of Virginia, Mr. CULBRETH of Maryland, and Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. CULPEPER of North Carolina.

The arguments on each side of this question have been already pretty fully stated, on another occasion. It is sufficient now generally to state, that the compensation allowed for the use of these horses was said to be intended to cover also the risk of their loss; as was evident from the fact, that the allowance for the use of the horse was greater than that allowed to the rider of him for his services, and was at the rate of double the average cost of human labor in that country, &c. On the other hand, it was said, that, when these volunteers entered the service, there was certainly an implied contract that the United States should furnish their horses with the forage, and should not cause the horses to be rode to death by forced marches; and that the losses in question were caused in this manner, &c.; that the rule which had been applied to the Kentucky volunteers, the Tennessee volunteers had a right to expect to be also applied to them.

Other considerations mingled in the debate. Mr. CULBRETH, for example, was in favor of the postponement of the bill, because he believed the persons embraced in the bill to have been unconstitutional in service.

Mr. ALLEN, of Tennessee, said, he hoped the bill would not be indefinitely postponed. He was astonished, he said, at the opposition it met at every stage, and in every shape, in which it had presented itself. Surely, said he, there is nothing new in the principle contained in it; there is nothing unjust in the demand. Payment has never been denied before to any troops for the losses occasioned by the Government failing to furnish subsistence for their horses, agreeably to contract when taken into service.

As an objection now, we are told that these troops received forty cents per day for the use and risk of their horses, and that they ought not to have expected forage could be furnished in a wilderness. Sir, they were promised, that if it was not furnished, that part of the risk growing out of the failure thereof was to be borne by the Government. The laws passed for the relief of all who served before them, confirmed them in that belief. The risk agreed on the part of the owner only was the wear and tear, and death in the ordinary way—not that his horse would live without sustenance. In the event of a loss for want of forage, the Government derived the benefit of saving that expense, and, being in default, cannot turn over the loss upon the party who fulfilled his part of the agreement. Were it otherwise, would any man enter the service with a horse, for the difference of monthly pay in being mounted? Do you suppose he would take with him his horse, (all he was worth perhaps,) if he was told he would be compelled to travel him as long as he could endure hunger and fatigue, and then abandon him, to traverse a wilderness three or four hundred miles home, on foot, and receive nothing for him, although every purpose of the Government had been accomplished? Patriotism is cherished as a virtue in the West, but no soldiers can be gotten there on such terms. We are told the hire ought to be deducted if the horse is to be paid for. This seems to me strange, indeed. It is not pretended that the soldier has not earned faithfully the hire or wages promised; nor that the Government has not received a valuable consideration, and every thing expected. The object had in view was to expedite the march of your troops to a remote point, where aid was immediately wanted, to save the expense of transportation and baggage wagons; all this was done, and when the soldier's horse was no longer useful to you, he was left to starve.

An additional burden was, to be sure, thrown upon the soldier, (that of walking home,) after fighting your battles. Certainly that is no cause for withholding the wages he would have been entitled to, had you not robbed him of his horse.

I would rather add than subtract, if the wages had any thing to do with the question of liability for the value of the horse.

The plain fact, when stripped of all the foliage unfortunately gathered round it, is this: these men hired you their horses for forty cents per day, and you starved them to death; and now you tell them, they must either relinquish their horses or their wages. This amounts to an impressment of the horse without any compensation, notwithstanding the original contract. I cannot suppose any member of this House would require the soldier to serve his country for nothing; yet the course now proposed amounts to that, and nothing else. The wages received only bought a horse, on his return, to plough his crop, instead of the one he entered the service upon.

Sir, I, for my part, had rather serve here without pay than withhold it from him who risked his life for my preservation. I have seen the hardships these troops have endured, in places better calculated to appreciate their feelings and claims than within these splendid walls; and they too have had a lesson. Is it because these troops are from the State of Tennessee that a new principle is now to be adopted? Is it because they are the same who saved New Orleans by their heroic bravery on the 23d December? Or is it because they so willingly again followed their gallant commander to other dangers?

Are we come to this, that the soldier is to be punished in order to pluck the laurels from the brow of his General, whose only crime has been to make your enemies tremble? Sir, his conduct has passed in review before you, and, like the pure gold, stood the fiery ordeal. Wreak not your vengeance upon the innocent soldier, who cheerfully rallied round the standard of his country, under a belief that his services were required and legally authorized. Without the means of knowing, or the right of contesting the powers that called him out, he has served you faithfully. He asks you for no act of beneficence in his favor. All he wants is that justice, which no individual would deny, under similar circumstances. Let it not be said, that our whole system of economy is narrowed down to a few unfortunate sufferers, who come here for relief I do not mean to reflect upon the Committee of Claims. I admire their vigilance, and the disposition shown to save the Treasury; but really I am afraid they have learned to guard the door so watchfully, that the rightful owner himself is not, with their consent, always permitted to enter.

Mr. CANNON said, after the very full discussion which had taken place on this subject, in an early part of the session, he regretted that it had again become his duty to trouble the House with a single remark in addition to what had already been made on this subject; and, he said, that regret was increased by the circumstance of being compelled by his duty to call in question the doctrines and principles set forth in this report, and maintained by his honorable friend from North Carolina (Mr. WILLIAMS) who is the chairman of the Committee of Claims, with whom, generally, he took the liberty of saying, he had concurred in opinion. But, he said, he thought the slightest examination of the doctrines assumed in this report would be sufficient to satisfy the House that this committee had not decided in this case with their accustomed accuracy, and that they have departed from the true principles on which we have been legislating for years past. Sir, said he, the gentleman from North Carolina denies, in the outset of the report, that there is any liability on the part of the General Government to pay for the loss of these horses, although that loss was sustained in consequence of a failure on the part of the United States to furnish the necessary forage. He contends that it was a contingency to be apprehended when they entered the service, and was incident to a state of war. Mr. C. said, he could not help feeling somewhat astonished to hear such doctrines assumed by that gentleman. What, he asked, had been the principles on which we have acted in all cases arising out of the late war with Great Britain, which preceded this campaign? Why, sir, in all the different cases that have arisen out of that war, whether to the North, the South, the East, or the West, in all cases where mounted troops have been employed in your service, and have sustained damage by the loss of horses, in consequence of failure on the part of the Government to furnish forage, they have been paid the value of their horses, also forty cents per day for the use of them while in service. The doctrine, therefore, now assumed by the Committee of Claims, may well be called a new doctrine. It was such doctrine, he said, as he did not wish to see practised on by the Government in this case or any other that might hereafter happen. He said it had not been denied by the advocates of the bill, that these volunteers had received forty cents per day for the use and ordinary risk of their horses. This, he said, however, included nothing more than the ordinary risk, and did not include the risk, as seems to be supposed by the gentleman from North Carolina, of starving their horses to death for want of forage. For, said he, the Government is just as much bound to furnish forage for the horse as it is to furnish rations for the rider. Nothing, he said, could appear to him more just than the claim of these persons against the Government. Indeed, he felt surprised to hear any gentleman contend on this floor that the Government was not bound to furnish forage for the horses of these volunteers. It is utterly impossible that any such understanding, as has been supposed by the gentleman from North Carolina, could have existed, after what had been done before in other similar cases; for, in no one single case, during the whole war of which he had been speaking, had pay been refused, in any case similar to the one under consideration. These volunteers on the Seminole campaign, he said, were the first to whom remuneration for such losses had been refused, and he thought it must be clear to the mind of every man who would take the trouble to examine for himself, that these officers and soldiers had a good right to expect remuneration for losses, if any should be sustained in the way that I have mentioned. But, as to the impracticability of the Government to furnish forage during the whole of this campaign, he believed none doubted it, nor had he, nor any other person within his hearing, charged the Government with any neglect to make sufficient exertion to furnish forage; he believed none of the advocates of the bill, or anybody else, entertained such opinions. He said, none of the friends of the measure had contended that the Government should be required to perform impossibilities; they had only contended that each party in any contract or engagement was bound to indemnify for losses sustained by the other party in consequence of any failure to perform on their own part. Here, he thought, the committee had not met the question fairly, and, after all their researches, had found a poor pretext for refusing to acknowledge the justice of this claim. But, sir, said he, the Committee of Claims are opposed to the policy which has heretofore been pursued in remunerating individuals who sustain losses of property in the service of their country. It was a policy, he said, which he had been truly glad to see in existence here, and he hoped it would not yet be abandoned. This policy, he said, was calculated to give a powerful incentive to patriotism, a firm reliance on the justice of the Government; and a knowledge that it is ready to remunerate for such losses, will always produce a willingness on the part of the people of this country to hazard their property, and even their lives, in its defence, whenever it may be necessary.

Sir, said he, can it be possible that gentlemen wish to adopt the contrary unjust policy, that the whole losses of property sustained in a war should be borne by a few patriots, who are the first to step forward with their lives and their property, in the defence of the country? He could not believe that this could be their object. No, sir, said he, these losses ought to be sustained by the whole community, and not the few who have thus made the sacrifice. These, if I understand any thing about it, are the true principles of all good governments, he hoped the principle would never be abandoned in any case that either has, or may hereafter, occur in this country. As for the suggestion made by the Committee of Claims, that it would be the interest of the volunteers to preserve their horses until near the end of the campaign, and then destroy them, or let them die by neglect, if it was known the Government would pay for them, he thought it scarcely deserved a reply; for, as respects the case before us, it could not be supposed that any person could be influenced by any such motive—for, if he lost his horse, or was deprived of him in any way, he would have to plunge on foot six or seven hundred miles, through the lakes and swamps of Florida, and this for the sake of receiving pay for his horse, and that too at the risk of his health, constitution, and perhaps his life. However, he said he could not believe that any of those whose patriotism had prompted them voluntarily to engage in the service of their country, were capable of being influenced by any such motives. He said, a document had been read at the table, which went to show that the commanding General, as well as some other officers on this campaign, had been compelled to purchase corn at the enormous price of fifty cents per quart, in order to sustain their horses on some of the marches they made. This, he said, was sufficient to show, beyond the possibility of doubt, that it was not in the power of a private soldier to obtain the means of subsistence for his horse. But, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. C., the great anxiety of the gentleman from North Carolina to find a plausible pretext for recommending the indefinite postponement of this bill, had, he thought, driven him into error. He thought he had been a little unfortunate in referring to the laws that had been in existence on this subject, and of which he thought the gentleman had taken a very partial view; therefore, he said, he hoped he would be indulged while he would call the attention of the Committee to all the laws, or at least those parts of the different laws, that either were or had been in force, on this subject.

Mr. C. began by reading first the act of Congress of 1795; then he called the attention of the Committee to the act of 1816, of which he said the gentleman from North Carolina had so loudly complained. After commenting on which, he also read the amendment to the said act, passed in 1817; and lastly read the act of 1818, which he said was the last act that had been passed by the Congress of the United States that had any reference to the subject. All of which acts, said Mr. C., from the year 1816 up to the present time, had clearly and unequivocally sanctioned the principle contained in the bill under consideration; and all of which laws had been in force and use previous to the time these volunteers entered your service on the Seminole campaign. Indeed, he said, he had no doubt but many of them had received the benefits of the laws he had read more than once, in consequence of losses of a similar kind they had sustained on the former tours of duty they have performed; and they had also seen or known of others being paid whose horses had been lost for want of forage in the service. Therefore, he said, he could not see the slightest grounds on which the Committee of Claims could entertain the opinion they had advanced, and which had been supported by the gentleman from North Carolina, with great ingenuity; that the volunteers had understood, when they entered the service, that Government was not bound to remunerate for the losses that might happen to them for want of forage. Sir, said he, it is utterable impossible that any such idea could have prevailed at that or any other time. No sir, said he, they had too much confidence in the justice of this Government; they believed it would extend the same justice to them, in such cases, that had been extended to all others. This, he said, was a just idea, and such as must have been, and ought to have been, entertained by every individual who entered your service on that campaign. For, said he, under any such idea as seems to be conjured up by this committee, he could not suppose that any men could be found in this country so ready to embark with their property in your service, unless indeed in a case of extreme emergency or imminent danger. As yet, he said, we expect something like equal rights, benefits, and privileges; equal pay for equal services; and equal remuneration for equal losses, when sustained in the public service. And let me tell you, sir, said he, there are none of us but expect this here or elsewhere. He said, even if it should be thought proper to change the policy of our Government in regard to this principle, so as to compel the patriot and soldier to bear these losses themselves, good faith requires that those who have already sustained such losses in your service should be paid.

There was another ground, he said, taken by the Committee of Claims against this bill. In the course of their researches and exertions to find something to excite prejudice against the measure, they have been informed, it seems, by the Second Auditor of the Treasury, that these officers and soldiers have received forty cents per day for their horses after they were dead. Now, sir, said he, if this be true, it would seem to him to amount to a very serious charge against the officer whose duty it was to settle those accounts; for he knew of no law making such provision. The law, he said, only allows the forty cents per day for the use and ordinary risk while in actual service. However, he said, he entertained no doubt that many—perhaps the greater part—who lost their horses, procured others immediately, and continued on in the service. Those who did so, he said, were certainly as much entitled to receive pay for the use of a horse the whole campaign, as though the first horse had lived to the end of it. This, he thought, would not be denied. But, he said, it seemed that the Committee of Claims entertained the opinion that these volunteers had already received the full value of their horses, or perhaps more than their value. Of this, however, he said, they had not attempted to produce any evidence of the fact to the House, nor did he believe it to be true.

Many of the horses, he said, he had no doubt were worth more than double the amount that had been received for the use of them. But, Mr. C. said, he did not think this was a good argument against the passage of the law. It was known, he said, that many of the rangers who had been in service during the late war had received, for the use of their horses, an amount of more than double their value. Here, he said, the Committee of Claims had introduced a principle that is not applicable, in any case, between individuals in any similar contract. Therefore, he hoped it would be applied, in the present case, between the Government and these individuals, even if gentlemen should believe it would have been better, as is suggested by the Committee of Claims, to have purchased the horses before they entered the service; the policy of doing which hereafter, he said, might present a different question. It was enough, he said, to know that it was not done in the case now before us. But, sir, said he, have we not been informed by a letter or document, which was read and now lies on your table, that a part of these horses were so much broke down that they were ordered to be sold at public sale, by order of the officers, and that the proceeds had been paid into the Treasury of the United States. How, he asked, would this case be got round by the gentleman from North Carolina, or any of the members who oppose the passage of the bill? Are these poor fellows to have their horses taken from them and sold, the money appropriated to public use, and they receive nothing at all, not even the money they sold for, which he had no doubt was very little? Upon the whole, sir, said he, it must be obvious to the mind of any gentleman who will for a moment notice this report, that the ingenuity of the committee had been put to the rack to find the most specious grounds on which they recommended the rejection of the bill. The arguments of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. McCoy,) he said, had principally been predicated on the same grounds as were taken in the report, except the remarks that gentleman had made respecting these volunteers having received pay for their clothing also. This argument, he said, was fully met by the provisions of the bill, which provided that any amount, if any had been thus received, should be deducted from the price of the horse. The gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. CULBRETH,) who also opposed the passage of the bill, he said, had taken a different, though not new ground against it—the unconstitutionality of the service. This argument, he said, might apply to a case where the commanding officer alone was interested, but he thought it could not, with any propriety, be applied to the case of a private soldier, who supports the Constitution of his country by yielding strict obedience to his officer.

But, he said, he had hoped that the opponents of the bill would not again have urged its rejection on this ground; the argument on this point, however, he said, had been so fully answered on a former occasion, that he would not tire the patience of the Committee by repeating them again. None of the arguments which have been presented to the House by the Committee of Claims, or any of the gentlemen who had endeavored to support their report, could, he thought, be felt to have sufficient weight to meet the strong claim these persons have on this Government for remuneration. He said he had shown, by the laws which he had read to the Committee, that these volunteers must have entertained the most just expectation that they would be remunerated for losses sustained, in all cases where a failure on the part of the Government to comply with its engagement had occasioned the loss. He said he had shown, that all others who have been in service during the late war, and who have sustained losses in the same way, have been remunerated; and he thought it was fully shown, that these volunteers of the Seminole campaign have a claim against the Government, that in strict justice it is bound to pay. It must, he said, be recollected that the claimants would all have to show, by the most satisfactory evidence, that the loss was sustained in consequence of the failure on the part of the Government to furnish forage, and without any fault or neglect on their part, before their claims could be allowed or paid under this law, provided it was passed. The single point in this case, made by the failure of the Government to fulfil its part of the obligation, he thought was a point on which these claims, in strict justice, might safely rest. This point had not, and he believed could not, be met by the gentlemen opposed to the bill. But, sir, said Mr. C., I hope gentlemen will remember, while they are deciding on this subject, that they are deciding on the claims of some of the most meritorious and patriotic citizens of the Western country, who have rendered other and more important services to this nation, in time of extreme danger, during the late war with Great Britain. He said many of these persons had sought the first opportunity to engage in the service during that eventful period. They were amongst the first volunteers who descended the Mississippi for the defence of the lower country. They were the first who entered the Creek nation, after the horrid massacre at Fort Mims, without orders from the President, the Governor of the State, General Jackson, or any other officer; and were followed by General Jackson, with other volunteers and militia, with whom they united in the Indian country, (after destroying one of the enemy's towns,) where they were organized into a regiment, in which, he said, two of his colleagues (Col. ALLEN and Capt. JONES) were made officers, with himself. They, he said, had been recognised, and received into the service of the United States, and paid for services and losses sustained in this way, although we were not called into service by any authority known in our Government; we were driven there, each one by the impulse of his own feelings. The enemy were sought, and wherever they could be found the severest chastisement was inflicted. These volunteers were the first from our State in battle; and by their valor and good conduct at the battles of Tallasatchee and Talledega, obtained the most decisive victories over the savage enemy that had been known in the annals of our national history. They, indeed, were the first to give military character to the State which he had the honor in part to represent. They had encountered hardships, dangers, and sufferings in the service, on this campaign, that were unpleasant to think of, much more to relate, and had fought in many other battles in the Creek nation.

These same young men were also the first who afterwards rushed to the defence of the Southern frontier when invaded by the combined armies of Europe during the late war; they marched with unexampled speed to the places where this force was expected to land, to Mobile, Pensacola, and lastly to New Orleans, where they were the first to engage the enemy, on the night of the 23d of December, (a moment, he said, ever to be remembered in our history,) at the spot where the hostile tread of the enemy made the first impression on the sacred soil of Western America; and here, he said, by their distinguished gallantry and daring intrepidity, he believed they saved from destruction the city of New Orleans, and effected thereby the safety of the whole Western country; and now, he said, they had been called upon to embark in this Seminole campaign, by the same officer under whom they had so often rallied, and under whom they had so often fought and bled in their country's cause. They did not hesitate, or inquire for his authority, but again put themselves under his command, with their usual promptness; and, although it had not been in their power to perform as important services as on former occasions, the hardships and dangers they encountered were not much less, he was informed, than had been encountered on any former campaign. Many of these volunteers, he said, were poor, and unable to sustain such losses. He believed they were generally so. Some had purchased the horses they had lost in service on credit, and, after paying every cent they had received from the Government as pay for their services, as well as for the use of their horses, are yet in debt, and were, perhaps, now laboring to pay up the balance. He said he thought this a hard case; they had evinced their patriotism and attachment to the Government on every occasion that had offered, and he thought, if the claim of any one part of the citizens of the United States was entitled to a more liberal consideration than another part, it was that of these sufferers on the Seminole campaign. However, he said, for his own part, he did not think their case required the exercise of any liberality, believing, as he did, that it was founded on the immutable principles of justice; and he hoped, therefore, the bill would not be indefinitely postponed.

The question on indefinite postponement of the bill was decided, by yeas and nays, in the negative—yeas 73, nays 84, as follows:

SPANISH TREATY.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress an extract of a letter from the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at St. Petersburg, of the 1st of November last, on the subject of our relations with Spain, indicating the sentiments of the Emperor of Russia respecting the non-ratification, by His Catholic Majesty, of the treaty lately concluded between the United States and Spain, and the strong interest which His Imperial Majesty takes in promoting the ratification of that treaty. Of this friendly disposition, the most satisfactory assurance has been since given directly to this Government by the Minister of Russia residing here.

I transmit, also, to Congress, an extract of a letter from the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, at Madrid, of a later date than those heretofore communicated; by which it appears that, at the instance of the Chargé des Affaires, of the Emperor of Russia, a new pledge had been given by the Spanish Government, that the Minister who had been lately appointed to the United States should set out on his mission without delay, with full powers to settle all differences in a manner satisfactory to the parties.

I have further to state that the Governments of France and Great Britain continue to manifest the sentiments heretofore communicated respecting the non-ratification of the treaty by Spain, and to interpose their good offices to promote its ratification.

It is proper to add that the Governments of France and Russia have expressed an earnest desire that the United States would take no step, for the present, on the principle of reprisal, which might possibly tend to disturb the peace between the United States and Spain. There is good cause to presume, from the delicate manner in which this sentiment has been conveyed, that it is founded in a belief, as well as a desire, that our just objects may be accomplished without the hazard of such an extremity.

On full consideration of all these circumstances, I have thought it my duty to submit to Congress whether it will not be advisable to postpone a decision on the questions now depending with Spain, until the next session. The distress of that nation, at this juncture, affords a motive for this forbearance, which cannot fail to be duly appreciated. Under such circumstances, the attention of the Spanish Government may be diverted from its foreign concerns, and the arrival of a Minister here be longer delayed. I am the more induced to suggest this course of proceeding from a knowledge that, while we shall thereby make a just return to the Powers whose good offices have been acknowledged, and increase, by a new and signal proof of moderation, our claims on Spain, our attitude in regard to her will not be less favorable at the next session than it is at the present.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 27, 1820.

The Message and accompanying documents were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

PROMULGATION OF THE LAWS.

The engrossed bill to amend the act providing for the publication of the laws of the United States, was read a third time; and the yeas and nays were ordered on its passage.

MARCH, 1820.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

[This bill proposes to reduce the number of the publishers of the laws to one for every State and Territory, and to reduce the allowance for the execution of the work to about one-half of its present amount.]

Hereupon ensued a debate, in which the following gentlemen took sides: For the bill—Messrs. CULPEPER, PINDALL, and SMITH, of North Carolina; against the bill, Messrs. CANNON, MALLARY, FOOT, SIMKINS, LITTLE, SETTLE, STROTHER, RHEA, and SOUTHARD.

The debate turned on the question, whether the object was worth a continuation of the present expenditure, which it is supposed the passage of the bill will reduce by three-fourths of its amount.

Those who opposed the bill said, that they were unwilling to diminish the newspaper circulation among the people of the laws passed for their government; that it was due to them that they should at least have an opportunity of seeing what the laws were; that the number of printers of the laws had, in this view, better be extended, even so as to include all the printers of the United States, than reduced to the number of twenty-five. With a view to economy, it was said that a petty saving of five or six, or even ten thousand dollars, was nothing compared to the diffusion of information among the people; and the amount could be retrenched on almost any other object of expenditure with more propriety than on this. It would be desirable, it was said, if it could be effected, to make provision that every free man in the Government should read the laws. If the present publication of the laws was so unimportant as to allow Congress to reduce the number of papers to one in each State and Territory, the publication of them in newspapers had better be entirely dispensed with—the present number being as small as possible, with a view to any thing like a diffusion of a knowledge of the laws among the people. With regard to the argument in favor of the bill, that it went to reduce the patronage of the Department of State, it was said to be entitled to little weight; for it was not to be thought that the printers were to be influenced improperly by the pittance allowed them for the publication of the laws. It was denied, further, that the printers would voluntarily publish the laws, or at least such of them as were important, as had been said, without compensation. But, were it otherwise, it was argued, there was no propriety in submitting to the printer the decision of the question, which of the laws were, and which were not, important; which were, and which were not, worthy of being known to the people. That the interest of the whole people, in the operation of the laws, the agency of their Representatives in passing them, their political right to investigate and judge of them when passed, all required a wide diffusion of the laws: and that to this end the present number of publishers of the laws, three in each State, was not too large, but rather too small a proportion of the whole number of newspapers printed in the United States.

The vote on the question stood:—For the bill seventy-nine, against it, seventy-eight, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Allen of Tennessee, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baker, Baldwin, Barbour, Bayly, Beecher, Bloomfield, Brevard, Brown, Burton, Burwell, Butler of New Hampshire, Cobb, Cocke, Crafts, Crawford, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davidson, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Edwards of North Carolina, Fay, Floyd, Forrest, Hall of New York, Hall of Delaware, Hardin, Hemphill, Herrick, Hooks, Hostetter, Kendall, Kinsley, Linn, Maclay, McCoy, McLean of Kentucky, Marchand, Mercer, Metcalf, Mosley, Murray, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Overstreet, Parker of Virginia, Patterson, Phelps, Pindall, Rich, Richards, Richmond, Robertson, Sawyer, Shaw, Slocumb, A. Smyth of Virginia, Smith of North Carolina, Stevens, Storrs, Street, Strong of Vermont, Swearingen, Taylor, Terrell, Tracy, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Upham Van Rensselaer, Warfield, Whitman, and Williams of North Carolina.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbot, Allen of New York, Anderson, Ball, Bateman, Boden, Brush, Bryan, Buffum, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Cannon, Case, Clagett, Clark, Culbreth, Cushman, Darlington, Dewitt, Dickinson, Earle, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Ervin, Fisher, Foot, Ford, Fuller, Fullerton, Garnett, Gross of New York, Hackley, Hall of N. Carolina, Hazard, Hendricks, Hill, Holmes, Jones of Tennessee, Kent, Kinsey, Lathrop, Little, Lincoln, Lyman, McCreary, McLane of Delaware, Mallary, Mason, Meigs, S. Moore, Morton, Nelson of Virginia, Parker of Massachusetts, Philson, Pitcher, Rankin, Reed, Rhea, Rogers, Ross, Russ, Sampson, Sergeant, Settle, Silsbee, Simkins, Sloan, Smith of New Jersey, Smith of Maryland, Southard, Strong of New York, Strother, Tarr, Tomlinson, Walker, Wallace, Wendover, and Wood.

So the bill was passed and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

TUESDAY, March 28.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from J. S. Williams, of the late firm of Stull and Williams, explanatory of the sale or loan of gunpowder made by the Ordnance department to that firm, in the year 1818; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BATES presented a petition of the members of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Territory of Arkansas, praying that the lands in said Territory lying on, and adjacent to, the river Mississippi, may be surveyed, and offered for sale.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report on the petition of James Greer; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act further to suspend, for a limited time, the sale or forfeiture of lands for failure in completing the payment thereon;" and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, moved that the House do now proceed to consider the resolution submitted by him on the 23d instant, for the appointment of a joint committee to consider and report what business is necessary to be done before the close of the present session. The motion was negatived.

On motion of Mr. ABBOT, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law pointing out under what circumstances, and by what means, private property may be taken for public use, under the emergency of war, and regulating the manner by which just compensation may be made for the same; also, to prescribe the manner in which soldiers may be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, in time of war.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and, after some time spent therein, the SPEAKER resumed the chair, and Mr. TAYLOR reported that the Committee had, according to order, had the state of the Union under consideration, and directed him to report their agreement to the resolution submitted by Mr. COBB on the 24th of January last, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to prohibit the appointment of members of Congress to offices, with amendments; as, also, their agreement to the resolution from the Senate, "proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as it respects the choice of Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, and the election of Representatives in the Congress of the United States."

The House took up and proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union; whereupon it was ordered, that the said resolutions severally lie upon the table.

Mr. CLAY laid on the table the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the Constitution of the United States vests in Congress the power to dispose of the territory belonging to them, and that no treaty purporting to alienate any portion thereof is valid without the concurrence of Congress.

2. Resolved, That the equivalent proposed to be given by Spain to the United States, in the treaty concluded between them, on the 22d day of February, 1819, for that part of Louisiana lying west of the Sabine, was inadequate; and that it would be inexpedient to make a transfer thereof to any foreign Power, or to renew the aforesaid treaty.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were instructed to inquire into the expediency of affording some pecuniary relief to the widow and children of John Heaps, mail carrier, killed by the persons who recently robbed the United States mail near Baltimore.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which is as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit to the House of Representatives, in pursuance of their resolution of the 31st of January last, a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, with the documents which accompanied it.

JAMES MONROE.

The Message was read, and, together with the report therein communicated, ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting sundry statements in relation to the privateer pension fund, which have been prepared in obedience to the resolution of the 15th instant; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of William Henderson, on the report of the same committee on the petition of Elias Parks, and on the bill for the relief of Jacob Kunkopot and others, of the Stockbridge tribe of Indians; and, after some time spent therein, the SPEAKER resumed the chair, and Mr. SEARGEANT reported the agreement of the Committee of the Whole to the resolution contained in the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of William Henderson, with an amendment, and asked leave for the Committee to sit again on the remaining report and bill.

The Committee of the Whole had leave to sit again on the said report and bill, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 29.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts for the adjustment of land claims in the State of Louisiana," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of Jenifer T. Sprigg, reported a bill for regulating the manner of settling the accounts of the several deputy surveyors in the Missouri and Arkansas Territories; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act making further provision for the sale of the public lands."

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

Mr. STORRS, from the committee to whom was referred the bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war," by leave of the House, reported a bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war," passed on the 18th day of March, 1818; which was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table. The bill is as follows:

A Bill in addition to an act entitled "An act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States, in the Revolutionary war," passed on the 18th day of March, 1818.

Be it enacted, &c., That no person who now is or hereafter may be, placed on the pension list of the United States, by virtue of the act entitled "An act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States, in the Revolutionary war," passed the 18th day of March, 1818, shall, after the payment of that part of the pension which became due on the 4th day of March, 1820, continue to receive the pension granted by the said act, until he shall have exhibited to some court of record in the county, city, or borough, in which he resides, a schedule subscribed by him, containing his whole estate and income (his necessary clothing and bedding excepted,) and shall have (before the said court or some one of the judges thereof) taken and subscribed and produced to the said court the following oath or affirmation, to wit: "I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be,) that I was a resident citizen of the United States on the 18th day of March, 1818, and that I have not since that time, by gift, sale, or in any manner whatever, disposed of my property, or any part thereof, with intent thereby so to diminish it as to bring myself within the provisions of an act of Congress entitled 'An act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States, in the Revolutionary war,' passed on the 18th day of March, 1818, and that I have not, nor has any person in trust for me, any property or securities, contracts, or debts due to me, nor have I any income other than what is contained in the schedule hereto annexed, and by me subscribed;" nor until such person shall have delivered or caused to be delivered, to the Secretary of War, a copy of the aforesaid schedule and oath or affirmation, certified by the clerk of the court to which the said schedule was delivered, together with the opinion of the said court, also certified by their clerk, of the value of the property contained in the said schedule: Provided, That in every case in which the pensioner may be insane, the court may receive the said schedule without the aforesaid oath or affirmation, from the committee or other person authorized to take care of such insane person.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the original schedule and oath or affirmation shall be filed in the clerk's office of the court to which the schedule and oath or affirmation aforesaid shall be exhibited, and any person who shall swear or affirm falsely in the premises, and be thereof convicted, shall suffer as for wilful and corrupt perjury.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That on the receipt of the copy of the schedule and oath or affirmation aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the War Department to cause to be struck from the list of pensioners under the said act, the name of such person, in case the said person shall not, in his opinion, be in such indigent circumstances as to be unable to support himself without the assistance of his country.

WILLIAM HENDERSON.

The House took up the report of the Committee of Claims on the case of William Henderson, of Virginia, which was discussed in Committee of the Whole yesterday.

The Committee of Claims recommend that the claim be rejected. The decision of that committee was reversed by the Committee of the Whole, who reported a resolution that the claim ought to be granted.

The question which recurred was to concur in this reversal. On this question a debate ensued, which continued with great animation for more than two hours—and when taken was decided by yeas and nays, as follows: For concurrence in the amendment 68, against it 90.

Mr. STORRS then moved an amendment, the object of which was to compensate the petitioner for his dwelling-house and kitchen, valued at nine hundred and fifty dollars. This motion was rejected—yeas 72, nays 73.

Mr. BALL renewed the motion so far as respected the dwelling-house, which was carried—yeas 74, nays 72.

The question was then taken to agree to the resolution as thus amended, and lost—yeas, 71, nays 76.

The resolution, as recommended by the Committee of Claims, that the prayer of the petitioner be rejected, was then concurred in by the House.

MR. RANDOLPH AND GALES & SEATON.

Mr. RANDOLPH then rose, and, after a speech of upwards of an hour in length, submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Gales & Seaton, Editors of the National Intelligencer, be excluded from this House as reporters."

Mr. STROTHER and Mr. PINDALL made several observations, which were not heard by the person giving this sketch.

Mr. BRUSH, of Ohio, however, rose, and with some warmth defended the persons against whom the proposition was directed, on the ground that there was no charge brought against them, without which he could not condemn or pass censure upon the meanest individual in the land; and called upon Mr. R. to put in a specification of his complaint.

Mr. RANDOLPH did so, and ultimately modified his proposition, so as to read as follows, supporting it at the same time in a speech of considerable length:

Resolved, That Gales & Seaton, having published an incorrect report of the proceedings of this House of the 23d [instant] not from their own view and hearing thereof, but on the representation of some unknown person, whose name they have refused to give, when thereto required by a member from Virginia—

Therefore, resolved, That, unless they give up the author of such report, Gales & Seaton, Editors of the National Intelligencer, be excluded from this House as reporters of the proceedings thereof.

Mr. PINDALL spoke at considerable length on the subject; after which, the question on the above modified proposition was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayly, Floyd, Nelson of Virginia, Pindall, Randolph, Robertson, B. Smith of Virginia, and Strother—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Allen of New York, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baker, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour, Bateman, Beecher, Boden, Brown, Brush, Bryan, Buflum, Burwell, Butler of New Hampshire, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Case, Claggett, Clark, Cocke, Cook, Crafts, Crowell, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cushman, Darlington, Davidson, Dennison, Dewitt, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of North Carolina, Fay, Fisher, Folger, Foot, Ford, Forrest, Fuller, Fullerton, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hall of Delaware, Hardin, Hazard, Hemphill, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Hill, Holmes, Hooks, Hostetter, Jones of Tennessee, Kendall, Kent, Kinsey, Kinsley, Lathrop, Little, Lincoln, Linn, Livermore, Lowndes, Lyman,

THURSDAY, March 30.

On motion of Mr. SLOCUMB, the Committee on Commerce were directed to inquire into the expediency of having a lighthouse built at Ocracock Inlet, in the State of North Carolina.

On motion of Mr. WOODBRIDGE, the Committee of Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to Robert Smart one hundred dollars for a horse, and ninety dollars for boards, which horse and boards were impressed for the public use.

Mr. SAWYER submitted the following resolution :

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing such offices of the customs as it may be proper to suppress in consequence of their unproductiveness, their inutility, or from any other cause ; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

[*From the National Intelligencer of Wednesday, March 29.]

An incident occurred yesterday, in the House of Representatives, which, being rather out of the common line, and concerning ourselves, is entitled to a separate notice from the editors.

Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, made a motion to the following effect, if not in the following words :

"That Gales & Seaton, Editors of the National Intelligencer, be excluded from the hall of this House as Reporters."

Such a motion, found on the Journals of the House, though ultimately rejected, as we were sure it would be by a large majority, might not perhaps add to our reputation in the eyes of those who come after us ; yet, for the present generation, we trust our good name is beyond the reach of either motions or speeches in any legislative body. Having received, however, so distinguished an honor, it is proper we should take some notice of it.

The ground of this motion, it appears, is an alleged inaccuracy in the report of a certain proceeding in the House of Representatives on Thursday last. Before proceeding further it is as well to state, that it is absurd to hold that conductors of newspapers are bound to publish more than they know, or even more than they choose ; and that it is enough, if they inadvertently err, cheerfully to correct the error, on proper representations thereof being made to them.

On Sunday morning last, then, the following note was received at our office :

To the Editors of the National Intelligencer :

Messrs. Gales & Seaton : On Thursday last I took

In submitting the resolution, Mr. S. said he would barely observe that its adoption was so urgently called for, both from the situation of the Treasury, as well as from the disproportion between the services rendered, and the salaries received, by the officers whose posts were contemplated to be suppressed, that he was surprised the subject had not been proposed to this House before. If the resolution were adopted, Mr. S. was sure a saving might be annually made of 7 or 8,000 dollars without the least detriment to the public.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. LOWNDES, the Secretary for the Department of the Navy was directed to inform this House whether the commander of the Ontario, during her late cruise in the Pacific ocean, received any present from the Viceroy of Lima, and, if he did, what disposition has been made thereof ; whether he received on board the Ontario any citizens or subjects of a foreign Power, and any money or effects belonging to foreign subjects or citizens, to be transported from one foreign port to another ; if such foreign subjects were so received, whether any of them were in the military or naval service of a Government engaged in war ; if any money or effects were so transported, whether any freight was received on that account ; and whether any, and what, instructions have been given by the Department of the Navy respecting the transportation in public ships of the United States of passengers, money, or effects.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts for the adjustment particular notice that there was no reporter in the House. I am, therefore, surprised, as well as shocked, to find the report (such as it is) of the proceedings relative to the late Stephen Decatur, Esq., of the United States Navy, and request to be informed how it found its way into your paper. Your oh't servant,

J. RANDOLPH,

SATURDAY, March 25.

Of Roanoke.

The first emotion of the editors, on reading this note, was that of surprise ; no intimation having been received, from any other quarter, either before or since the receipt of the above note, of the least incorrectness in our account of the proceedings. With that courtesy, however, which, if not our duty, it has always been our wish to observe towards those who address us on matters of business, the following answer was returned to Mr. Randolph's note :

SUNDAY, March 26, 1820.

Hon. John Randolph.

Sir : The report, to which you refer in your note of the 25th, was derived from sources entitled to high credit ; particular care being taken not to impute to you any language which might be subject to misrepresentation. Your speech on the following day was reported, and will be submitted to you for revision when transcribed. Very respectfully, &c.

GALES & SEATON.

These two notes are only introduced to the public eye, because a part of our note was referred to by Mr. Randolph, in introducing his motion yesterday, and because they serve to show the grounds of his motion.

of land claims in the State of Louisiana," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for apportioning the Representatives in the Seventeenth Congress, to be elected in the States of Massachusetts and Maine, and for other purposes;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill was read twice, and referred to a select committee; and Messrs. HOLMES, MASON, HILL, SHAW, and WHITMAN, were appointed the said committee.

The bill for the relief of John A. Dix then passed through a Committee of the Whole, being supported by Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, and was ordered to a third reading.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a general abstract of the militia of the United States, in pursuance of the act of March the 3d, 1803—Read.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of this House, entitled "An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1820," with amendments. They have also passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of certain sufferers by fire at Savannah, in Georgia;" and a joint resolution, directing the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives to adjourn their respective Houses on Monday the 24th of April next; in which amendments, bill, and resolution, they ask the concurrence of this House.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the consideration of the bill to authorize the President of the United States to take possession of East and West Florida, and establish a temporary government therein, and that it lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Nicholas Vreeland, deceased." The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing payment to be made for certain muskets impressed into the service of the United States." The bill was reported with an amendment; which was concurred in by the House, and the bill ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Mary Cassin, widow and administratrix of Patrick Cassin, deceased." The bill was reported without amendment, and was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Robert Swartwout." The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of John Harding, Giles Harding, John Shutte, and John Nichols." The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled Whereupon, we understand, Mr. R., at the suggestion of a friend, withdrew his motion, to give an opportunity, before renewing it, to us to disclose to him the names of those who furnished us with an account of the proceeding referred to in his note as above.

As we are persuaded that Mr. Strother is not, either with or without motive, unfriendly to us, nor yet to the freedom of the press, but the contrary, we will only say of his suggestion that, followed up, it would lead him into a labyrinth of doctrines, dangerous in the extreme to the rights of the citizen, and which he would be the first to disclaim.

With respect to the admission into the Hall of Representatives, it is a privilege to which, we trust, we give its due importance. But, were it ten times more valuable than it is, the menace of exclusion from the Hall would not induce us to swerve, on this occasion, from our duty; which is, to resist every attempt, from whatever quarter, to invade the privileges of the press.

It will be merely decorous in us voluntarily to exclude ourselves from the Hall, until the question on Mr. Randolph's motion is settled, if it is to be settled at all, by a vote of the House.

We shall endeavor, however, to give our readers an idea of what is going on there meanwhile; and, if we do not give the speeches of the members, we shall at least have the satisfaction of being sure that we have not mistaken their meaning.

The facts in regard to the account of proceedings, to which exceptions have been taken, are simply these. The editors of this paper have at times other matters to attend to, of some importance to their readers as well as to themselves, besides observing and noting the proceedings of the two Houses of Congress. It so happened, that he who attended the Representatives' Hall on that day, having been otherwise occupied, did not reach the House until half an hour after the sitting commenced, when the yeas and nays were in the act of being recorded by the Clerk, on the question of adjournment. Desirous of properly stating what had taken place, information was sought for, collected, and arranged with unusual care to avoid error; and, with a particular desire to guard against the possibility of misstating any part of Mr. Randolph's language, it was stated so generally as not to be capable of misapprehension. Had any gentleman, whose name was mentioned in the account of that day's proceedings, pointed out an error in respect to himself, it would at the time have been, according to our invariable usage, promptly acknowledged and corrected. It shall yet be. What we did not know, we could not state. If any thing material was shown to be omitted, the defect would have been supplied; and it shall yet be.

The motion above stated, was proposed by Mr. Strother, of Virginia, to be amended, by adding thereto words to the following effect:

"Unless the information required by the gentleman from Virginia, is furnished by to-morrow morning."

MARCH, 1820.

"An act authorizing the Secretary of State to issue letters patent to Richard Wilcox." The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Anthony S. Delisle, Edward B. Dudley, and John M. Van Cleef." The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the President, Directors, and Company, of the Merchants' Bank of Newport, in Rhode Island." The bill was reported without amendment, and it was ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Jennings O'Bannon." The bill was reported without amendment.

Mr. Foor moved to amend the said bill, by transposing the words on the exhibition of proper vouchers, from the place in which they stand, to come in next after the words Treasury Department.

And, the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

SALE OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act further to suspend, for a limited time, the sale or forfeiture of land for failure in completing the payment thereon," was read the third time; and the question was stated, Shall it pass? when

A motion was made by Mr. SLOCUMB to lay the bill on the table; which was opposed by Mr. ANDERSON.

A short debate then arose involving the merits of the bill, which was supported by MESSRS. HARDIN, FULLER, BRUSH, HILL, STORRS, CAMPELL, LOWNDES, RANKIN, BEECHER, and COOK, and opposed by MESSRS. COBB and SLOCUMB.

The ground on which the bill was supported, was, generally, that the indulgence, proposed to be extended by this bill, had been granted for so many successive years, that it had been confidently calculated upon by the purchasers of the public lands; and that there was nothing in the circumstances of the present times which made the indulgence less necessary than hitherto, but rather the contrary. It was not denied that this indulgence ought to cease, but, it was said, it ought not to cease without some previous intimation of the intention of Congress in this respect—such, for example, as would be given by the passage of the bill now depending for changing the mode of disposing of the public lands.

The bill was opposed on the ground that it was time to change a system which daily augmented the debt due to the Treasury, and kept from it so large an amount of money, at a time when the Treasury is certainly not overflowing. Some relief, probably, was necessary, but it was worthy of inquiry whether it could not be better given in a different form. If such a bill as this was to pass at this session, however, it was contended that it ought to be delayed until the system could be examined, with a view to a remedy of what was certainly an evil, the progress of which ought to be arrested.

The motion to lay the bill on the table was overruled; and it was finally passed, not without opposition, but without a division, and returned to the Senate.

REMISSION OF DUTIES.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate for the relief of certain persons who have paid duties on certain goods imported into Castine.

This bill embraces a case, in which, on the redelivery of Castine to the United States at the close of the late war, certain foreign goods were found there, and duties thereon were levied by the collector of the United States, though the same goods had previously paid the duties levied thereon by the British authorities. Most of the persons concerned resisted the payment demanded by the United States officers; and, by a recent decision of the Supreme Court, they are exempted from the payment, on the ground of national law.—Some, however, did pay their bonds; and this bill proposes, in order to place them on the same footing as those who resisted the payment, to refund from the Treasury the amount of those bonds.

On this bill a debate took place, it being opposed by MESSRS. HOLMES and RHEA, and supported by MESSRS. SMITH of Maryland, SERGEANT, SILSBEE, and MASON. MESSRS. TYLER and BARBOUR assigned the reasons why they should vote for the bill; yet disapproving the decision of the Supreme Court, which appeared to make its passage necessary, with a view to equity and justice.

The bill was opposed on the ground that, in all probability, the goods in question had been imported either during the war, to be smuggled into the United States—or, after the conclusion of peace, but before the place was given up, also with a view to their being conveyed into the United States, and thus to evade the duties which would have been payable had they been legally imported into the United States. If such were the fact, it was said that the duties ought not to be refunded.

The discussion resulted in the Committee's rising and reporting the bill, and obtaining leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, March 31.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Rosalie P. Deslonde," made a detailed report thereon, recommending that the said bill be postponed indefinitely; which report and bill were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ALEXANDER SMYTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the payment of a gun and gun-carriage, taken by the enemy at the battle of North Point, on the 12th September, 1814, made an unfavorable report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1820," were read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of certain sufferers by fire at Savannah, in Georgia," was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The resolution from the Senate, fixing a period for the termination of the present session of Congress, was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of the heirs and representatives of Nicholas Vreeland, deceased, was read the third time, and the question having been put on its passage—

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the bill do lie on the table; which motion was negatived.

The question was then taken, Shall it pass? and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. RANDOLPH then rose, and, after a speech of some length, to enforce the propriety of a respectful observance of this day, (Good Friday,) and of the duties connected with it—moved that when the House adjourn it adjourn to meet on Monday next, with an intimation that if the motion should prevail, he would forthwith follow it with a motion for adjournment.

The motion to adjourn over to Monday was negatived.

Mr. RANDOLPH then moved that the House do now adjourn.

This motion was also negatived—about twenty rising in favor of it.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of John A. Dix; An act authorizing payment to be made for certain muskets impressed into the service of the United States, (as amended); An act for the relief of the legal representatives of John O'Connor, deceased; An act for the relief of Mary Cassin, widow and administratrix of Patrick Cassin, deceased; An act for the relief of Robert Swartwout; An act for the relief of John Harding, Giles Harding, John Shute, and John Nicholas; An act authorizing the Secretary of State to issue letters patent to Richard Wilcox; and An act for the relief of Jennings O'Bannon; were severally read the third time, and passed.

IMPORTATION OF SLAVES.

The bill for the relief of Delisle, Dudley, and Van Cleef, being read a third time, and the question stated on its passage—

Mr. COCKE moved that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

[This is a case in which the forfeiture has been incurred by the importation of six domestic servants (slaves) by a captain of a vessel from a foreign port—he being officially assured by the Consul of the United States resident there, in writing, that there was nothing in the laws of the United States forbidding the importation of family slaves, by a person importing himself into the United States. The bill proposes a remission of the forfeiture thus incurred without any intent to violate the law.]

The motion to postpone brought on a debate of considerable extent on the merits of the bill; in which Messrs. SLOUMB, FOOT, SETTLE, McLANE, SMITH of Maryland, BRUSH, TOMLINSON, WHITMAN, STORRS, TRIMBLE, RHEA, FULLER, TAYLOR, and LIVERMORE, took part.

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, said, the extreme anxiety and impatience of gentlemen to pass the bill under consideration had surprised him. Six weeks, said he, have been spent on a subject involving no principle which can compare, in point of importance, with this bill. The Missouri question did not involve the question of freedom or slavery, but merely whether slaves now in the country might be permitted to reside in the proposed new State; and whether Congress or Missouri possessed the power to decide. But, sir, we are called upon by this bill to remit a penalty incurred for a violation of our laws "to prohibit the importation of slaves into our country"—a law of all others which in my opinion should be rigidly enforced and most sacredly regarded. And, sir, I am astonished to hear gentlemen, who, on the Missouri question, which not only agitated this House, but the whole country, to its base, and threatened a dissolution of the Union; and gentlemen too, who, on that occasion, denounced all as the friends of slavery who honestly differed with them in opinion on the Constitutional power of Congress; yes, sir, and who boldly declared that, fearless of all consequences, they would impose the restriction;—that these gentlemen should now be the advocates for a virtual repeal of the only law which prohibits the importation of slaves! Sir, if you pass this bill, you open your ports immediately to the importation of slaves, without number, under the head of domestics.

I entreat gentlemen to pause, if indeed, as they profess, they are disposed to prevent the slave trade. Go, sir, with me to Martinique, and witness the attempts made by citizens of the United States to smuggle slaves into the United States under this pretence! If they may be admitted as domestics, every vessel will be full-freighted with these domestic servants, and the slave will be as free as before the passage of your law.

But, say the gentlemen, this petitioner is innocent—he was ignorant of your laws. If so, I would ask, why did he apply to the commercial agent, to inquire whether domestic slaves might safely be brought? Look, sir, at the letter of the commercial agent to this petitioner, and say, if you can, that the petitioner was ignorant of our laws? No, sir, the petitioner knew our law—he, sir, knew it was in violation of that law—and if, sir, after this, he was disposed to trust the chance of escape or evasion of that law, which, of all others, should be most rigorously enforced, I shall never give my vote for his relief.

Pass this bill, sir, and you may employ your armies and navies in vain to break up this most inhuman and barbarous traffic.

Revolutionary Pensions.

MARCH, 1820.

The question on indefinite postponement was at length decided in the negative—89 to 67.

A doubt was then suggested by Mr. BARBOUR, whether Congress possessed the power to remit that portion of the forfeiture which by law accrues to the informers or prosecutors of the alleged offence, and whether the bill therefore did not, in this respect, require a limitation to that portion of the penalty which accrued to the United States.

Hereupon further debate took place; and a motion was made by Mr. PINDALL to recommit the bill, with instructions so to amend it as to remit only that portion of the forfeiture which has accrued to the use of the United States; which motion was decided affirmatively by a vote of 64 to 52.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider, the bill in addition to an act entitled "An act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war," passed on the 18th of March, 1818; and the said bill being read—

Mr. BARBOUR moved to amend the same, by striking out the third section and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the act to which this is an amendment shall be so construed as that no person shall be entitled to its provisions whose property is of the value of —, which value shall be taken from the estimation of the court to which the schedule shall be exhibited, and which is hereinbefore required to be certified to the Secretary of War.

And, the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. WHITMAN then moved an amendment to strike out the whole of the said bill, except the enacting clause, and to substitute in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 1. That every person who may hereafter apply for a pension under the act to which this is in addition, shall file with the judge who may administer the oath in relation to the service of the applicant, an additional affidavit, specifying the kinds, and the amount in value of each kind, of all and singular his goods, chattels, lands, and tenements, rights and credits, if any, of which he may be seized and possessed at the time of making his application; and, also, the income, if any, he may have from any other source, and comprising his ability to labor in aid of his subsistence; and exhibiting the state and degree of his reduced circumstances in life, and of his need of assistance from his country for support; and declaring that he has not, since the passage of the act to which this is in addition, in any manner alienated, assigned, transferred, sold, or conveyed, any portion of his estate, or in any manner encumbered the same, with a view to become entitled to the benefit thereof; which affidavit, being corroborated by other testimony, to the satisfaction of the judge, and being certified by him to have been so proved, shall be forwarded to the Secretary of War, with the other papers of the applicant, required by the act to which this is in addition.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War shall be, and he hereby is, required, whenever he shall have been informed, and whenever he shall have good cause to apprehend, and shall, in fact, apprehend, that a pension has been granted, under the act to which this is in addition, to any person not justly entitled thereto, he shall cause notice thereof to be given to such pensioner, who shall, thereupon, file his affidavit, in the same manner, and comprising the same particulars, as are herein further provided, in the case of all further applications under the act to which this is in addition; and containing any other facts which the Secretary of War may prescribe to, and require of, such applicant, in relation to his term of service, and the corps or line in which he may have served; and the affidavit, being so filed, proved, and certified, shall be forwarded to the Secretary of War, who, on inspection thereof, shall decide whether such pensioner be entitled to his pension, and shall continue or revoke the same accordingly; and no pension shall be paid to any pensioner, which shall have become due, after notice, as aforesaid, from the Secretary of War, that his right to a pension has become doubtful, until the Secretary of War shall have decided, on inspection of the affidavit so to be forwarded, that the pensioner is justly entitled thereto.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War shall cause each of the district attorneys and marshals of the United States to be furnished with a list of the pensioners residing within their respective districts; and it shall be the duty of the said attorneys and marshals to acquaint the Secretary of War with every case in which they may apprehend that any person has been unduly placed on the pension list; and it shall, moreover, be the duty of the said attorneys to lay such lists before the grand jurors, at each and every term of the courts of the United States at which a grand jury shall be assembled, and examine each and every of them, as to any knowledge he may have of any person on said list who shall not be justly entitled to said pension; and any attorney who, on such inquiry, shall have reason to apprehend that any person named on said list has no just claim to a pension, he shall acquaint the Secretary of War therewith.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That any person, being the agent or attorney of any pensioner, shall, before he shall receive the pension which shall at any time become due to his constituent or principal, declare, on oath, or affirmation, before some magistrate competent to administer the same, that he has not, directly or indirectly, either as the creditor of his constituent or principal, or otherwise, any claim to, or contract in, the money, or any part of it, which he may be about to receive; and that he will, without unnecessary delay, pay over the money he may receive, without deducting any fee or reward therefor, other than that which he may pay to a magistrate for authenticating the documents required to entitle him, as agent or attorney, to receive such pension, to the pensioner, personally, or to his guardian, executor, or administrator, entitled to receive the same.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any person whatever shall withhold any pension certificate from any pensioner, his guardian, executor, or administrator, lawfully entitled to the possession of the same, under any pretence whatever, after reasonable notice and demand to deliver the same, he shall forfeit and pay to the person entitled to the possession of such certificate, to and for the use of such pensioner, his heirs, or assigns, twice the amount of any sum that, at the time of making such demand, shall be due, or that shall become due thereon at any time before the surrender of such certificate to the person justly entitled to the possession thereof; to be recovered by action of debt, in any court proper to try the same.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That, in case of the insanity of any person entitled to the benefits of the act to which this is in addition, his application therefor may be made by guardian, or the person or persons to whom, by law, the custody of such insane person, his goods and effects, shall have been assigned, who shall state the facts, a statement of which would, otherwise, have been required of such insane person; and shall swear, or affirm, that the same are true, according to the best of his or their knowledge and belief; and shall, also, produce other evidence of the truth thereof, to the satisfaction of the judge who shall attend to the verification of such facts.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall, wittingly and willingly, testify falsely in relation to any matter and thing required by this act, shall be deemed and taken to be guilty of the crime of perjury; and, being thereof convicted, shall be punished accordingly.

The said substitute being read—

Mr. BLOOMFIELD moved that the bill lie on the table; which being rejected, the question was then taken on the amendment moved by Mr. WHITMAN, and determined in the negative.

Mr. STORRS moved to amend the bill by striking out the word "indigent," in the sixth line of the third section. And, on the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, then said, he was not able to discover any good reason for a distinction between the officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary war now reduced to poverty; and, as putting them on the same footing would save to the country annually a considerable sum of money, he moved to add the following as a new section to the bill:

"That no officer who now is, or may hereafter be placed on the pension list, shall, after the payment of that part of his pension which became due on the 4th day of March, 1820, be entitled to receive more than ten dollars per month, the same as received by all other persons on the pension list."

The yeas and nays being required by Mr. CANNON on agreeing to this motion, were—for the motion, 62; against it, 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Ball, Barbour, Beecher, Brevard, Brown, Bryan, Burton, Burwell, Campbell, Cannon, Cobb, Cocke, Cook, Crafts, Crawford, Cuthbert, Davidson, Earle, Edwards of North Carolina, Floyd, Folger, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hall of North Carolina, Hazard, Hendricks, Hooks, McCoy, McCreary, McLean of Kentucky, Marchand, Metcalf, R. Moore, Overstreet, Parker of Virginia, Plumer, Reed, Rich, Richards, Richmond, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Settle, Shaw, Sloan, Slocumb, B. Smith of Virginia, Smith of North Carolina, Southard, Stevens, Strong of Vermont, Strother, Swearingen, Tarr, Terrell, Tompkins, Tucker of South Carolina, Walker, and Williams of North Carolina.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Allen of New York,

Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Baldwin, Bateman, Bayly, Bloomfield, Boden, Brush, Buffum, Butler of Louisiana, Case, Claggett, Clark, Culpeper, Cushman, Darlington, Dewitt, Dickinson, Dowse, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Fay, Foot, Ford, Forrest, Fuller, Fullerton, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hall of Delaware, Hardin, Hibbsman, Hill, Holmes, Hostetter, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Kendall, Kent, Kinsey, Kinsley, Lathrop, Little, Lincoln, Linn, Livermore, Lowndes, Maclay, McLane of Delaware, Mallary, Mason, Meech, Meigs, Mercer, S. Moore, Monell, Morton, Murray, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Parker of Massachusetts, Patterson, Philson, Pindall, Pitcher, Quarles, Rhea, Rogers, Russ, Sampson, Silsbee, Smith of New Jersey, Smith of Maryland, A. Smyth of Virginia, Strong of New York, Taylor, Tomlinson, Tracy, Tyler, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Wendover, Whiteman and Wood.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved to amend that part of the first section of the bill which requires an applicant for a pension to swear, or affirm, that he was a resident citizen of the United States on the 18th of April, 1818, by striking out the word resident; which was rejected.

Mr. CANNON, under the impression that the service of the militia had been of as much importance, and their sacrifices as great at least as those of the continental soldiers, moved to amend the bill by adding a new section, as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the militia, who have performed service to the amount of nine months, by one or more tours of duty, during the Revolutionary war, shall also be entitled to the provisions of the aforesaid act, passed the 18th of March, 1818.

Mr. HARDIN suggested that the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee was incomplete. He ought to have connected with it provisions for a direct tax or internal duties, which would be the necessary consequence of a measure that would add full five millions to the present amount of expenditures under the pension act.

Mr. CANNON said, he would tell the gentleman, if Congress went on with their present enormous expenditures, he should be ready, without this provision, for a direct tax. He placed his motion, he said, on the grounds of equality and justice, which appeared to him to sustain it.

Mr. BLOOMFIELD said a few words against the motion; when the question was taken thereon, and decided in the negative, five or six members rising in support of it.

Mr. CAMPBELL then moved to amend the bill, by adding thereto the following section:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no application for a pension under the act to which this is an amendment, shall be received by the Secretary of War after the first day of June, 1820.

This motion was supported by the mover, and opposed by Messrs. McLEAN, LIVERMORE, FOOT, CULPEPER, BLOOMFIELD, and A. SMYTH—and was decided in the negative, without a division.

Mr. STROTHER moved an amendment, to strike out the whole of the said bill, except the enacting clause, and to substitute, in lieu thereof, the following:

H. OF R.

Revolutionary Pensions.

MARCH, 1820.

"That the act, entitled 'An act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war,' passed the 18th day of March, 1818, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

Mr. S. said he voted for the law, without foreseeing the extent of its operation. Being convinced, now, that its benefits were not equal to its expensiveness, he made the best reparation he could to the country, by moving its repeal.

Mr. CANNON assigned the reason why, contrary to his disposition heretofore expressed, he should vote for the repeal of the law. He had endeavored to obtain amendments to the law, to place the officers and soldiers on the same footing, and to place the militiaman, of equal or greater merit, on the same footing as the continental soldier. In these objects, he had failed; and he felt himself now bound to vote for the repeal of a law unjust and inequitable in its operation.

Mr. CUSHMAN, of Massachusetts, spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the amendment now under consideration, as well as to most of the provisions of the bill, as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means; for, as much as I regret that the revenue should be burdened with a list of pensioners, of almost every description, I should more deeply regret that the law granting aid to the Revolutionary soldier, in reduced circumstances, should be repealed, or even modified to his detriment. This repeal, sir, or modification, would be attended with consequences to be deprecated. It would shake a confidence in the promises of Government, and excite suspicions injurious to its reputation for wisdom or rectitude. What, sir, will you, of your own good will and pleasure, make a gratuity, and guaranty your bounty for life, by all the formalities of law and justice, and upon experiencing some trivial inconvenience, some temporary scantiness of funds, some delay in collecting your revenues, rescind your solemn engagement? Who hereafter will have any reliance on your plighted faith? Such a conduct would degrade an individual, and will it comport with the honor and dignity of a great nation, if not with an overflowing treasury, rich in resources? Will it not serve to strengthen the opinion, too readily adopted, that a Government by the people is unstable and fluctuating; that it is characteristic of all republics to be ungrateful? It belongs to the American Republic, by a magnanimous policy, to wipe away this vile reproach—to prevent this foul stain.

The present generation, living in ease and basking in the sunshine of prosperity, can form no adequate conception of what the army of the Revolution suffered in the cause of liberty, to prevent the tyranny meditated for this country.

In the first years of the war the soldiers enlisted with little or no bounty; served with little or no pay; frequently subsisted on scanty rations; and, hungry, thirsty, and without convenient clothing, endured the severest fatigue. They took the field in the lowest ebb of their country's fortune, with no prospect before them but victory or death.

Amidst the inclemency of the seasons they performed difficult marches, while the falling snows were discolored, or the frozen ground besprinkled, with the blood issuing from their lacerated feet. On the cold earth they bivouacked, exposed to the beating storms, with no other covering but the canopy of the heavens. Under every discouragement they persevered, and in every scene of action or distress displayed a patience and fortitude, a patriotism and valor, which no obstacles could overcome, no dangers appal. They suffered, they fought and bled, not to swell the triumphs of a proud conqueror, not to enslave any portion of mankind, but in the cause of justice and humanity, to ameliorate the condition of their fellow-men, and their achievements were such as to astonish and delight the world. They broke the rod of the oppressor, and procured for an aggrieved people freedom, sovereignty, and independence.

To an honorable gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. S. SMITH,) as well as to an honorable gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. BLOOMFIELD,) who partook in the sufferings, and aided the triumphs, of the Revolutionary army, I dare appeal for the general correctness of what I have here affirmed. Is it credible; does it not rather exceed belief, that a single murmur should be heard, an unpleasant sensation indulged, because the soldier, who devoted the bloom and vigor of life to save his country from oppression, should receive from that country a small boon? Is it manly; is it generous; does it comport even with equity, to take from him this boon, and leave him nothing to show for his prowess and toils but poverty, wretchedness, and scars? Let no such injustice, sir, stain your journals. Let it never be recorded by history's golden pen. Does it become those who, privileged with a seat within these magnificent walls; who behold the splendors of the Capitol; who solace themselves in the elegant pleasures, the refined luxuries of the city; whose every sense is regaled with its brilliant scenes; does it become those who, by the courtesy of the people, are clothed with the robes of office, and by their bounty fare sumptuously every day; does it, sir, become such to grudge the plain morsel, the homely meal, to the warworn soldier, by whose sufferings and blood they are enabled to participate in those elevated enjoyments? Honor, and every ennobling sensation of the generous mind, must recoil from the attempt. It should be the policy of our Government, as I trust it is, to countenance manly virtue, to cherish exalted merit, to allure to uncommon excellence by motives calculated to operate on liberal minds, and generously to reward the patriotic and brave, who for the public safety expose their own lives.

In advocating the cause of the Revolutionary soldiers, I feel a confidence in the rectitude of my sentiments. They are supported by those of the great WASHINGTON, so justly styled the Father of his Country; which, sir, with your leave, I will recite. They are to be found in a letter addressed to the President of Congress, dated Headquarters, Newburg, March 18, 1783. They are these: "If, besides the simple payment of their wages, further 'compensation is not due to the sufferings and sacrifices of the officers, then have I been mistaken, indeed. If the whole army have not merited whatever a grateful people can bestow, then have I been beguiled by prejudice, and built an opinion on the basis of error." "And if, retiring from the field, they are to grow old in poverty, wretchedness, and contempt; if they are to wade through the vile mire of dependency, and owe the miserable remnant of that life to charity, which hitherto has been spent in honor, then shall I have learnt what ingratitude is; then shall I have realized a tale which will embitter every moment of my future life. But I am under no such apprehension. A country rescued by their arms from impending ruin will never leave unpaid the debt of gratitude."

Such, sir, were the sentiments of the patriotic Chief of our Revolutionary army. They speak to the understanding, and they speak to the heart. They invoke our justice as well as our gratitude, and they urge with a pathos and force which, I trust, will not be resisted. I am, sir, unwilling to believe that there are many in this House, or even in the nation, who would snatch from the veteran soldier the only prop on which he can lean now in the decline of life. This would be sporting with his feelings. It would not merely cause those wounds which he received in fighting for independence to bleed afresh, it would make new and deep incisions in the tenderest sensibilities of the heart. What, sir, after assuaging the anguish of his wound, and raising in him some faint desire of life, will you withdraw your compassionate hand, and leave him to perish in his blood? I conjure you, sir, by those almost divine sympathies which are cherished by the patriotic and the brave, to continue your bounty. Impart to the drooping soldier some gleam of comfort, some ray of consolation, hastening, as he is, to that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveller returns.

I dissent, sir, from gentlemen who have expressed their wishes on this subject. I neither desire, with my amiable young friend and worthy colleague, (Mr. LINCOLN,) that the soldier of the Revolution should live forever; nor, with the honorable Speaker, whom I should feel a pride and pleasure in calling my friend, that the life of the soldier should be protracted to the term of nine hundred and ninety-nine years. If I have any wish on this score it is this, that, as the soldier of the Revolution fought the good fight, and sealed the republican cause with his blood, when he shall have finished his course, he may be translated to happier regions; where, secure from the strictures and frowns of the ungrateful, he may receive the rewards due to patriotism and valor, to moral virtues and generous deeds.

Without further debate, the question was taken on the motion of Mr. STROTHER, to repeal the law and decided: For the motion 32, against the motion 122, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Barbour, Brevard, Burton, Burwell, Cannon, Cobb, Crawford, Cuthbert, Edwards of North Carolina, Fisher, Hall of Delaware, Jones of Virginia, Lowndes, McCoy, Metcalf, Morton, Parker of Virginia, Quarles, Reed, Richards, Robertson, Sawyer, Slocumb, B. Smith of Virginia, Smith of North Carolina, Strong of Vermont, Strother, Terrell, Tompkins, and Walker.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Alexander, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Baker, Baldwin, Ball, Bateman, Bayly, Beecher, Bloomfield, Boden, Brown, Brush, Bryan, Buffum, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Case, Clagett, Clark, Cocke, Cook, Crafts, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cushman, Darlington, Dewitt, Dickinson, Dowse, Earle, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Fay, Floyd, Folger, Foot, Ford, Forrest, Fuller, Fullerton, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hardin, Hazard, Hendricks, Hibshman, Hill, Holmes, Hooks, Hostetter, Jones of Tennessee, Kendall, Kent, Kinsey, Kinsley, Lathrop, Little, Lincoln, Linn, Livermore, Lyman, Maclay, McCreary, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Kentucky, Mallary, Marchand, Mason, Mercer, R. Moore, S. Moore, Monell, Murray, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Overstreet, Parker of Massachusetts, Patterson, Philson, Pindall, Pitcher, Plumer, Rhea, Rich, Richmond, Rogers, Ross, Russ, Sampson, Settle, Silsbee, Sloan, Smith of New Jersey, Smith of Maryland, A. Smyth of Virginia, Southard, Stevens, Storrs, Strong of New York, Swearingen, Tarr, Taylor, Tomlinson, Tracy, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Wendover, Whitman, Williams of North Carolina, and Wood.

Mr. MORRIS then moved that the said bill be amended by striking out all thereof except the enacting clause, and substituting, in lieu thereof, the following:

That every person who now is, or hereafter may be, placed on the pension list of the United States, by virtue of an act of Congress, entitled "An act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war," passed the eighteenth of March, 1818, who served for the term of nine months, and for a term less than three years, shall be entitled to receive the amount of the pension allowed him by said act for the term of three years from the date of his declaration, and no longer; and every person who now is, or who hereafter may be, placed on the pension list of the United States by virtue of the act aforesaid, who served for the term of three years, or longer, shall be entitled to receive the amount allowed him by said act for the term of five years from the date of his declaration, and no longer.

The said substitute being read, the question was taken to agree thereto, and determined in the negative—186 to 46.

Mr. STROTHER again moved to strike out all of the said bill except the enacting clause, and to substitute, in lieu thereof, the following:

That, after the half year ending in September next, the pensions of all persons who have been placed on the pension list under the act hereby amended, shall be respectively reduced fifty per cent.

And, the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. WHITMAN moved to add to the said bill the fourth and fifth sections of the substitute this day proposed by him, and rejected by the House.

APRIL, 1820.

And, the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and decided in the affirmative, by a large majority.

SATURDAY, April 1.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of Ohio, residing between the Miama and Scioto rivers; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to pass any law upon the subject of the complaint of the petitioner.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the same committee, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law to procure, for the use of the United States, copies of the plans and field notes of the lands in the "Ohio Company's Purchase," made an unfavorable report thereon; which was committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts for the adjustment of land claims in the State of Louisiana," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill for the relief of William Pancoast; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was recommitteed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Anthony S. Delisle, Edward B. Dudley, and John M. Van Cleef," reported the same with amendments; which were read and concurred in by the House, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time.

Mr. HOLMES, from the select committee to whom was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for apportioning the Representatives in the Seventeenth Congress to be elected in the States of Massachusetts and Maine, and for other purposes," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was ordered to be read a third time today. The bill was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose to make a motion which was not more, he said, the result of duty than of inclination. If we cannot, said Mr. R., comply with all the injunctions of duty, incumbent upon us at this time, let us approximate as nearly to it as we can; and, if we cannot make ourselves unspotted before the world, we may at least visit the fatherless and the widow. Mr. R., therefore, moved to postpone all the orders of the day preceding, and take up the bill for the relief of the widow and children of the late Oliver Hazard Perry.

On this motion the House divided, and the vote was, ayes 58, noes 64—so the motion was negatived.

On motion of Mr. COCKE, and after some remarks explanatory of his object, which was chiefly to ascertain if contracts had been made for the sake of favorites, it was—

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to lay before this House copies of all contracts made and entered into by the Commissary General for supplying provisions for the Army of the United States since the establishment of that Department; also all propositions made, and which were not withdrawn, for supplying the same, specifying particularly to which contract the several propositions apply.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

The engrossed bill to amend the Revolutionary Pension Law was read the third time, and the question stated on its passage.

Mr. ADAMS, Mr. STRONG of New York, and Mr. GROSS of New York, respectively, submitted their reasons at large against this bill.

Mr. BARBOUR proposed to recommit the bill, with the view of introducing an amendment.

Mr. ADAMS moved to postpone the bill indefinitely, but afterwards varied his motion to postpone it to the next session of Congress.

On this motion a debate of much animation, and of two or three hours' duration, took place. The motion was sustained for various reasons, but chiefly that the bill was not such a modification of the existing act as was acceptable to them, by MESSRS. MOSELEY, ADAMS, PINDALL, CLAGETT, TAYLOR, and HARDIN—the two last named gentlemen being averse to the repeal of the act at all. The motion to postpone was opposed by MESSRS. ANDERSON, BARBOUR, CULPEPER, OVERSTREET, RHEA, BLOOMFIELD, and WARFIELD.

Mr. CLAGETT, of New Hampshire, said—

Mr. SPEAKER, so far as this bill and the proposed amendments are intended to operate as a repeal of the law in question, whether to change the pension for life to a less, or any limited number of years, or in any manner to lessen the amount granted to the officers or soldiers for whose benefit that law passed, I am opposed to the measure. The ground of my opposition arises from a firm belief, first, that the officers and soldiers of the Revolution are entitled to our consideration; and, secondly, that the law intended to be in part repealed vests, in those who are really the subjects of it, a right of which Congress has not now a moral power to divest them. Writers upon national law consider "nations as moral persons," and hold them bound to a strict performance of their engagements; and, indeed, a contrary doctrine would tend to incalculable evil. But, sir, it has been said by an honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) that the pensions granted by the law of 1818 were gratuitous, and that, therefore, we are not morally bound to carry that law into complete effect. That gentleman has compared the obligation of that law upon us to a compromise made by one individual to another, without a legal consideration. Sir, I thank the honorable gentleman for his elucidation; and, though fully aware that that gentleman always takes as strong ground as his case will admit, I will venture to pursue the analogy, so far as it goes, adding to it, however, what should not have been omitted, and then apply it, by way of comparison, to the subject before us. The case stated was, in substance, this: "a poor mendicant asks charity of an individual, who, believing himself in affluent circumstances, and actuated by benevolent and noble principles, promises the desired relief; but, upon examining his coffers, and finding them not so full as he had expected, the promissor believes he cannot perform his promise without injury to himself or family: is he (says the gentleman) bound to the performance?" Sir, while I verily believe, had the honorable gentleman himself made such a promise, he would have scrupulously performed it, I readily admit that, in the case thus stated, he would not be legally bound; and I will also admit, that, if the state of his funds was, in fact, such that he could not extend the hand of charity, as promised, without material injury to himself or family, he would not be even morally bound to the performance. But, sir, as my honorable friend has cautiously submitted a case to suit his argument, permit me to add to his case, thus stated, the residue of what would most certainly have happened, had the same gentleman been the promissor. Suppose, then, the act of charity had been perfected, and the promised donation in possession of the donee; would the donor have either a legal or moral right to reclaim it? Sir, I will cheerfully submit this question to the decision of my honorable friend from Virginia, in full confidence that his answer will be in the negative.

Revolutionary Pensions.

And now, sir, let us compare this with the case before us; and, for the sake of argument, and to make a complete parallel, I will suppose that the soldiers of the Revolution had no claim upon you but that of charity. Suppose then, sir, as the fact really was, that, at the commencement of the last Congress, when you met under circumstances most auspicious, than which few sessions, if any, more pleasant have passed, or may again soon occur; when an expensive war had terminated gloriously, peace and prosperity pervaded our common country, and our Treasury was overflowing—at that moment, the Chief Magistrate recommended to your consideration the debt of gratitude due to the soldiers of the Revolution; you seized the opportunity, and, actuated by the noblest feelings of the human heart, you promised relief to the poor and needy among those by whose valor (under Divine Providence) the nation had been advanced to such a state of prosperity; and you pledged the faith of that nation for its performance. Yes, sir, by the most solemn act in your power, you gave them this pledge; you passed a law, under all the solemnities of legislative authority, that, during the remainder of their lives, they should annually receive from your Treasury a certain stipulated sum; you put this law into their hands, as an order on your Treasury; they have presented it, and it has been accepted; and these suffering soldiers, with tears of gratitude in their eyes, and with benedictions upon their country, have received a part of your bounty, as an earnest of the whole.

Mr. Speaker, I have pursued and finished the parallel drawn by the honorable gentleman from Virginia; and, I ask, is it not strikingly analogous to the case before us? And, sir, though your Treasury may not now be full to overflowing, you are rich in resources, and able to fulfil all your engagements. Will you withdraw from the indigent soldier this gratuity? (admitting it to be such only.) Nay, sir, can you, consistent with moral principles, withhold this stipulated relief? No, sir, you cannot; and I might safely rest my argument here; but the soldier of the Revolution has a stronger claim, if possible, than that of mere charity. You promised him wages, food, and raiment, while fighting the battles of his country and defending her liberties. How were these promises performed? You promised him forty shillings per month; but, when received, forty dollars would not purchase a pair of shoes; no, not a dinner. You promised him food and raiment convenient for him; but, alas! the history of our country records against us the non-performance of these promises; and the very footsteps of the promisee established the fact! Sir, I am far, very far, from imputing to the then Government intentional laches or neglect. No, sir, it was a time of general distress; and the Government was then unable to fulfil its engagements—not so when you passed this law; not so now. Sir, I repeat, your resources are ample to meet all just claims. Are you not bound to perform your engagement? Yes, sir, whether you consider this law as founded on a debt due by contract, or mere gratitude to the Revolutionary soldier, he has a vested right in his pension for life; and you are bound, morally bound, to perform your engagement. But, sir, it has been contended that the soldier's right to his pension, under the law, is not vested. Let me ask gentlemen, what remains to make this a vested or perfect right? Was not the act of the Government as perfect and as solemn as it was possible to make it? Was it not founded upon a good and valuable consideration? And has not the soldier accepted it? Yes, sir, all this clearly appears. What more, then, could have been done by either party to perfect this right? I know of nothing.

But, sir, many of these soldiers, confiding in the integrity of Government, have changed their situations in life; and depending on their pensions for support, have promised portions of what is yet due, to those who have furnished them with the necessities of life; and, if this law should now be repealed, in whole or in part, how great will be their disappointment and distress; their joy will be changed to grief, and many of them will have received an injury instead of a benefit. Sir, would this fulfil our obligations to the defenders of our liberties, or, in the language of the report of the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, (which I had hoped would have been sooner acted upon,) will it "comport with the honor and dignity of the nation?" Sir, I think it will not. But, it is said, frauds are committed under this law; and, in order to ascertain it, we have had recourse to the Secretary of War, who has reported that he has been informed of some few instances, and that in all cases where fraud has been manifest, he has applied a remedy; he has stricken such fraudulent claimants from the pension roll. Sir, I do not give a decided opinion that this power is strictly within the purview of the law; but, if there be any doubt on that subject, I am willing to place the power in that officer by law, and have no doubt it will be strictly and properly executed; or, if some other mode is preferred, I am ready to give all the aid in my power to guard against fraud, but I cannot consent to repeal the law, or in any manner to lessen the pensions granted; nor am I willing to annex such new and unreasonable expenses and burdens on the poor and innocent pensioners, because of the suggestion that some few may have been guilty of fraud, and have evaded the law.

H. OF R.

Proceedings.

Sir, it is well known what trouble and delay have attended the claimants already in perfecting their claims; and, should the proposed amendments be adopted, the soldiers will, at all events, be deprived of a part of their promised pensions, and, as to the residue, the trouble and expense will be so great that many of them, by reason of poverty, age, and infirmity, will be unable to comply with the requisitions; and as to such the operation will virtually be as a repeal of the law in toto. But it is also urged by the friends of the amendments, that the present law operates unequally; and I admit it; and when it was enacted I was in favor of a different provision, as I should be now, if practicable. It was my wish to have distributed this bounty to all the officers and soldiers of the regular Revolutionary army, but in a different manner; and I am fully convinced that the same amount, and probably much less, would have given general satisfaction. But, sir, the law which then passed was the only one which could be agreed upon, and it had my vote. And, sir, believing that the faith of the nation is pledged for the execution of that law, I shall vote against the proposed amendments.

The motion to postpone the bill was finally negatived by yeas and nays, as follows:

MONDAY, April 3.

Mr. RHEA reported a bill concerning invalid pensioners; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill to revive and continue an act to provide for persons who were disabled by known wounds received in the Revolutionary war.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to amend the several acts providing for sick and disabled seamen, and for establishing naval hospitals; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH, from the same committee, to which were referred bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of Walter Channing," and "An act for the relief of certain sufferers by fire at Savannah, in Georgia," reported the same without amendment, and they were respectively committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the location of warrants which issued to the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line on continental establishment, in the Revolutionary war, and for the emanation of patents in cases where locations have been made, made a report, in which they ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; which report was read, and concurred in by the House.

FUGITIVE SLAVES.

Mr. PINDALL, of Virginia, offered for consideration the following resolution, in support of which he made some remarks, referring to the current report that an act of the description therein referred to had recently passed the Legislature of Pennsylvania:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to procure and transmit to this House, as soon as practicable, a copy of such late act or acts of the Pennsylvania Legislature as prohibit or restrain the justices, aldermen, or other magistrates or officers of that State from interposing in the apprehension or surrender of fugitive slaves, [or from carrying into effect the act of Congress, entitled "An act respecting fugitives from justice and persons escaping from the service of their masters," passed on the 12th of February, 1793.]

Mr. MACLAY, of Pennsylvania, suggested that, if the object of the motion was only to obtain a copy of the act, the latter clause of the resolve was unnecessary, and he wished to see it expunged, because he did not think that any act had passed the Legislature prohibiting the State officers from carrying into effect the act of Congress.

To obviate this objection, Mr. PINDALL consented to modify his motion so as to omit the clause within brackets, at the close of the above resolve.

The resolve was then amended, on motion, by adding to the end of the resolution the words following: "Provided, any such act or acts shall have been passed."

Mr. S. MOORE then moved to lay the resolution on the table; which motion was opposed by Mr. STROTHER, and it was negatived, and the resolution was agreed to.

REMISSION OF DUTIES.

Mr. HOLMES prefaced the submission of the following resolve, with a few remarks explanatory of his object. He said he believed that very few gentlemen were aware of the importance of the principle involved in this bill. There were, he said, about forty-five claimants, for whose benefit the bill was intended; and the sum involved was not less probably than fifty thousand dollars. The subject was, therefore, worthy of inquiry, and it was particularly desirable that the House should not, through want of information, be induced to remit the duties on goods imported into the British lines during the war by American merchants, with a view to their being smuggled into the United States. Such, he was under the impression, was the case of at least some of these claimants. He, therefore, moved this resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill for the relief of certain persons who have paid duties on certain goods imported into Castine, and that it be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, to inquire and report—

1. Who are the persons claiming relief under the bill, and the amount of each claim.

2. At what time the goods, from which a relief from duties is claimed, were imported into Castine.

3. Who were the importers, and on whose account.

4. What amount of goods were originally imported by any of the claimants, and how much thereof have been disposed of, and in what manner.

5. What was the price or value at the time of importation.

6. What duties were paid on them to the British custom-house.

7. And to report any other facts which they may deem expedient, not embraced within the scope of these inquiries; or to make such amendments to the bill as may be proper to exclude from its provisions certain claimants who were importers of goods into a territory occupied by the enemy.

Hereupon a debate arose—the resolution being opposed by Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, MASON, KINSLEY, WHITMAN, and LIVERMORE, on the ground that it would produce unnecessary delay, &c., and that there was nothing in the nature of the cases which called for this inquiry; and being supported by the mover of the resolve, and by Messrs. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, CLAGETT, and RHEA.

After a long debate the question was taken, separately, on discharging the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill, on recommitting it to the Committee of Ways and Means, and on adding the instructions proposed, and severally agreed to.

So the whole motion of Mr. HOLMES prevailed, as above stated.

REMISSION OF FORFEITURE.

The bill for the relief of Delisle, Dudley, and Van Cleef, providing for the remission of a forfeiture incurred by an accidental importation of six slaves, in the brig Sally, was read a third time; and the yeas and nays on its passage being required by Mr. TRACY, stood—For the bill 85, against the bill 73, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Anderson, Archer of Virginia, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour, Bayly, Brevard, Brown, Brush, Bryan, Burton, Burwell, Butler of New Hampshire, Butler of Louisiana, Cannon, Case, Cobb, Cook, Crafts, Crowell, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davidson, Edwards of North Carolina, Fisher, Floyd, Ford, Fuller, Fullerton, Garnett, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hall of North Carolina, Hardin, Hendricks, Hibshman, Holmes, Hooks, Jones of Virginia, Kent, Kinsey, Kinsley, Linn, Livermore, Macclay, McCoy, McLean of Kentucky, Mallary, Meech, Moseley, Murray, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Newton, Overstreet, Parker of Massachusetts, Parker of Virginia, Phelps, Pindall, Pitcher, Quarles, Rankin, Sampson, Settle, Shaw, Slocumb, Smith of New Jersey, Smith of Maryland, B. Smith of Virginia, Smith of North Carolina, Strother, Swearingen, Terrell, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Tyler, Walker, Wallace, Warfield, and Williams of North Carolina.

NAMEs—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Tennessee, Baker, Bateman, Beecher, Bloomfield, Boden, Buffum, Campbell, Clagett, Clark, Cocke, Cushman, Darlington, Dewitt, Dickinson, Dowse, Earle, Eddy, Edwards of Conn., Edwards of Pennsylvania, Fay, Folger, Foot, Forrest, Hall of Delaware, Hazard, Hemphill, Herrick, Hill, Hostetter, Kendall, Lathrop, Lincoln, Lowndes, Lyman, McCreary, Marchand, Mason, Meigs, Metcalf, R. Moore, S. Moore, Monell, Morton, Nelson of Virginia, Patterson, Philson, Plumer, Rhea, Rich, Richards, Richmond, Robertson, Rogers, Ross, Russ, Sawyer, Sloan, A. Smyth of Virginia, Southard, Storrs, Strong of Vermont, Tarr, Taylor, Tomlinson, Tompkins, Tracy, Tucker of South Carolina, Van Rensselaer, Wendover, and Wood.

So the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence in the amendment, which limits the remission to so much of the forfeitures as accrues to the United States.

THE SPANISH TREATY.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the following resolutions, submitted some days ago by Mr. CLAY, (Speaker,) being under consideration:

1. Resolved, That the Constitution of the United States vests in Congress the power to dispose of the territory belonging to them, and that no treaty, purporting to alienate any portion thereof, is valid without the concurrence of Congress.

2. Resolved, That the equivalent proposed to be given by Spain, to the United States, in the treaty concluded between them, on the 22d day of February, 1819, for that part of Louisiana lying west of the Sabine, was inadequate; and that it would be inexpedient to make a transfer thereof to any foreign Power, or renew the aforesaid treaty.

Mr. CLAY said, that, whilst he felt very grateful to the House for the prompt and respectful manner in which they had allowed him to enter upon the discussion of the resolutions which he had the honor of submitting to their notice, he must at the same time frankly say, that he thought their character and consideration, in the councils of this country, were concerned in not letting the present session pass off without deliberating upon our affairs with Spain. In coming to the present session of Congress, it had been his anxious wish to be able to concur with the Executive branch of Government in the measures which it might conceive itself called on to recommend on that subject, for two reasons, of which the first, relating personally to himself, he would not trouble the Committee with further noticing. The other was, that it appeared to him to be always desirable, in respect to the foreign action of this Government, that there should be a perfect coincidence in opinion between its several co-ordinate branches. In time, however, of peace it might be allowable to those who are charged with the public interests to entertain and express their views, although there might be some discordance between them. In a season of war, there should be no division in the public councils; but an united and vigorous exertion to bring the war to an honorable conclusion. For his part, whenever that calamity may befall his country, he would entertain but one wish, and that is, that success might crown our struggle, and the war be gloriously and honorably terminated. He would never refuse to share in the joys incident to the victory of our arms, nor to participate in the griefs of defeat and discomfiture. He concurred entirely in the sentiment once expressed by that illustrious hero, whose recent melancholy fall we all so sincerely deplore, that fortune may attend our country in whatever war it may be involved.

There were two systems of policy, he said, of which our Government had had the choice. The first was, by appealing to the justice and affections of Spain, to employ all those persuasives which could arise out of abstinence from any direct countenance to the cause of South America, and the observance of a strict neutrality. The other was, by appealing to her justice also and to her fears, to prevail upon her to redress the injuries of which we complain—her fears, by a recognition of the independent governments of South America, and leaving her in a state of uncertainty as to the further step we might take in respect to those governments. The unratified treaty was the result of the first system. It could not be positively affirmed what effect the other system would have produced; but he verily believed that, whilst it rendered justice to those governments, and would have better comported with that magnanimous policy which ought to have characterized our own, it would have more successfully tended to an amicable and satisfactory arrangement of our differences with Spain.

The first system has so far failed. At the commencement of the session, the President recommended an enforcement of the provisions of the treaty. After three months deliberation, the Committee of Foreign Affairs, not being able to concur with him, has made us a report recommending the seizure of Florida, in the nature of a reprisal. Now, the President recommends our postponement of the subject until the next session. It had been his (Mr. C.'s) intention, whenever the Committee of Foreign Affairs should engage the House to act upon their bill, to offer, as a substitute for it, the system which he thought it became this country to adopt, of which the occupation of Texas, as our own, would have been a part, and the recognition of the independent governments of South America another. If he did not now bring forward this system, it was because the committee proposed to withdraw their bill, and because he knew too much of the temper of the House and of the Executive, to think that it was advisable to bring it forward. He hoped that some suitable opportunity might occur, during the session, for considering the propriety of recognising the independent governments of South America.

The Spanish Treaty.

H. OF R.

Whatever Mr. C. might think of the discretion which was evinced in recommending the postponement of the bill of the Committee of Foreign Relations, he could not think that the reasons assigned by the President for that recommendation were entitled to the weight which he had given them. Mr. C. thought that the House was called upon, by a high sense of duty, seriously to animadvert upon some of those reasons. He believed it was the first example, in the annals of the country, in which a course of policy, respecting one foreign Power, which we must suppose had been deliberately considered, has been recommended to be abandoned, in a domestic communication from one to another co-ordinate branch of the Government, upon the avowed ground of the interposition of other foreign Powers. And what was the nature of this interposition? It was evidenced by a cargo of scraps gathered up from this Chargé d'Affaires, and that of loose conversations held with this foreign Minister—and that perhaps mere levee conversations, without a commitment in writing, in a solitary instance, of any of the foreign parties concerned, except only in the case of his Imperial Majesty; and what was the character of his commitment we shall presently see. But, Mr. C. said, he must enter his solemn protest against this and every other species of foreign interference in our matters with Spain. What have they to do with them? Would they not repel, as officious and insulting intrusions, any interference on our part in their concerns with other foreign States? Would his Imperial Majesty have listened with complacency to our remonstrances against the vast acquisitions which he has recently made? He has lately crammed his enormous maw with Finland and with the spoils of Poland, and, whilst the difficult process of digestion is going on, he throws himself upon a couch, and cries out—don't, don't disturb my repose!

He charges his Minister here to plead the cause of peace and concord! The American "Government is too enlightened" (ah! sir how sweet this unction is, which is poured down our backs) to take hasty steps. And his Imperial Majesty's Minister here is required to engage (Mr. C. said he hoped that the original expression was less strong, but he believed that the French word engage bore the same meaning) the American Government, &c. Nevertheless, the Emperor does not interpose in this discussion. No! not he. He makes above all "no pretension to exercise an influence in the councils of a foreign Power." Not the slightest. And yet, at the very instant when he is protesting against the imputation of this influence, his interposition is proving effectual! His Imperial Majesty has at least manifested so far, in this particular, his capacity to govern his Empire, by the selection of a sagacious Minister. For if Count Nesselrode had never written another paragraph, the extract from his despatch to Mr. Poletica, which has been transmitted to this House would demonstrate that he merited the confidence of his master. It was quite refreshing to read such State papers after perusing those (he was sorry to say it; he wished there was a veil broad and thick enough to conceal them forever) which this treaty had produced on the part of our own Government.

Conversations between my Lord Castlereagh and our Minister at London had also been communicated to this House. Nothing from the hand of his Lordship is produced; no! he does not commit himself in that way. The sense in which our Minister understood him, and the purport of certain parts of despatches from the British Government to its Minister at Madrid, which he deigned to read to our Minister, are alone communicated to us. Now we know very well how diplomatists, when it is their pleasure to do so, can wrap themselves up in mystery. No man more than my Lord Castlereagh, who is also an able Minister, possessing much greater talents than are allowed to him generally in this country, can successfully express himself in ambiguous language, when he chooses to employ it. Mr. C. recollected himself once to have witnessed this facility, on the part of his Lordship. The case was this. When Bonaparte made his escape from Elba and invaded France, a great part of Europe believed that it was with the connivance of the British Ministry. The opposition charged them, in Parliament with it, and they were interrogated to know what measures of precaution they had taken against such an event. Lord Castlereagh replied by stating that there was an understanding with a certain naval officer of high rank, commanding in the adjacent seas, that he was to act on certain contingencies. Now, Mr. Chairman, if you can make any thing intelligible out of this reply you will have much more success than the English opposition had.

The allowance of interference by foreign Powers in the affairs of our Government, not pertaining to themselves, is against the counsels of our wisest politicians—those of Washington, Jefferson, and, he would add also, those of the present Chief Magistrate; for, pending this very Spanish negotiation, the offer of the mediation of foreign States was declined, upon the true ground that Europe had her system, and we ours; and that it was not compatible with our policy to entangle ourselves in the labyrinths of hers. But a mediation is far preferable to the species of interference on which it had been his reluctant duty to comment. The mediator is a judge, placed on high, his conscience his guide, the world the spectators, and posterity his judge. His position is one, therefore, of the greatest responsibility. But what responsibility is there attached to this sort of irregular, drawing-room, intriguing interposition? He could see no motive for governing or influencing our policy, in regard to Spain, furnished in any of the communications which respected the disposition of foreign Powers. He regretted, for his part, that they had been at all consulted. There was nothing in the character of the power of Spain; nothing in the beneficial nature of the stipulations of the treaty to us, which warranted us in seeking the aid of foreign Powers, if in any case whatever that aid was desirable. He was far from saying that, in the foreign action of this Government, it might not be prudent to keep a watchful eye upon the probable conduct of foreign Powers. That might be a material circumstance to be taken into consideration. But he never would avow to our own people—never promulgate to foreign Powers, that their wishes and interference were the controlling cause of our policy. Such promulgation would lead to the most alarming consequences. It was to invite further interposition. It might, in process of time, create in the bosom of our country a Russian faction, a British faction, a French faction. Every nation ought to be jealous of this species of interference, whatever was its form of government. But of all forms of government the united testimony of all history admonishes a Republic to be most guarded against it. From the moment that Philip intermeddled in the affairs of Greece, the liberty of Greece was doomed to inevitable destruction.

Suppose, said Mr. C., we could see the communications which have passed between His Imperial Majesty and the British Government, respectively, and Spain, in regard to the United States; what do you imagine would be their character? Do you suppose that the same language has been held to Spain and to us? Do you not, on the contrary, believe, that sentiments have been expressed to her, consoling to her pride? That we have been represented, perhaps, as an ambitious Republic, seeking to aggrandize ourselves at her expense?

In the other ground taken by the President, the present distressed condition of Spain, for his recommendation of forbearance to act during the present session, Mr. C. was sorry also to say that it did not appear to him to be solid. He could well conceive how the weakness of your aggressor might, when he was withholding from you justice, form a motive for your pressing your equitable demands upon him; but he could not accord in the wisdom of that policy which would wait his recovery of strength, so as to enable him successfully to resist those demands. Nor would it comport with the practice of our own Government heretofore. Did we not, in 1811, when the present monarch of Spain was an ignoble captive, and the people of the Peninsula were contending for the inestimable privilege of self-government, seize and occupy that part of Louisiana which is situated between the Mississippi and the Perdido? What must the people of Spain think of that policy which would not spare them, and which commiserates alone an unworthy prince, who ignominiously surrendered himself to his enemy; a vile despot, of whom I cannot speak in appropriate language without departing from the respect due to this House or to myself? What must the people of South America think of this sympathy for Ferdinand, at a moment when they, as well as the people of the Peninsula themselves, (if we are to believe the late accounts, and God send they may be true,) are struggling for liberty?

Again: When we declared our late just war against Great Britain, did we wait for a moment when she was free from embarrassment and distress; or did we not rather wisely select a period when there was the greatest probability of giving success to our arms? What was the complaint in England; what the language of faction here? Was it not that we had cruelly proclaimed the war at a time when she was struggling for the liberties of the world? How truly, let the sequel and the voice of impartial history tell.

Whilst he could not, therefore, Mr. C. said, persuade himself that the reasons assigned by the President for postponing the subject of our Spanish affairs until another session were entitled to all the weight which he seemed to think belonged to them, he did not, nevertheless, regret that the particular project recommended by the Committee of Foreign Relations was thus to be disposed of; for it was war, war, attempted to be disguised. And if we went to war, he thought it should have no other limit than indemnity for the past, and security for the future. He had no idea of the wisdom of that measure of hostility which would bind us, whilst the other party is left free.

Before he proceeded to consider the particular propositions which the resolutions contained which he had had the honor of submitting it was material to determine the actual posture of our relations to Spain. He considered it too clear to need discussion, that the treaty was at an end; that it contained, in its present state, no obligation whatever upon us, and no obligation whatever on the part of Spain. It was as if it had never been. We are remitted back to the state of our rights and our demands which existed prior to the conclusion of the treaty, with this only difference, that, instead of being merged in, or weakened by the treaty, they have acquired all the additional force which the intervening time and the faithlessness of Spain can communicate to them. Standing on this position, he should not deem it necessary to interfere with the treaty-making power, if a fixed and persevering purpose had not been indicated by it, to obtain the revival of the treaty. Now, he thought it a bad treaty. The interest of the country, as it appeared to him, forbade its renewal. Being gone, it was perfectly incomprehensible to him why so much solicitude was manifested to restore it. Yet it is clung to with the same sort of frantic affection with which the bereaved mother hugs her dead infant in the vain hope of bringing it back to life.

Has the House of Representatives a right to express its opinion upon the arrangement made in that treaty? The President, by asking Congress to carry it into effect, has given us jurisdiction of the subject, if we had it not before. We derive from that circumstance the right to consider—first, if there be a treaty; secondly, if we ought to carry it into effect; and, thirdly, if there be no treaty, whether it be expedient to assert our rights, independent of the treaty. It will not be contended that we are restricted to that specific mode of redress which the President intimated in his opening Message.

The first resolution which he had presented, asserted that the Constitution vests in the Congress of the United States the power to dispose of the territory belonging to them; and that no treaty, purporting to alienate any portion thereof, is valid, without the concurrence of Congress.

The proposition which it asserts was, he thought, sufficiently maintained by barely reading the clause in the Constitution on which it rests: "The Congress shall have power to dispose of, &c., the territory, or other property, belonging to the United States."

It was far from his wish to renew at large a discussion of the treaty-making power. The Constitution of the United States had not defined the precise limits of that power, because, from the nature of it, they could not be prescribed. It appeared to him, however, that no safe American statesman would assign to it a boundless scope. He presumed, for example, that it would not be contended that, in a Government which was itself limited, there was a functionary without limit. The first great bound to the power in question, he apprehended, was that no treaty could constitutionally transcend the very objects and purposes of the Government itself. He thought, also, that, wherever there were specific grants of power to Congress, they limited or controlled, or, he would rather say, modified the exercise of the general grant of the treaty-making power, upon the principle which was familiar to every one. He did not insist that the treaty-making power could not act upon the subjects committed to the charge of Congress; he merely contended that the concurrence of Congress in its action upon those subjects, was necessary. Nor would he insist that the concurrence should precede that action. It would be always most desirable that it should precede it, if convenient, to guard against the commitment of Congress, on the one hand, by the Executive, or, on the other, what might seem to be a violation of the faith of the country, pledged for the ratification of the treaty. But he was perfectly aware that it would be very often highly inconvenient to deliberate, in a body so numerous as Congress, on the nature of those terms on which it might be proper to treat with foreign Powers. In the view of the subject which he had been taking, there was a much higher degree of security to the interests of the country. For, with all his respect for the President and Senate, it could not disparage the wisdom of their councils to add to it that of this House also. But if the concurrence of this House be not necessary in the cases asserted; if there be no restriction upon the power he was considering, it might draw to itself and absorb the whole of the powers of Government. To contract alliances, to stipulate for raising troops to be employed in a common war about to be waged, to grant subsidies, even to introduce foreign troops within the bosom of the country, were not unfrequent instances of the exercise of this power; and if, in all such cases, the honor and faith of the nation were committed, by the exclusive act of the President and Senate, the melancholy duty alone might be left to Congress of recording the ruin of the Republic.

The House of Representatives has uniformly maintained its right to deliberate upon those treaties in which their co-operation was asked by the Executive. In the first case that occurred in the progress of our Government, that of the treaty, commonly called Mr. Jay's Treaty, after General Washington refused to communicate his instructions to that Minister, the House asserted its right, by fifty odd votes to thirty odd. In the last case that occurred, the Convention of 1815, with Great Britain, although it passed off upon what was called a compromise, this House substantially obtained its object; for, if that Convention operated as a repeal of the laws with which it was incompatible, the act which passed was altogether unnecessary.

Supposing, however, that no treaty which undertakes to dispose of the territory of the United States is valid without the concurrence of Congress, it may be contended that such treaty may constitutionally fix the limits of the territories of the United States, where they are disputed, without the co-operation of Congress. He admitted it, when the fixation of the limits simply was the object, as in the case of the river St. Croix, or the more recent stipulation in the Treaty of Ghent, or in that of the Treaty with Spain in 1795. In all these cases, the treaty-making power merely reduces to certainty that which was before unascertained. It announces the fact; it proclaims in a tangible form the existence of the boundary; it does not make a new boundary; it asserts only where the new boundary was. But it cannot under color of fixing a boundary previously existing, though not in fact marked, undertake to cede away, without the concurrence of Congress, whole provinces. If the subject be one of a mixed character; if it consists partly of cession, and partly of the fixation of a prior limit, he contended that the President must come here for the consent of Congress. But in the Florida Treaty it was not pretended that the object was simply a declaration of where the western limit of Louisiana was; it was, on the contrary, the case of an avowed cession of territory from the United States to Spain. The whole of the correspondence manifested that the respective parties to the negotiation were not engaged so much in an inquiry where the limit of Louisiana was, as that they were exchanging overtures as to where it should be. Hence we find various limits proposed and discussed. At one time the Mississippi is proposed; then the Missouri; then a river discharging itself into the gulf east of the Sabine; a vast desert is proposed to separate the territories of the two Powers; and finally the Sabine, which neither of the parties had ever contended was the ancient limit of Louisiana, is adopted, and the boundary is extended from its source by a line perfectly new and arbitrary; and the treaty itself proclaims its purpose to be a cession from the United States to Spain.

The second resolution comprehended three propositions; the first of which was, that the equivalent granted by Spain to the United States for the province of Texas was inadequate. To determine this it was necessary to estimate the value of what we gave and of what we received. This involved an inquiry into our claim to Texas. It was not his purpose to enter at large into this subject. He presumed the spectacle would not be presented of questioning, in this branch of the Government, our title to Texas, which had been constantly maintained by the Executive, for more than fifteen years past, under three several Administrations. He was at the same time ready and prepared to make out our title, if any one in this House were fearless enough to controvert it. He would for the present briefly state that the man who is most familiar with the transactions of this Government—who so largely participated in the formation of the Constitution, and in all that has been done under it; who, besides the eminent services that he has rendered his country, principally contributed to the acquisition of Louisiana; and who must be supposed, from his various opportunities, best to know its limits—declared, fifteen years ago, that our title to the Rio del Norte was as well founded as it was to the island of New Orleans.

[Here Mr. C. read an extract from a memoir presented in 1805, by Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinckney, to Mr. Cevallos, proving that the boundary of Louisiana extended eastward to the Perdido, and westward to the Rio del Norte; in which they say: "The facts and principles which justify this conclusion are so satisfactory to their Government as to convince it that the United States have not a better right to the island of New Orleans, under the cession referred to, than they have to the whole district of territory thus described."]

The title to the Perdido on the one side, and to the Rio del Norte on the other, rested on the same principle—the priority of discovery and occupation by France. Spain had first discovered and made an establishment at Pensacola—France at Dauphin island in the Bay of Mobile. The intermediate space was unoccupied; and the principle observed among European nations having contiguous settlements—being that the unoccupied space between them should be equally divided—was applied to it, and the Perdido thus became the common boundary. So, west of the Mississippi, La Salle, acting under France, in 1682 or 1683, first discovered that river. In 1685, he made an establishment on the Bay of St. Bernard, west of the Colorado, emptying into it. The nearest Spanish settlement was Panuco, and the Rio del Norte, about the midway line, became the common boundary.

All accounts concurred in representing Texas to be extremely valuable. Its superficial extent was three or four times greater than that of Florida. The climate was delicious; the soil fertile; the margins of the rivers abounding in live oak; and the country admitting of easy settlement. It possessed, moreover, if he were not misinformed, one of the finest ports on the Gulf of Mexico. The productions of which it was capable were suited to our wants. The unfortunate captive of St. Helena wished for ships, commerce, and colonies. We have them all, if we do not wantonly throw them away. The colonies of other countries are separated from them by vast seas, requiring great expense to protect them, and are held subject to a constant risk of their being torn from their grasp. Our colonies, on the contrary, are united to and form a part of our continent; and the same Mississippi, from whose rich deposit the best of them (Louisiana) has been formed, will transport on her bosom the brave and patriotic men from her tributary streams to defend and preserve the next most valuable, the province of Texas.

We wanted Florida, or rather we shall want it, or, to speak yet more correctly, we want nobody else to have it. We do not desire it for immediate use. It fills a space in our imagination, and we wish it to complete the arrondissement of our territory. It must certainly come to us. The ripened fruit will not more surely fall. Florida is enclosed in between Alabama and Georgia, and cannot escape. Texas may. Whether we get Florida now or some five or ten years hence, is of no consequence, provided no other Power gets it; and if any other Power should attempt to take it, an existing act of Congress authorizes the President to prevent it. He was not disposed to disparage Florida, but its intrinsic value was incomparably less than that of Texas. Almost its sole value was military. The possession of it would undoubtedly communicate some additional security to Louisiana and to the American commerce in the Gulf of Mexico. But it was not very essential to have it for protection to Georgia and Alabama. There could be no attack upon either of them, by a foreign Power, on the side of Florida. It now covered those States. Annexed to the United States, and we should have to extend our line of defence so as to embrace Florida. Far from being, therefore, a source of immediate profit, it would be the occasion of considerable immediate expense. The acquisition of it was certainly a fair object of our policy; and ought never to be lost sight of. It was even a laudable ambition in any Chief Magistrate to endeavor to illustrate the epoch of his administration by such an acquisition. It was less necessary, however, to fill the measure of the honors of the present Chief Magistrate than that of any other man, in consequence of the large share which he had in obtaining all Louisiana. But, whoever may deserve the renown which may attend the incorporation of Florida into our Confederacy, it is our business, as the representatives of the people, who are to pay the price of it, to take care, as far as we constitutionally can, that too much is not given. He would not give Texas for Florida in a naked exchange. We were bound by the treaty to give not merely Texas, but five millions of dollars also, and the excess beyond that sum of all our claims upon Spain, which have been variously estimated at from fifteen to twenty millions of dollars.

The public is not generally apprized of another large consideration which passed from us to Spain, if an interpretation which he had heard given to the treaty were just, and it was certainly plausible. Subsequent to the transfer, but before the delivery, of Louisiana from Spain to France, the then Governor of New Orleans (he believed his name was Gayoso) made a number of concessions upon the payment of an inconsiderable pecuniary consideration, amounting to between nine hundred thousand and a million of acres of land, similar to those recently made at Madrid to the royal favorites. This land is situated in Feliciana, and between the Mississippi and the Amite, in the present State of Louisiana. It was granted to persons who possessed the very best information of the country, and is no doubt, therefore, the choice land. The United States have never recognised, but have constantly denied the validity of these concessions. It is contended by the parties concerned that they are confirmed by the late treaty. By the second article his Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States, in full property and sovereignty, all the territories which belong to him, situated to the eastward of the Mississippi, known by the name of East and West Florida. And by the eighth article all the grants of land made before the 24th of January, 1818, by his Catholic Majesty, or by his lawful authorities, shall be ratified and confirmed, &c. Now, the grants in question, having been made long prior to that day, are supposed to be confirmed. He understood, from a person interested, that Don Onís had assured him it was his intention to confirm them. Whether the American negotiator had the same intention or not, he (Mr. C.) did not know. It will not be pretended that the letter of Mr. Adams, of the 12th of March, 1818, in which he declines to treat any further with respect to any part of the territory included within the limits of the State of Louisiana, can control the operation of the subsequent treaty. That treaty must be interpreted by what is in it, and not by what is out of it. The overtures which passed between the parties respectively, prior to the conclusion of the treaty, can neither restrict nor enlarge its meaning. Moreover, when Mr. Madison occupied, in 1811, the country between the Mississippi and the Perdido, he declared that, in our hands, it should be, as it has been, subject to negotiation.

It results, then, that we have given for Florida, charged and incumbered as it is—

- 1st. Unincumbered Texas;
- 2d. Five millions of dollars;
- 3d. A surrender of all our claims upon Spain, not included in that five millions; and,
- 4th. If the interpretation of the treaty which he had stated were well founded, about a million of acres of the best unseated land in the State of Louisiana, worth perhaps ten millions of dollars.

The first proposition contained in the second resolution was thus, Mr. C. thought, fully sustained. The next was, that it was inexpedient to cede Texas to any foreign Power. Mr. C. said he was opposed to the transfer of any part of the territories of the United States to any foreign Power. They constituted, in his opinion, a sacred inheritance of posterity, which we ought to preserve unimpaired. He wished it was, if it were not a fundamental and inviolable law of the land, that they should be inalienable to any foreign Power. It was quite evident that it was in the order of Providence; that it was an inevitable result of the principle of population, that the whole of this continent, including Texas, was to be peopled in process of time. The question was, by whose race shall it be peopled? In our hands it will be peopled by freemen, and the sons of freemen, carrying with them our language, our laws, and our liberties; establishing on the prairies of Texas temples dedicated to the simple and devout modes of worship of God incident to our religion, and temples dedicated to that freedom which we adore next to Him. In the hands of others, it may become the habitation of despotism and of slaves, subject to the vile dominion of the inquisition and of superstition. He knew that there were honest and enlightened men who feared that our Confederacy was already too large, and that there was danger of disruption arising out of the want of reciprocal coherence between its several parts. He hoped and believed that the principle of representation, and the formation of States, would preserve us an united people. But if Texas, after being peopled by us, and grappling with us, should, at some distant day, break off, she will carry along with her a noble crew, consisting of our children's children. The difference between those who might be disinclined to its annexation to our Confederacy, and him, was, that their system began where his might, possibly, in some distant future day, terminate; and that theirs began with a foreign race, aliens to every thing that we hold dear, and his ended with a race partaking of all our qualities.

The last proposition which the second resolution affirms, is, that it is inexpedient to renew the treaty. If Spain had promptly ratified it, bad as it is, he would have acquiesced in it. After the protracted negotiation which it terminated; after the irritating and exasperating correspondence which preceded it, he would have taken the treaty as a man who has passed a long and restless night, turning and tossing in his bed, snatches at day an hour's disturbed repose. But she would not ratify it; she would not consent to be bound by it, and she has liberated us from it. Is it wise to renew the negotiation, if it is to be recommenced by announcing to her at once our ultimatum? Shall we not give her the vantage ground? In early life he had sometimes indulged in a species of amusement, which years and experience had determined him to renounce, which, if the Committee would allow him to use it, furnished him with a figure—Shall we enter on the game, with our hand exposed to the adversary, whilst he shuffles the cards to acquire more strength? What has lost us his ratification of the treaty? Incontestably our impotency to procure the ratification, and the hopes which that opportunity inspired, that he could yet obtain more from us. Let us undeceive him. Let us proclaim the acknowledged truth, that the treaty is prejudicial to the interests of this country. Are we not told, by the Secretary of State, in the bold and confident assertion, that Don Onís was authorized to grant us much more, and that Spain dare not deny his instructions? That the line of demarcation is far within his limits? If she would have then granted us more, is her position now more favorable to her in the negotiation? In our relations to foreign Powers, it may be sometimes politic to sacrifice a portion of our rights to secure the residue. But is Spain such a Power as that it becomes us to sacrifice those rights? Is she entitled to it by her justice, by her observance of good faith, or by her possible annoyance of us in the event of war? She will seek, as she has sought, procrastination in the negotiation, taking the treaty as the basis. She will dare to offend us, as she has insulted us, by asking the disgraceful stipulation that we shall not recognise the patriots. Let us put aside the treaty; tell her to grant us our rights, to their uttermost extent. And if she still palters, let us assert those rights by whatever measures it is for the interest of our country to adopt.

If the treaty were abandoned; if it were not on the contrary signified, too distinctly, that there was to be a continued and unremitting endeavor to obtain its revival, he would not think it advisable for this House to interpose. But, with all the information in our possession, and holding the opinions which he entertained, he thought it the bounden duty of the House to adopt the resolutions. He had acquitted himself of what he deemed a solemn duty, in bringing up the subject. Others would discharge theirs according to their own sense of them.

Mr. LOWNDES followed Mr. CLAY in the debate. Before entering into a discussion of the merits of the propositions submitted by the Speaker, he said, it appeared to him there was a previous question to be settled, the determination of which might preclude a decision of the main question on its merits. That question was, whether the attempt, on the part of this House, to take the conduct of negotiations with foreign Powers into its hands would not be greatly prejudicial to the interests of the country? It was worthy of inquiry, also, whether it was consistent with prudence, or with wisdom, to engage in the discussion of propositions, the adoption of which would have that effect?

Mr. L. said he was far from considering the two resolutions now before the Committee as of the same character. He was ready to admit that the consideration of the question, how far this House has a right to interpose in respect to treaties—of this theoretically abstract question—was not liable to the same objection as the discussion of the second resolve; but he should consider the consumption of time in its discussion utterly useless and wasteful at this moment.

The gentleman from Kentucky had made a remark, in relation to the late communication of the President to Congress, which, Mr. L. said, appeared to him to have arisen entirely from misapprehension of the nature of that communication. The gentleman considered the Message as founded on the wishes of those foreign Powers whose views on the subject our Government had been apprized of. The best attention which he had been able to bestow on the subject, Mr. L. said, had led to conclusions totally different from this. The papers accompanying the Message were such as ought to have been communicated for the information of Congress, but were not the only grounds of the Message. Could any man read the Message without seeing that the ground of delay recommended by the President, is the probability, of which evidence is furnished in part by communications from the Ministers of foreign Powers directly and indirectly to our Government, that the object of the United States may be accomplished without a resort to such measures as has been recommended by a Committee of this House? It would be an extravagance of independence to say, not only that foreign nations should not interpose in a controversy between us and a foreign Power, but that they should not even be allowed to furnish us with facts—with that information without which there was no wisdom in the conduct of foreign negotiations. Mr. L. quoted the Message of the President, to show that the only ground on which a delay of coercive measures against Spain was recommended, was, that there was reason to believe that the object of the United States might be attained without resorting to them. Was it at all extraordinary that information on this head should be obtained from foreign Powers? Was it at all extraordinary that Spain should not develop her views to us, who are the adverse party, yet should disclose them to a Power which is not a principal in the controversy, but her ally and a mutual friend? The Executive does not reject information from any quarter, and, least of all, from a quarter where it is most to be relied on. With regard to foreign interference, he should repel, with as much indignation as the gentleman from Kentucky, any attempt to intermeddle in our internal affairs. Yet, every man who would reflect on the condition in which, in the lapse of time, the United States may be placed, would see, that there might be cases in which, with all our repugnance to the interposition of foreign nations, we may be induced, as to collisions with foreign States, to consent to the arbitration of other foreign States, not interested in the controversy. Thus, such a provision had been made in regard to certain cases embraced by the Treaty of Ghent; and, at this very moment, one of the questions arising between us and Great Britain in regard to that treaty had been referred to the arbitration of the Emperor of Russia. If, as in the case provided for by the Treaty of Ghent, the mediation of a foreign Power may be accepted with respect to questions of boundaries, may we not go so far as to say that there may be cases in which we shall pay considerable deference to the opinions of a disinterested foreign Power where territorial acquisitions are concerned?

But, Mr. L. said, a remark of the gentleman from Kentucky, apart from the main question before the committee, seemed to require that he should; before proceeding further, say something of the condition in which the Committee of Foreign Relations, of which he was one, was placed by the Message from the President. Whether it was owing to insensibility or not, Mr. L. said he did not feel that awkwardness which the gentleman from Kentucky seemed to suppose that committee must feel. When the committee recommended the immediate occupation of Florida, and when they withdrew that recommendation, they acted on both occasions from the same motive. With one information one course might be correct, whilst with other information a different course would be proper. Though not satisfied that a different course should be pursued from that recommended by the committee, yet, a different course being recommended by circumstances subsequently disclosed, indicating the feeling of the nation and the sentiment of this House, would a discussion of the subject have been deemed by any gentleman advantageous to the interests of the country? Ought the Committee to have urged a decision on their proposition, when no possible advantage could have resulted from it? Must it not, on the contrary, have led to a discussion which would be as injurious as he would show that the present discussion would be, should he not succeed in a motion which he should make, as indiscreet as the gentleman might think it, to prevent the further discussion of it.

The Spanish Treaty.

A strong objection, even to a discussion of the resolutions of the Speaker, was, that, in relation to both of them, no possible benefit could arise from the discussion of them—nay, that a discussion, in such a manner as to lead to a just decision of them, was impracticable. He asked any gentleman to say whether it was not apparent that the questions involved in them could not now be freely discussed? Under the circumstances, it certainly was; and, said he, a discussion into which we enter manacled, we ought not to enter at all.

With regard to the treaty-making power, Mr. L. said, he was willing to admit, that, in relation to those stipulations which apply to subjects such as are among the enumerated powers of Congress, the sanction of the Representative body to them was necessary. He had, however, no intention to enter into this general argument. If discussed, said he, it would force us into an extent of discussion for which the limits of the session would be too narrow. It would include not only all the discussions of 1795 and 1816, but would open new grounds. The Speaker himself, he presumed, would not be disposed to insist that this House has a power, in relation to a treaty stipulating for a cession of territory, which it has not in relation to a stipulation for the payment of money. If there be a power peculiarly ours, said Mr. L., it is the power over the purse of the nation. If it be contended that neither can territory be ceded, nor money paid, without the consent of this House, there is a question beyond that again; will you maintain that a claim, on our part, for money or for territory, however well founded, cannot be yielded? Such cases were peculiarly a subject for treaty stipulations. The very treaty of which we are speaking contains a renunciation of claims. In case of a claim on your part, not recognised by the opposite party, your rights may be renounced, by treaty, for an equivalent, &c. Mr. L. said he had no disposition to enter at large or systematically into the question respecting the treaty-making power; but the observation which he had made connected itself with another.

Gentlemen conversant with the history of the proceedings of Congress, might recollect the ground taken by the gentleman who is now our distinguished Minister in France; that, in addition to those powers purely Executive, which did not come in conflict with the powers of the House of Representatives, Mr. Gallatin admitted, in the great debate of 1795, there was another and a resulting power which did belong to the treaty-making authority. That, for example, to a stipulation that any act should not pass, the consent of the House of Representatives was not necessary, because the President and Senate, being branches of Congress, had it in their power to enforce and fulfil the treaty, by withholding their assent from any such act. Apply that argument to the case of a renunciation of a claim for money or for territory. Not being in the possession either of our Government or of a foreign Power, it could be reclaimed or renounced only by negotiation or by war, and to either course the consent of the negotiating power was necessary, &c. In relation to questions of boundary, it was admitted on all hands that the treaty-making authority was competent to their adjustment; its competency must be equally admitted in relation to all unadjusted claims. He submitted then to the Committee, whether there could be any case of an adjustment of a claim to boundary, which did not include a cession of supposed right to territory by one or the other party. You may establish points; you may say there a colony was planted—here a man was shipwrecked; you may assert that these points include the territory to which you have a right; but the lines of your boundary must, after all, be adjusted by negotiation—by reciprocal agreement. Mr. L. said he should be sorry if it should be inferred, from what he had said, that he was of opinion that the ground assumed in the resolution was decidedly erroneous. That it asserted a power much greater than had heretofore been claimed for the House of Representatives, he was confident; but he did not mean to say that he had formed a decided opinion different from that of the gentleman from Kentucky on this point. He had thought of it but for a day or two. It was, however, a question into which he thought the House ought not wantonly and uselessly to enter, especially as it had now no superfluous time on its hands.

[Here, the hour being late, Mr. LOWNDES complied with the wish of a gentleman near him, and gave way for an adjournment. The next day he resumed his remarks.]

Mr. L. did not, he repeated, intend to express any opinion affirmatively or negatively on the proposition contained in the first of the above resolutions. But, he said, it touched a subject so complicated and difficult as to make it necessary, if acted on at all, that it should occupy a much greater portion of time in the discussion than could be spared at this period of the session for the discussion of an abstract proposition. There must be many gentlemen on this floor who recollected the length and arduous nature of the discussion of 1795 on this subject. There were none who could not see that the resolution of the Speaker embraced a larger object than was embraced by that of 1795. The conclusion must be, that, if decided at all by this House, it would be after a long discussion. But, suppose the resolution went no further than that of 1795—however strong might be the opinion of a majority in favor of the resolution of 1795—it could not be expected but there would be some debate on such a proposition. The smaller the minority, the stronger the reason why their arguments should be heard, and laid before the public. The resolution of 1795 remains on the Journals, and there could be no reason assigned, even did this resolution go no further than that, for reaffirming it. But this resolution goes much further than that of 1795, or than the doctrines advanced by any who took part in that discussion. It was not then, as far as Mr. L. knew, contended by any one, that in relation to territory claimed by us, but not in our possession, a treaty for the adjustment of the title would require the sanction of this House. Would it be prudent, said he, by anticipation, when we know not of any circumstances which make the decision of this question necessary, to undertake to decide it? Is there any member of this Committee who supposes that the effect of a decision in favor of this proposition will be to preclude a discussion and decision of the question hereafter, should the treaty be eventually ratified? Mr. L. presumed not. Indeed, he said, were this proposition to be discussed now for a week, it would only serve to prepare the ground for another discussion hereafter.

Whilst, however, he had no other objection to the discussion of the first resolution, but what arose from a regard to the economy of time, he had much stronger objections to the consideration and decision of the second. He did not understand how any decision, or even free discussion of that question, could take place without endangering the important interests of the country. This he was sure the Speaker would do as unwillingly as any man. But, said he, pending the ratification of the treaty by Spain, are we to enter into the question of our title to the territory as far as the Rio del Norte? Would it be prudent to do so? Certainly not. Yet, if there was an unreserved discussion, that must be the preliminary step. Do you attach any consequence to a resolution of this kind? Do you expect it to have an influence at home, and to be respected abroad; and do you not begin by a laborious and careful examination of your right to the territory in question? Will you come to a formal and solemn announcement that you are fully entitled to all this territory, without deliberately and temperately examining the grounds on which that right rests? If you determine that you will write instructions to our negotiators; that we shall on this floor prescribe what the conditions of a treaty for a settlement of limits shall be, it becomes necessary that the title of the respective parties shall be fully investigated. Our open doors show that this is not the place to discuss what we will ask in a negotiation with a foreign Power, and what we will be content to receive. It would be, to use the Speaker's figure, to display our open hand to our adversary, his being concealed, as ours ought to be.

It had been doubted, Mr. L. said, whether the other branch of the Legislature has a right to join in instructions given to our diplomatic agents with regard to the terms of a treaty. From convenience, at least, this power, given to the Senate almost by the terms of the Constitution, had not, under the practical construction of that instrument, been latterly exercised by the Senate, but the Executive had been entirely charged with that duty and that responsibility.

Mr. L. enlarged upon the inconvenience of a public discussion here of what, in an amicable negotiation, we mean to insist on, and what we mean to give up. He had no objection to saying, for himself, what he would do on that head. But, he said, if a discussion was to take place on the formal proposition contained in this resolution, unless the discussion was to be utterly unmeaning, it would be necessary to examine as well the validity of titles as the relative value of territory, &c. It was unnecessary for him to assign reasons why an inquiry into the validity of title would be injurious. They were sufficiently obvious. With regard to the value of the territory in question, if the members were fully informed on the subject, it would yet be needless to discuss it. But, he said, he believed the requisite information was not at hand. For his part, although he had paid considerable attention to this subject, and gathered information from all sources accessible to him, he had never heard, respecting the value of the province of Texas, any estimate of its seaport in any degree corresponding with that given by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky.

If the House was called on to vote on this resolution, it was above all desirable that they should understand it. Mr. L. said he thought he understood it. Its meaning clearly was, that it was inexpedient to cede any part of the territory which we have west of the Sabine. Suppose our claim to that territory to be undoubted, said he, are we prepared to say, however worthless it may be, however great the equivalent for it, that we will give up no part of it for any territory, however essential or important to us? Now, for myself, I am not ready to say, that I am not willing to give up any thing west of the Sabine for any consideration whatever. If there be any territory of doubtful value, I am not prepared to say that there is in the rest of the world nothing of so much value that I might not be induced to exchange the one for the other.

Mr. L. therefore was opposed to engaging in this discussion, and because he considered the second resolve to embrace an object adverse to the interests of the country, as well as contrary to the spirit of the Constitution. That this House, according to the view of the Speaker, might have some power in regard to treaties for the cession or acquisition of territory, he did not now mean to deny. But, whatever that power was, he thought that a just view of the principles of the Constitution would necessarily require that it should be a restraining, and not a directing power. If, in progress of time, this House should adopt the practice of giving instruction to our Ministers, or, what is the same thing, of determining beforehand, as now proposed, what should be yielded and what retained, the effect would be to divide the responsibility of the different departments of the Government, and destroy altogether that of the treaty-making power. That there was in this House a corrective power, to restrain the treaty-making power in a course not believed to be beneficial to the interests of the country, he was ready to admit; but, whilst he admitted this, it was a power which, he said, ought to be exercised with great discretion. Otherwise, instead of restraining the Executive power, the effect would be, to increase its power by diminishing its responsibility. As a common rule of action, therefore, he was in favor of leaving the powers of the Government where the Constitution had placed them.

If any case could arise in which the Executive would pursue a policy so repugnant to the true interests of the country as to justify the interposition of this House, Mr. L. said, it would be one the very reverse of that now under consideration. It would hardly ever happen that an Executive would be averse to enlarging the boundaries of the nation, or be accused of a desire to restrict them to too narrow a limit. In the Executive branch of every Government, the disposition is naturally favorable to the extension of territory and the enlargement of its power. He thought that we may safely intrust to the Executive of this Government the charge of supporting the rights of the country, and extending its territorial limits as far as justice and sound policy will allow.

Mr. L. made some remarks to show that no advantage could result from the adoption of this resolve. If, indeed, it was proposed to employ force to support it, there might be some ground. Otherwise, he contended, to pass them would not only be useless, but injurious.

But, Mr. L. said, he would refrain from entering into the general questions of policy growing out of this resolution; but, in relation to the province of Texas, he would say that, if Florida were not necessary to us, and therefore a desirable acquisition, in exchange for any claim we may be supposed to have to Texas, he should not think it important to occupy Texas at this time. If we have a just claim to that province, the treaty being rejected, it will be at any time in our power to enforce it. Lying between us and Mexico, its destiny must always essentially depend on, as it is connected with, American interests. Whatever claim we have to Texas, it is a claim which we are able to support and enforce. This is an opinion, said Mr. L., which the Speaker applies to Florida and I to Texas.

Mr. L. asked the members of the Committee to cast their eye a little forward, and see, if the connexion between Mexico and Spain should be dissolved, what motive could Spain have for desiring to retain the possession of the province of Texas. What has been her object in ceding Florida? To get in exchange a boundary, well-defined, between Mexico and the United States. To secure herself against (what she believes, and what Mr. L. feared all the Powers of Europe believed) our ambition, she was willing to cede Florida. But, suppose the connexion between Spain and Mexico to be dissolved; suppose all hope, on her part, of her resuming the control of that country was destroyed; what motive could she have for ceding Florida? Mr. L. said he had not adverted to this contingency with a single view to her relinquishment of Florida to us, but with a view also to the preponderance which a reduction to a single island of the colonial possessions of Spain would give to another Power; when Spain would no longer be mistress of her own actions, but the agent to serve the interests of another Power. And, if we relinquished now the acquisition of Florida in order to gain Texas, that, in the contingency just adverted to, when Florida was overflowed by Royalists, and the value of Cuba increased, what possible motive could Spain have, under such circumstances, for the cession of Florida to us? We must obtain it then by force, or not at all. But it would always be as easy a matter as it may be now to obtain Florida by force. It would be more easy, he said, to obtain Canada by force, than it would be to obtain Florida by force, if the Power to whom it belonged was determined to hold it. It would be an error fatal to the best interests of the country, to refuse to receive Florida into our possession whilst we can. Mr. L. did not say that it was so important an acquisition that it ought not for any consideration to be postponed for a day; but, that a combination of circumstances make that practical now which may not be a year or two hence, he thought was very clear.

Mr. L. concluded by saying, that he had had no intention of entering into the general discussion of these resolves. He meant only to show that they could not be discussed without giving so much time to the subject as could not be afforded at this time; and that the discussion would moreover be prejudicial to the public interests. Under these circumstances, he thought it his duty to move to lay the resolutions on the table.

TUESDAY, April 4.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was yesterday re-committed with instructions the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of certain persons who have paid duties on goods imported into Castine," reported the said bill with amendments; which were read, and, together with the bill, ordered to lie on the table.

OHIO CANAL.

Mr. ANDERSON said, he knew, from the established forms of the House, requiring that every proposition to appropriate money should be discussed in a Committee of the Whole, that he could not now ask a vote on the resolution which he was about to offer; a resolution proposing an appropriation of money in aid of a canal to be cut around the falls of the river Ohio, at Louisville.

Settlement of Private Claims.

To those who were at all acquainted with the Western country, it was known that the Ohio was the great, and, indeed, the only channel which gives an outlet to the vast productions of one of the most extensive, and certainly the most fertile regions of our country. The extent of the country which depended on the floods of this river for the passage of its produce to the ocean, was equal to one-third of the United States. Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, lie on the northern, and Kentucky and Virginia on the southern side, while Pennsylvania and New York embrace its head. The productions of this country are all of the bulky kind; precisely of that character which gives to the open navigation of the river its greatest possible importance. Gentlemen who reside on the eastern side of the mountains, where the utmost length of any of the rivers does not exceed three or four hundred miles, cannot at first fully appreciate the importance which we attach to this river, which gives to us the only communication we can have to the markets of the world.

In contrasting the advantages of the proposed canal with any of those which have been contemplated in the Atlantic States, it may well be said that, if a canal is to receive its character from the extent of country or the amount of population which is benefitted by its construction, that there is none nor ever can be one in the United States, which can be compared to this in national usefulness. A single fact will call to the attention of the House the vast region whose productions pass to their market on the bosom of this water. From the western part of New York, plank, shingles, and scantling of every kind, come down not only to Louisville every year, more than one thousand miles by the meanders of the river, but go to New Orleans one thousand miles farther in great quantities.

Mr. A. said that he thought the present occasion peculiarly favorable to the consideration of this subject. We were at peace, and if the indications which are given are to be realized, we are likely to be in peace. But the fact to which he meant to refer was, that Kentucky, one of the States interested, had appropriated $100,000 to the object. Although, considering this canal as a great national improvement, he could well have wished that Congress should have taken to itself the honor of originating the appropriation, still, as there had existed Constitutional difficulties on the subject, he was happy now to bring his proposition within the letter of a resolution which has received the assent of this House. The House of Representatives has decided that Congress could make an appropriation "in aid of the improvement of water courses." Commissioners, lately appointed by four of the States bordering on the Ohio, have examined the river, and have unanimously concurred in a report, declaring that the canal should be cut on the southern side.

Mr. A. then submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That a sum not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars be appropriated for the purchase of stock in the Kentucky Ohio Canal Company, engaged for the purpose of cutting a canal around the falls of the Ohio river at Louisville.

The resolution was read, and a motion was made that it be committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill providing for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road.

Mr. HENDRICKS wished to propose an amendment, the object of which was, to include in the resolution a provision (similar to that now embraced in it) for aiding the Jeffersonville Ohio Canal Company, on the Indiana side of the river.

But the motion was declared to be at that time not in order.

Mr. GROSS, of New York, moved that it lie on the table; which was rejected.

And the question was then taken on the motion to commit, as above stated, and passed in the affirmative.

SETTLEMENT OF PRIVATE CLAIMS.

On motion of Mr. FULLER, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the investigation of the claims of individuals upon the United States by petition of right, or other proper process, in the district or circuit courts, or in some tribunal to be established for that purpose, so as to insure a speedy decision of such claims upon the principles of justice and equity.

Mr. FULLER said that he deemed it his duty to explain to the House the objects he had in view, in offering this resolution, not only because they might not be sufficiently obvious on the face of it, but because he had understood that considerable misrepresentation had occurred respecting the purposes of a resolution introduced by him in the early part of the session, [in relation to the Navy Board.]

The accumulation of private claims had become, he said, a serious obstacle to the proper consideration of some of the most important national measures. It is not contemplated, said Mr. F., to comprehend among the claims to be transferred to the courts any mere applications to the bounty or discretion of Congress; but only those, where the United States on the principles of law or equity are properly a party; and where an individual in like circumstances might be made a defendant. This line of distinction would include at least two-thirds of the cases, which involve intricate principles, and require laborious and difficult investigation. Most of these are at present referred to the Committee of Claims; and it is but justice to say, sir, that they are ably and patiently examined by the Chairman and other members of that committee, as it is now organized. But it is a most interesting circumstance, and would be decisive in my mind, if no other reason existed against legislative judgments on subjects capable of judicial decision, that all trials here must necessarily be ex parte. The claimant appears, produces vouchers, documents, depositions, and sometimes witnesses. The whole mass of testimony has been previously digested and marshalled, and whatever interferes with his pretensions kept carefully out of sight. It would require the industry and expense of an interested adversary to countervail such plausible evidence. The great vigilance and sagacity of a Congressional committee may sometimes detect the weakness or fraud of the claim; but in a multitude of instances the veil is impenetrable. The very fact, that the proceedings are ex parte, creates an indiscriminate suspicion in almost all cases, and must frequently lead Congress to a rejection of the most equitable claims; while others more specious, but which could not stand the test of cross examination, by the rules of evidence in our courts, are successful.

Another consequence of a judicial decision would be, that it would be final; whereas the same claimants apply to Congress anew after rejection, and the same tedious process of hearing and deciding in committee, and in the House, must be repeated indefinitely. Our list of petitions and reports will show instances of such applications incessantly renewed from five to ten and even twenty years. The case of Amey Dardin's horse was of still more venerable age; Beaumarchais' claim occupied several days of the last Congress, and we have the claim of Delafield, and the heirs of Sands, with long reports, now on our files. Of the two last I would only say they were discussed at great length and with much ability in the last Congress, and must each again occupy much time. Unless they are granted, there is no reason to believe that the parties will acquiesce in our decision, and at future sessions we must travel over the same ground. Not less than thirty days in every session are devoted to questions of this description, which might be much better decided in a court. The expense of thirty days' session of Congress, including contingencies, cannot be less than sixty thousand dollars; a sum which would pay the amount of one-half the claims. And this great waste of time and money, so far from establishing any principle for future Legislatures, has not even the small advantage of precluding a new investigation of the same individual case! The party will never believe that his case is rightly decided till his petition is granted, and we have no rule, and have probably no Constitutional right to establish one, which may close the avenue to reiterated and groundless applications. Nor ought we to lose sight of the enormous inconvenience and expense of the claimants themselves. These are obliged to attend personally, from the presentation of their petitions, till a full examination and report can be made by the committees to whom they are referred; and to answer new questions, obviate doubts and suspicions, and to urge a determination by Congress, they are in fact obliged to attend through the session. Even this tedious and expensive solicitation does not insure a hearing at the first, and frequently not even at the second session. Perhaps, in some of the last days, when business is crowding our table, some of these claims, accompanied with bills and intricate reports, on which they are predicated, are announced as the order of the day. The papers are read by the Clerk; an explanation is made by the chairman, who reported the bill; a doubt is suggested by some member, and, perhaps, after discussion, new doubts and surmises arise at every step, and the bill is lost or permitted to sleep on the table. Other bills, indeed, have a more fortunate issue; they pass without any question being made, and, consequently, on the mere faith of the committees, without being at all understood by the members generally. Something like this is the invariable course of such a system, and the experience of the honorable members of this House must confirm the remark.

I have often considered the tendency of this state of things to impair the respect and confidence of the nation, towards the popular branch of the Federal Legislature, as being one, and not the least, of its unfortunate consequences. A considerable number of persons, who are seeking redress at our hands, are among the spectators and auditors of our proceedings. However important the subject under consideration, involving, not unfrequently, the peace and tranquillity of millions, these individuals are impatient and querulous at all debate and deliberation, which must tend to protract or postpone a decision of their particular applications. To their view all such obstacles to their wishes are useless delay or empty declamation. They have ample leisure on their hands for correspondence, and the newspapers at home teem with injurious reflections on the long speeches and idle debates of Congress. Though such remarks are not entirely groundless, they are very unmerited, when of general application, and cannot fail to be pernicious in their effect upon public opinion.

My first attention to this subject, Mr. Speaker, had led me to suppose that the object contemplated by this resolution would be best effected by establishing a tribunal with powers similar to the Court of Exchequer in England. Upon further reflection, however, I have no doubt that the existing courts may take jurisdiction of all the subjects suitable for their cognizance, without materially increasing the mass of their business. The whole number of causes presented annually to Congress, which would be comprehended in the class proposed, would not exceed one hundred. More than twenty district or circuit courts would make the distribution of this business trifling for each. The District Attorney should represent the United States; and the provisions of law may be such as to require all issues in fact to be tried by a jury, as the only safe and satisfactory mode of establishing disputed facts. At the same time the courts may be authorized to adopt the principles of equity where such principles could be recognised between ordinary parties.

I am not aware, sir, said Mr. F., that any reasonable objection to the proposed system exists, where the United States are defendants, which does not equally apply when they are plaintiffs; and, in the latter case, they are obliged, like individuals, to seek their remedy in the courts of justice. The dignity of sovereignty is no more disparaged in one case than in the other; and surely the sovereignty of the National Government can never appear more venerable and exalted in the eyes of the people, than when it dispenses with the invidious pageantry of empty form, to facilitate the speedy and effectual distribution of justice through the community.

THE SPANISH TREATY.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the resolutions submitted by Mr. CLAY, respecting the treaty-making power, and particularly respecting the Treaty with Spain, yet unratified by Spain.

Mr. LOWNDES concluded his remarks, going to show why the resolutions should not be acted on. His remarks are given entire in preceding pages.

When Mr. LOWNDES finished, he moved to lay the first resolve on the table. After some conversation, in which Mr. CLAY suggested that the best course would be for the Committee to report the resolves to the House, and for the gentleman then to move to postpone the resolves, or lay them on the table, on which motion the yeas and nays could be recorded, Mr. L. consented to waive his motion for the present.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, said that, the withdrawal of the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. LOWNDES) having removed the obstacle to discussion of the resolutions under consideration, he would proceed to submit his views of them to the Committee. The attention of this body, Mr. A. observed, was a species of joint stock concern, of which all its members were equally participant in interest. He now appeared, for the first time, to assert a claim to any share, and he did not doubt that the claim would meet with due allowance from the courtesy of the Committee, unless indeed the fund on which it was addressed, had already been exhausted by the drafts which had been made upon it. One recommendation this claim would have, that it would not be an immoderate one. And Mr. A. believed that the general remark in reference to demands upon the public, that moderation in their amount formed no unessential condition of their success, had, in no instance, stronger application than in relation to demands addressed to the patience of this assembly.

Mr. A. adverted to the place which this subject of relations with Spain had recently occupied in the public attention, and the universal expectation that some measure expressive of the sense of Congress would, before this period of the session, have been adopted. The measure which, after long delay, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. LOWNDES) had reported from the Committee of Foreign Relations, had been recently wrested from the consideration of the House, in consequence of the suggestion of a foreign potentate, who, Mr. A. believed, was pretty much in the habit of exerting an operative influence in the affairs of other States, with the same disclaimer, it was probable, in every instance, of an intention to do so, which had been employed in relation to ourselves. If the motion which the gentleman from South Carolina had intimated an intention to renew, should prevail, a fate similar to that which had attended his own proposition would be reserved for the propositions now under consideration. Mr. A. confessed that he felt surprise at the intimation of resort to such a course, both on account of the importance of the subject and the character of the proceeding itself—the subject involving, as it did, the policy of the alienation of perhaps the most valuable portion, in proportion to its extent, of the territory of the Union, was surely well entitled to consideration from its magnitude. In this respect it was to be regarded as second only to the question which had been connected with the discussion of the Missouri bill, to which indeed it bore a strong character of affinity. That question related to the propriety of the transfer of the common territorial property of the Union, to the exclusive benefit of the population of one portion of it. The question now presented involved a consideration of the policy (which it was the purpose of the resolutions to counteract) of the transfer of the most valuable portion of this common property to a foreign Power. If a question involving a consideration of great, momentous character, had no claim to the maturest deliberation of the House, Mr. A. was unaware of any which could be regarded as invested with such a claim. The effect, too, of the success of the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina ought not to escape observation. It would be to preclude all effective expression of the public sentiment in relation to the policy of the ratification of the Spanish treaty. The case had no resemblance to that of an ordinary postponement of a subject, the consideration of which might, at a succeeding session of Congress, be resumed. Every person knew that, before the ensuing session of Congress, the treaty would be ratified. The Government of Spain could have no other design in sending the Minister who was known to have been despatched here. And the determination which would operate with our own Government to accept the ratification (unless this determination should be arrested by the expression of public sentiment in some mode) could not be a subject of question. The prevalence of the motion to lay the resolutions on the table would then be decisive in relation to the important interest conceived to be involved in their adoption. By the policy of avoiding conflict, the fruits of complete victory would be achieved.

The Speaker had treated the questions presented by the resolutions as affording scope for expatiation to a considerable extent in the general field of Spanish relations. This example, alluring as the subject was from the variety and interest of the topics it involved, Mr. A. said, that, not having the same claims with the Speaker, on the attention of the Committee, he should forbear to follow, and confine himself strictly to the questions arising on the resolutions. These were of sufficient dignity and extent, indeed, to merit a distinct consideration. The question presented by the first resolution was that which had heretofore given occasion to considerable discussion, relative to the character and extent of the treaty-making power in our Government. To the President and Senate was given the power "to make treaties." To Congress were given various powers, among others, that "to dispose of the territory of the United States." And the question was, whether the general power to make treaties, confided to the President and Senate, took place of the particular grant of powers to Congress, so as to operate conclusively on the subjects of this particular grant, without any necessity for the concurrence and assent of Congress.

The Spanish Treaty.

In contemplating this question, the attention could not fail, Mr. A. said, to be attracted to the extravagance of the pretensions of this treaty-making power. In point of extent, the power claimed to cover all the objects which fall within the scope of international stipulation, that is to say, all the objects of national interest, which were not of essential municipal character. This was the claim in point of extent of jurisdiction. In point of force of authority, the power claimed the exertion not only of a superseding, but a mandatory influence, over the legislative department, the direct Representatives of the national authority, in relation to all subjects of its exercise, whether comprehended or not, within the delegation of jurisdiction to that department of the Government. The claim was not only to exclude Congress from all participation of control over subjects specifically submitted to its control by the Constitution, but to bind it to an undeliberating ministerial execution of the stipulations of the President and Senate, in relation to these same subjects, wherever they might require the intervention of legislative details, and a resort to municipal authority, for execution. The exertion of the power of the President and Senate was said, by committing the public faith for its stipulations, to bind the other departments of the Government to an obligation of co-operation in the objects of those stipulations. Such was the claim of this treaty-making power in point of authority. The first remark, Mr. A. said, which arose upon this statement of the character of the power, related to its effect, where the co-operation of legislative and executive authorities were admitted to be required, to confound the appropriate functions of these authorities. To the President and Senate were assigned the exclusive faculty of exercising deliberation; and on Congress was imposed the unqualified duty of conforming to and effectuating, without any exercise of discretion, the results of that deliberation.

Such an assignation of functions would present a case of political anomaly which was not predicable of the character of the Constitution. The entire exclusion of Congress from authority over the subjects assigned to the jurisdiction of the treaty-making power, would involve no political inconsistency. This was designed in relation to all but a particular class of subjects. But, if the operation of the legislative power were admitted at all, it could only be admitted in its proper character of a power involving essentially the exercise of discretion. The recognition, therefore, of the necessity for the co-operation of the authority of Congress in the execution of treaty stipulations, was, in relation to all the subjects to which it extended, a recognition of the legislative, as a part of, and a check upon, the treaty-making power.

Mr. A. had been adverting to a statement of the pretensions of this treaty-making power, as furnishing evidence sufficient, to his mind, to condemn them. If other evidence were wanted, it would be found in the discrepancy which the power in the extension claimed for it, presented to the character of the general grant of power contained in the Constitution, and of the more important particular powers which made up the composition of that grant. It was to be expected of every political system, and more especially of a system sprung from men so illustrious for wisdom as the framers of our federal form of polity, that it would be found presenting a general consistency of structure and elements. But the Constitution was admitted to convey but a limited grant of power. All its more important component powers, the power over the purse, over the sword, the power of punishment, were limited by express restrictive or qualifying provisions. The admission of the treaty-making power, therefore, in the absolute, unrestricted character it assumed to wear, would be a violation of the whole consistency of the Constitution.

Mr. A. said that a person observing, with any degree of attention, the progress of our Government, could not fail to be struck with the conflict between many of the principles adopted in the construction of the Constitution, and its true character and intentment. The framers of this instrument had expended the resources of an incomparable wisdom, in devising limitations on the powers which it conveyed, and in the contrivance of adequate safeguards against the exercise of other powers. In the illusion of a generous confidence, they had no doubt conceived that these safeguards would be found sufficient. But, in the current of the administration of a constitutional government, there was generated a reptile destructive or dangerous to the dams and mounds which were instituted to restrain it. The name of this reptile was construction. Such was its fecundity, that it was impossible to extinguish the race. Such was its subtlety and activity of nature, that it was difficult to counteract its operations. This reptile had been at work in the mounds of our Constitution, nor was it a little to be feared that the breaches had already been effected which were destined, in future time, to give a general admission to discretionary power.

It might possibly be objected to what had been observed, that the power confided to the President and Senate, was a power to make or conclude treaties, and that the construction contended for, would convert their faculty in this respect into a mere function of initiating treaties. But the distinction was, that the power which, in relation to the general subject of treaty stipulation was exclusive in the President and Senate, in relation to the particular class of subjects under discussion—those confided to the control of Congress—was a concurrent power. In the clause of the Constitution, indeed, creating the power to make treaties, there was no express designation of limits to that power. But, as exclusive powers were no less effectually defined by the continuous relation of their respective spheres of operation, than by an express designation of limits; so concurrent powers were indicated in as satisfactory a manner by separate grants of the same subjects of jurisdiction to several powers, as they could be by a grant purporting in its terms to be a joint one. It was to be recollected, too, that no consideration affecting either the efficacy of the treaty-making power within its appropriate sphere, or its relation to the public convenience, required that it should be exclusive over all the subjects of its operation. In the denial of any particular subject or class of subjects to its exclusive jurisdiction, the efficacy of the power would suffer no impairment, in relation to others which were conceded. And, as respected public convenience, this consideration, so far from requiring any indefinite extension or character of the power, demanded, on the contrary, that its disposing control should be guarded in relation to subjects of public interest of more than ordinary delicacy or magnitude, by the check of the necessary co-operation of some department of concurrent jurisdiction. Nor, admitting this observation to be just, was there any subject of public interest characterized by a more indisputable title to the peculiar safeguard in question, than that which related to the disposal of the territorial property of the nation.

The power of the President and Senate to alienate territory, might, perhaps, be inferred as a consequence of their power to acquire it. Mr. A. objected to the consequence as illogical, and protested against the mode of construing the powers of the Government by which it must be derived. An incidental power would have to be derived from an incidental power; and this first incident, the source of others, was itself supposed to be derived in a mode still more unauthorized, not from any specific power, but as a result of the general collective powers and sovereign character of the Government. In such a mode of derivation of power, it was obvious that the efficacy of specification in the grant of it, would be destroyed, and a political constitution, as respected any purpose of limitation on the exercise of power, be converted to a name. It was inevitable, indeed, that every political constitution should admit the exercise of implied and incidental powers, as a result of the compendious simplicity of an instrument of this character. But the danger of abuse and injury from this source was guarded, if not obviated, by a mode of construction (the only one which did not outrage a constitution of enumerated powers) which required that the power made the source, as well as that which was made the subject of derivation, should be specific; and that the relation between them should be essential and immediate. Principles the reverse of these appeared, however, to be obtaining an ascendancy. The operation of the mischief was to be seen, indeed, at this time, only in its commencement. But the end of this thing, Mr. A. said, was death. The malady might now present only an eruptive appearance on the surface, but it would be found to be progressive to the heart of the Constitution; would communicate eventually to the system, the unnatural activity of despotism; and of unnatural action, if not arrested, whether in bodies political or physical, there was but one result, and that result was dissolution.

Mr. A. could not abstain from remarking (though the remark had no immediate relevancy to the question) on the unlimited character of the power of legislation, which was assumed in our Government, in relation to the national territories. Authority was arrogated to legislate on this subject at discretion, and an instance of the fullest indulgence of it had occurred at the present session of Congress, (in the measure for the interdiction of slavery in a portion of the Territories.) Take this power of discretionary regulation, in connexion with the acknowledged power to refuse admission of a Territory into the Union, and what was the result? A power was arrogated to regulate discretionally, and a power conceded to retain the Territories at pleasure in subjection to the authority invested with this power of discretionary regulation. Let the extent and susceptibility of importance of the Territories be considered, and what was the spectacle which, under the practical operation of the doctrine asserted, our Government might come to present? The spectacle of an authority strictly limited within its appropriate sphere of operation, exerting unlimited powers in a coextensive collateral sphere of operation. It would be a condition like that of the Roman Republic in an advanced stage of its progress, in which, characterized by the forms of a limited Government at home, it wielded without control the uncounted resources and power of the provinces. To the issue of this condition of things in that Republic it was not necessary to advert, nor to pursue the train of reflection which it was calculated to suggest.

Reverting to the question, Mr. A. denied that a power on the part of the President and Senate to dispose of territory, was to be regarded as a consequence of the power to acquire it. The separable characters of these powers resulted from the principle which determined the general propriety and motives of all delegation or reservation of power, namely, the beneficial or harmless character of its exercise. The exertion of a power to acquire territory could scarcely be otherwise than beneficial in its tendency, and the power might therefore well be admitted. The exercise of the power to alienate could rarely be attended with a beneficial, and was liable to be attended with a very detrimental operation. This power might therefore well be denied.

The case was like that of infancy at law, in which, though a competency to be benefitted by acts of acquisition was properly admitted, the capacity was denied to be bound to acts of alienation. A power to alienate was, indeed, in no case, in relation to subjects of private or public interest, any necessary correlative of a power to acquire. Whether, then, future acquisitions of territory were or were not contemplated, and their disposal provided for by the Constitution, the conclusion was still the same, that the power of disposal, either to foreign Governments or to citizens, so far as it existed at all, could belong only to Congress; and this in reference both to the letter of the Constitution and to the policy directing the delegation of power in free States. If the power were to be considered as a necessary resulting power, arising out of circumstances not foreseen, it could only result to the Legislature, the general representatives of the nation. A subject of interest accruing subsequently to a grant, if it can be made to pass at all by the grant, must pass to the grantee of the general estate, and not to the grantee of any particular portion of it.

The powers appertaining to the treaty-making department, and those granted to Congress over particular classes of subjects, presenting the appearance of conflict, the object of a just constitution would be to reconcile them by allowing to both, if possible, a due operation. But this object could only be attained by the mode which had been suggested, of allowing them a concurrent operation over the subjects which present the apparent occasion of conflict. This construction was in consistency with all received rules in relation to questions of this sort. It was an established principle, which had been adverted to, (by the Speaker,) that in cases of the conflict of particular with general expressions, the general must give way to the particular expression. And why? Because rules of construction being nothing more than contrivances for the ascertainment of intention, what was equivocal in a general, became explicit in a particular expression. The construction stated derived corroboration in the present instance of its application, from a consideration of the momentous character of the subjects of power which it operated to detach from the executive, to confide to the concurrent treaty-making jurisdiction; and from a consideration of the affinity which it tended to stamp on the treaty-making power, to the general policy and character of the Constitution, and to the peculiar character of the more important specific powers which it comprised.

The construction relied on was confirmed by other principles of interpretation. One of these, the offspring of incontrovertible reason, required that the most mitigated sense should be given to expressions obscure or doubtful in their character. "In obscuris quod minimum est querimus." The application of this maxim was particularly strong to grants of power, in relation to which the smallest amount of concession might always be presumed. And it applied with still an augmented force to a grant of power such as that contained in the Constitution, which was admitted on all hands to be of the strictest and most limited description. But, this being the fact, the whole doubt as well as danger in the case under review, proceeded from the construction which assigned the largest extension to the power of the President and Senate, and were obviated by that which admitted the qualification of their power by the specific grants of power made to Congress by the Constitution.

It would not be contended by the most extravagant advocates of the treaty-making power, that there existed no limits to its extension. It would not be contended that the power extended to the transfer of a State, or of an essential part of sovereignty, for example. The question which arose upon this power related, then, not to the fact, but to the point of its limitation. What was the point assigned? The subsistence of other powers by the explicit expression of the Constitution. What was the degree of limitation contended for? Was it the entire exclusion of the jurisdiction of the power from the subjects of these particular powers? No. The degree of limitation was the confinement of the power (left in other respects unrestricted) to a concurrent jurisdiction in relation to this particular class of subjects. The limitation assigned was precise, both as respected its point of occurrence and degree. In its tendency it was beneficial; and it arose upon the letter, as it was sustained by the true intentment, of the Constitution. Construction affirming a limit of this character upon power, could with no color of propriety be rejected from operation.

There was one consideration upon the subject of this controversy, in relation to the extent of the treaty-making power, which appeared to Mr. A. to be conclusive. It was this, that the exclusive control claimed for the power, was not pretended to extend to all the subjects submitted to Congress by the Constitution. There were several which this exclusive control was admitted not to cover. The powers to borrow money; to make war; to raise armies; to admit new States, were examples. But where was the ground of distinction between these subjects and those over which an exclusive, superseding control was claimed? It was not to be found in the Constitution. There these several classes of subjects were placed on the same exact footing. The powers conveyed to Congress were all conveyed in the same terms. The distinction was not to be found in any peculiar importance of the abdicated subjects. All were important. Was the distinction to be found in the supposed external relation of the class of arrogated subjects, rendering them in a peculiar degree adapted to become the objects of treaty stipulation? These subjects were not distinguished by this character in any greater degree than several of the abdicated subjects; of which the powers of making war and raising armies were instances. The danger, too, with which the argument derived from this principle of construction was fraught, ought not to escape observation. Let the principle be admitted, and it would be only necessary to give to exercises of power the form of treaty stipulation, and any power might be exercised, and any object attained, by the Executive department, however remote from the proper sphere of its control. Finally, if the distinction between the jurisdiction arrogated, and that renounced, by the treaty-making power, were made to rest on the peculiar character of the treaty stipulations, as being susceptible of execution, independently of legislative aid, or as requiring that aid for their execution, the answer was equally obvious with those which had been stated to other supposed principles of distinction. It was this, that there were various supposeable cases of stipulation having no dependence on legislative aid for execution, which yet the consent of all men would reject from the exclusive control of the treaty-making power. One example, suggested by recent occurrences, should be adduced. A new State, provided its government were organized, and the form republican, might be admitted into the Union without any necessary intervention of legislative authority, by a treaty stipulating that it should send two Senators and one Representative to Congress. There was a republican government now organized among the blacks in the island of Hayti. If the doctrines asserted in relation to the extent of the treaty-making power were just, what was there to hinder the admission of this Republic into the Union, if the President and Senate were to be of opinion to admit it? Here was a case requiring no intervention of legislative aid. Here was a case which, from its character of external relation, fell within the class of the appropriate objects of treaty stipulation. It was sufficient for the argument, that the case was a possible one. Mr. A. did not affect to insinuate that the realization ever could be thought of. Considering, however, the value of West India possessions, there was a possible composition of the Executive department, in which the realization was by no means inconceivable. Constitutional doctrines, however, could not be sound, which involved the possibility of such a consequence.

There were various other and important views, connected with the discussion of this question of the just character of the treaty-making power in our Government, which Mr. A. said that fatigue compelled him to premit. An observation had been made in the debate, however, which it was necessary to notice. It had been said that, admitting the incompetency of the President and Senate to alienate, their power could not be denied to ascertain the limits of territory, and that the provisions of the treaty, in this respect, extended no farther than to an ascertainment of limits. The distinction, as related to the power, was admitted. There could be no question of the authority to settle limits. But was the character of the treaty such as had been represented? Did it operate only to define, and not extend to the alienation of territory? Was not the contrary of this suggestion notorious? Did not the treaty, on the face of it, purport to make a cession of territory, by stating the fact, and by employing throughout the language appropriate to cession? Did not every person, in any degree versed in the history of the controversy with Spain upon this subject, know that the boundary fixed by the treaty was, as had been observed by the Speaker, a new line made, and not a line ascertained? The treaty did, therefore, make an alienation of territory. Into the question of our title to this territory, Mr. A. did not design at this time to enter, farther than to observe, that the acceptance by Spain of the country as a cession from us, was to his mind sufficient evidence of the validity of our title. The inability, too, of Spain to make out a valid title against us, (which appeared from the negotiation to be the fact,) was itself, in the relative condition of the two countries, tantamount to a valid title upon our part.

Such were the views which Mr. A. had been led to entertain of the proposition affirmed by the first resolution. But whether those views were well or ill-founded; whether Congress were or were not entitled to a voice in the disposal of the territory which the treaty with Spain proposed to alienate, there could be no question of its belonging, both to the right and the duty of Congress, to express an opinion upon any subject of national policy, deemed of sufficient importance to require such an expression. There could be as little question that this expression of opinion would have its due weight with the Executive Department of the Government. If Congress concurred, therefore, in the views which had dictated the second resolution, there could be no question of the propriety of affirming them, by the passage of the resolution.

There were several propositions asserted by the resolution—the disproportion of the equivalent rendered by Spain for our concessions in the treaty; the general impolicy of the transfer of the territory ceded on our part to any foreign Power: and the inexpediency as a consequence of these, of the ratification of the treaty, now that the option of our Government was restored, to ratify or reject it. Was, then, the equivalent stipulated to be rendered by them disproportionate, and was it impolitic to make a transfer to any foreign Power of the territory we had stipulated to cede? What were the relative concessions of the contracting parties? On the side of the United States, five millions of dollars to be paid, in part discharge of claims of our citizens upon Spain; the abandonment of the residue of these claims; of which, as they stood in the same character, the allowance of this part was, in effect, a recognition to the amount of $15,000,000, as had been stated (by the honorable Speaker;) the privilege to the subjects of Spain, carrying on commerce with the territory we were to acquire, of admission into its ports on the same terms with our own citizens, for the period of twelve years from the ratification of the treaty; and, finally, the territory of Texas, which we stipulated to cede. Placing out of view the other parts of this concession, what was the character and value of this territory of Texas? The full value we were not possessed of sufficient information, it was probable, to enable us to appreciate. Enough, however, was known to ascertain its superiority in this respect to the province, as part of the consideration of which it was proposed to be transferred. In superficial extent, Texas would not be denied to be several times larger than Florida. In a general character of fertility, the two countries, according to the accounts which Mr. A. had received, admitted of no comparison, so decidedly was the advantage on the side of the former of them. Placed in a near vicinity to South America, this province asserted still more signally, to the character of its productions, its affinity to the peculiar natural advantages which distinguish, in a manner so remarkable, that most favored portion of the earth. Productions of the highest value, and supposed to be the most widely diversified, as respected the soil and climate they required, found here a point of neighborhood and union. Corn, cotton, sugar, met a congenial soil, and circumstances favorable to their production. The climate was of extraordinary salubrity—the rivers various and large. And what was the consideration for which we were to surrender a country such as this had been described; of immense extent, possessed of every natural advantage, destined by the most signal evidences to high political importance? Was it for the sands of Florida? No, not for the property, but for little more than the sovereignty of these sands. For, independently of the grants to Alagon, and Vargas, and Punon Rostro, which had been the subjects of recent contestation, the largest and the most valuable portion of the soil of Florida was known to have been granted out. The recent contested grants had only been of the residuary lands. In the bargain which had been made we were to give the sovereignty and nearly the whole, Mr. A. presumed, of the soil of Texas, such as it had been described, for little more, comparatively speaking, than the sovereignty of Florida. Was the bargain one, which, in this obvious view of its character, with perfect liberty to accept or reject it, it would be expedient to confirm? But, great importance was attributed to Florida in a military and political point of view.

Without any design of derogation from the importance of Florida in this respect, did this consideration, Mr. A. asked, render its acquisition at this time, and at the price of any disproportionate equivalent, an object of reasonable solicitude on our part? He apprehended that it did not. Whatever might be the advantages presented by this country for purposes of military or commercial annoyance, in the hands of Spain, it could not be rendered subservient to any such purposes against us. Spain did not possess, nor had the faculty of acquiring means and resources, military or naval, which could be applied to such objects. Nor, if she possessed, or could acquire them, could it ever be her policy to avail herself of the position of Florida to employ them against this country.

In proof of this the single consideration was sufficient, that the inevitable result of the pursuit of such a policy would be the loss of the province in question, without the possibility of indemnification. This result, it would be admitted, could not be prevented by any exertion or contingency of events. The acquisition of Florida was therefore an object of no considerable importance as related to any view of danger of its being used for purposes of annoyance by Spain. The ground of apprehension was as slight from any other quarter. The Indian inhabitants would be in no great degree more likely to give us disturbance, if the country continued in the hands of Spain, than if it were transferred to our own. Nor was fear indeed to be indulged of disturbance from this source while the life or the memory of Jackson among his Indian adversaries were preserved. For danger, proceeding from any European Power other than Spain, we had already made an adequate provision by a law giving authority to the President to prevent the occupation of Florida by a foreign Power. Mr. A. said that, in the policy of this law, he entirely concurred. While he should be opposed to the occupation of the country by ourselves, at least under present circumstances, when he would be averse to any measure by which the hazard of war might be incurred, he should, at all times and under all circumstances, consider the prevention of the occupation of Florida by any other foreign Power than Spain, as a measure of indisputable and unimpeachable policy, on the part of this country. It stood justified to his mind by considerations admitted to be paramount to all others—of defence and preservation. No Power could have either interest or motive in the acquisition of Florida, unconnected with views to our annoyance, and a policy dictated by such views, it was at all times as justifiable as it was necessary to repel. Whatever, then, might be the intrinsic importance of Florida in a political point of view, its acquisition could not be considered as demanded of us at this time at the price of any concession disproportioned to its proper value.

But was this character of importance, in a political view, confined to Florida? Was Texas of no consideration in this view? Let the situation of this province, at the back of Louisiana, and the direction of the flow of its principal rivers, be considered, and the important and delicate relation which it sustained to New Orleans, itself the most important position in our country, would immediately be perceived. Upon this view of the subject, interesting as it was, Mr. A. forbore, from obvious considerations, to enlarge. He would dismiss it, merely accompanied with a hint at the capacity of Texas to maintain a formidable population. Considered in a mere political aspect, then, the equivalent which we were to obtain for our territorial concession in the treaty appeared to be little entitled to the preference which had been allotted to it, and the ratification of the treaty altogether unadvisable.

There was another view of the subject, entirely concurrent with that which had been stated. Whatever might have been the value of Florida, could it not have been obtained on terms better than those which had been stipulated? There was certainly no indisposition on the part of Spain to yield it to us. This was manifest, from the character of the instructions which were known to have been given to Don Onís; from the fact of his signature to the treaty; from the fact of the despatch of the new mission, which was every day expected on our shores; and, finally, from the evidence disclosed by the publication of the late negotiation at Madrid, which showed that the difficulties which had obstructed the ratification of the treaty did not relate to any reluctance indulged by the Government of Spain to make a cession of the country. Spain had no interest in the retention of this province. It was of no value, but rather a source of expense, and a burden as a territorial dependency. It could be of no value, from her peculiar condition, in a military or commercial view. Superadded to this consideration, she had strong motives to make the cession. If the motives of her determination to do so, as heretofore evinced, had reference to the posture of her affairs in South America, these motives not only retained an undiminished, but had acquired an increased force from recent occurrences. If the object of her policy, hitherto, had been to prevent our interference in any mode in the contest with the patriots, and she still retained the hope of being enabled to prosecute that contest, the increasing difficulties of her situation, and the knowledge of the peculiar and growing state of public sentiment in this country, both towards herself and towards the patriots, furnished decided inducements to her to continue to act in the same line of policy, and to secure our further forbearance at the price which she had already determined to regard as a consideration not too high for it. But, if she had lost all hope of being enabled to prosecute the contest with the colonies, then her inducements to the same course became still more unequivocal. Why? because she knew that in the event of the success of the patriots, Florida must fall into their hands, who may be presumed to form the objects of her peculiar animosity, or must come by the operation of domestic revolution into ours, without her obtaining any compensation for it, even the liquidation of our claims on her for spoliation. In every view, then, interest, and in one view, a moral feeling, more powerful in its operation than interest, prompted Spain to the pursuit of the same policy, which was that of cession of the territory we were desirous to obtain. There was no opposing interest or motive of any sort. Under these circumstances, left, as we were, at liberty by the delay of Spain in ratifying the treaty, and even authorized to rise in our demands, would it not be a policy preferable to the ratification of the treaty to trust ourselves to the results of a new negotiation? In the worst event of such a resort, we might expect, considering the advantage of our situation, to procure Florida for money, (more alluring to Spain in her present circumstances than territory,) in place of the disproportioned territorial equivalent which we had stipulated to give for it.

Might we not be justified, too, in indulging a glance at the very possible contingency of procuring this country, without the payment of any price, by the effect of domestic revolution? In any event, our claims on Spain would remain the same. They might be considered as having derived the advantage of recognition from the treaty. Spain was in no condition to satisfy them in any other way than by a cession of Florida. If she declined to satisfy them in this, the only mode which was in her power, we would be at liberty to adopt a remedy for ourselves. The fund could not escape us. It was at all times liable to our control. Could there, in such circumstances, be excuse for imprudence, or occasion for precipitation, in our endeavors to obtain possession of Florida, however desirable it might be to do so?

Upon the whole, Mr. A. said, he considered the propositions affirmed by the second resolution as sustained—that there was a want of proportion in the relative concessions of the treaty; that the territory which it purported to cede on our part, ought not to be made the subject of transfer to any other foreign Power, and that the ratification of the treaty was in every view inexpedient. Entertaining these views, he had no hesitation in expressing them, and he hoped that the resolutions would meet the approbation of the Committee.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, said, that he had risen to support both of the resolutions offered by his colleague, the honorable Speaker. He saw in the documents strong indications of intention to accept the treaty, and, dissatisfied as he was, he owed it as a duty to himself, to the nation generally, and especially to that part of it residing on the Western waters, to enter his protest at large against the ratification. The treaty, in his opinion, was one of great interest to the nation; presenting various topics for discussion, most of which had been precluded from debate by the cautious prudence of his friend from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDES.) He knew that the rules of the House gave him a wide range, but he found himself unexpectedly restricted by the solicitude of the chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations. He was sure that solicitude was deeply felt, because it was strongly expressed, and being always ready to defer to his talents and discretion, he would cheerfully conform to his wishes. He had no right, he said, to complain of the course proposed; and he would do his friend the justice to say, that, if he did not advance with the boldness of Alexander, he displayed in retreat all the skill of a Xenophon. He was in Parliament, what Moreau and Montecuccoli were in the field; he carried every thing with him; had left no spoil for his pursuers; no point exposed; no barriers undefended. The honor of the nation could not be placed in better hands, or safer keeping; and no one could defend its interests with superior ability.

The friends of the treaty, he said, had sought occasion to proclaim its merits; its opposers, until now, had not been heard. It was time the people should be heard; it was time for their Representatives to speak. The Western people have but one market for their produce—one emporium for their commerce; and the treaty leaves that one unprotected; leaves it fearfully exposed. He did not believe that the nation, if consulted, would ratify this treaty; he did not consider it a thing in esse; a contract in abeyance; it was, in his opinion, a mere nullity; and each party remitted back to his original rights and claims.

Our relations with Spain, he said, required the display of some energy, and for that reason he had prepared his mind to vote for reprisals; not because the treaty was obligatory, but because time and chance might change the present posture of affairs and bring more trouble and more danger. To avoid that, and finish all at once, he would have acknowledged the patriots, and have occupied Texas and the Floridas. This would have brought the Castilian to terms, or made one war, and not a triple contest of it. Why strike for half the quarrel? If the army comes in as finisher of treaties, let us have all the land, and hold it as we did West Florida, subject to negotiation. He that takes justice in his own hands, should take the full measure of its claims.

APRIL, 1820.

The Spanish Treaty.

H. OF R.

Mr. T. did not intend to censure the officer who conducted the negotiations on our part; he would say that the ratification was pressed upon Spain with more zeal than judgment. She was made to suspect that the treaty was highly favorable to this country, because it was warmly urged; whereas, in fact, the advantage was wholly on the side of Spain. It was clear, from the documents, that Mr. Adams was not able to barter land with Don Onís; he had confided too much in Castilian honor, as to the dates of the grants, and suffered the crafty Spaniard to deceive him. He had been circumvented. This was no discomplement. It was proof of fair dealing on his part; and it was more honorable to be the victim than the agent or the perpetrator of hypocrisy and fraud. He said he had nothing to say against the Executive in this matter; and hoped that no one would charge him with want of confidence in that Department. He would not allow the supposition to be made; his confidence in the President was unimpaired; and this, of all subjects, was the one upon which it was least likely to be diminished. He said he had not forgotten, it was impossible he should forget, that a proposition was made thirty years ago, in a secret session of Congress, to surrender the Western country to Spain for twenty-five years, and that its defeat was owing almost entirely to the resistance made by our present Chief Magistrate. The question then was—"our right to navigate the Mississippi;" the question now is, our right to the country, Louisiana proper, and the positions which protect and defend it. Eschewing war, and loving peace, the President has made sacrifices to maintain it; liberality is found in every clause of the treaty; forbearance in every page of the message. Texas was thrown in as a peace-offering to Spain; she refused it; and we are not bound, in justice or in honor, to offer it again. This nation will never consent that it shall be offered or conceded. The treaty has been sent to us by the President; the whole subject is before us; we are in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and have a right to enter our protest and objections; and he for one was ready to perform his duty. He could see no danger in a broad discussion; but he would relieve the anxiety of his friend (Mr. LOWNDES) at once, by omitting all the topics which he wished to have excluded.

The extent of the treaty-making power is one question; the check which this House of Congress holds upon it another. It was not necessary for him to prove that this House could rightfully and properly refuse to carry into effect a treaty, which, in its judgment, would be ruinous to the country. The first resolution asserts this right. He had just promised not to discuss it; but he would never yield it so long as he was a member of the body. Limited as he was in his course of inquiry, he would not engage in a critical analysis of the treaty. It was called a treaty of amity, settlement, and limits; it was, in fact, a treaty of cession, of limits, and satisfaction. Territory is ceded on both sides, in full sovereignty. Limits are settled, and satisfaction promised, for injuries and spoliations. He would not stop to define the treaty-making power, or lay down its limits, its corners, and abutments. That his friend (Mr. LOWNDES) would call "abstraction." But there are stipulations, he said, in this instrument, above the treaty-making power; above the Constitution; stipulations, alarming to freemen, and fraught with serious mischief; he felt it his duty to present them to the nation.

He said it would be recollected that the Louisiana Treaty amalgamated the inhabitants of that country with the people of the United States; that it gave them a common interest in the Union; an equal claim to its protection; a guarantee of "all the rights, advantages, and immunities, of citizens of the States." To use an Indian metaphor, the treaty of cession made us all one man. The fact was well known that some of the French inhabitants resided at that date, and still continue to reside, in that part of Texas then ceded to us, and now ceded to Spain. Some of our own people had removed there since the treaty of April 30, 1803; had purchased lands of Frenchmen, holding grants under the French Government, and stood upon the soil as allodial free men of the Union, claiming its protection, and rendering it due homage and all fealty. Now, sir, said he, I assert roundly, I contend boldly, that there is no power in the Constitution under which you can expatriate a citizen of the Union. I know that a treaty is the supreme law of the land: I admit that the treaty power is competent to settle questions of boundary and limits; but I deny the existence of any power by which you can alienate a citizen—denationalize a free man. What, sir! sell land to a citizen; take his money; and then sell him, and land, and liberty, and all! It is too monstrous to be endured: it challenges resistance the moment it is seen. Citizenship is not an article of merchandise; it is not negotiable. Political rights in our Government are not subjects of barter and exchange; they could not be sold under hammer at political auction. Citizenship is indefeasible; inalienable: it is a patrimony descending to us from our ancestors, under entail, and we must leave it to posterity unbroken. Show me your power, said he, to cede citizens with sovereignty, like serfs and vassals of the soil. Show the power or expunge the stipulation from the treaty. Strike it out; obliterate it; and leave the statute book untainted by the precedents. There are some hundreds of our citizens, by birth and adoption, expatriated by this treaty. The fact was surely unknown to the Secretary at that date. What reply could you make to a petition and remonstrance from these people? How would a committee report upon the case? A skilful diplomatist might boggle at the question. The stipulation would never be sanctioned by the nation: it required a statesman of courage to affirm the power; and to such he would leave the honor of defending it. He would never envy the laurels they might gather.

Mr. T. had objections to another article, an encrescence in the treaty, which called loudly for the knife and caustic. It grew out of the subject of claims and spoliations. The demands of our citizens are stated by some at ten millions of dollars, by others at twenty. Ten is below the minimum in aggregate. The eleventh article of the treaty exonerates Spain from these demands; gives a full renunciation; cancels the whole debt, and undertakes to make satisfaction to our citizens to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars. Where, said he, does the treaty-making power find authority to expunge the claims of our citizens—extinguish their right to demand the full amount from Spain, and only pay them half the money? Barter their whole claims for soil and sovereignty; for sand and sea-weed—a barren sceptre—and pay them but one moiety! This is a new mode of levying taxes, of raising contributions: a letter of marque and reprisal on ourselves; a flat violation of the fifth article of the amendments to the Constitution, which declares, that “private property shall not be taken for public purposes, without just compensation.”

What is just compensation? Payment in full, and nothing less. “Render unto Cæsar the things that are his;” not a part of those things, but the whole of them. Our people were sufferers under the new code of maritime jurisprudence—under lawless edicts and decrees. They were struck by spoliation, and ruined by delay. Justice demanded a reimbursement of principal and interest. This Government was bound in duty and good faith to ask it for them. It has cancelled the claims in exchange for Florida. These claimants are men of sense and judgment, of weight and influence in the country; they will lose nothing by modesty in asking; consummate the treaty, and you will find a cart-load of petitions on your table, praying payment of the whole amount: will you grant it? If so, you give Texas, and ten millions for the Floridas. If you refuse, where is your boasted love of justice—where your equality of rights? The Constitution and the social compact are both infringed. Man enters society in self-defence; we surrender part of our rights to purchase protection for the residue: we grant the power to tax our property, to pay the expenses of protection, but not the power of relinquishing our claims, for public purposes, without a fair equivalent. Let this matter be carefully considered. If you ratify the treaty and pay ten millions to these claimants, the bargain is unequal in all respects. If you refuse, what will Europe say? What a precedent for her—a case in point!

Our people have claims for spoliation against the other Powers of Europe. If in this instance we take the shoes of Spain, and pay but half the debt, will not the other Powers cite the precedent, and cut off a moiety of what they owe? Can we urge them to do our citizens more justice than we do ourselves? Better lose Florida than lose our character abroad. The reputation of our Government for moral justice is of more value than barren territory.

He said he would barely notice the grants to Puno Rostro, Alagon, and Vargas. They are third persons, whose rights cannot be affected by the protest of our Minister, announcing our intended construction of the treaty; their titles would rest upon the dates, and letter of the grants and treaty, sanctioned by the Laws of the Indies, and nothing short of revocation would remove the encumbrance. A law suit with the patentees was not desirable.

He was not exactly satisfied with the line west of the Rocky Mountains, especially, as that portion of country was the supposed equivalent for Texas. All the exploring parties to the Pacific ocean, since the return of Lewis and Clarke, had united in opinion, that the only practicable route for constant intercourse and trading purposes to the Columbia, lies across the Rocky Mountains, from the head waters of the Arkansas to those of the Multnomah.

By the treaty our boundary stops at 42 degrees north latitude; now if gentlemen will make an examination of the map, they will find that this line of latitude will give Spain the entire navigation of that fine river for about five hundred miles. These last objections, he said, were blemishes in the treaty which ought to be corrected. He had intended, he said, to treat this as a question of great national policy, and on this morning had determined to limit his views in some measure to its domestic aspects, and relations. In doing this he should waive the discussion of several topics which had claims to his attention. He would barely name some of them.

1st. The question of equivalents.

2d. The Treasury side of the subject—the items of profit and loss.

3d. The quality and value of the soil of Florida and Texas; acre per acre.

4th. The live oak of each province, especially of Texas, and its great value for naval purposes.

The ports and harbors of Florida and Texas ought to be omitted. It was his opinion that we ought to hold both provinces, and it was not his intention to disparage either. He would not therefore compare the ports and harbors, although those of Texas would bear a contrast; our charts of both coasts were too imperfect to be relied on, and the recent correction of mistake as to the depth of water on the outer bar at Mobile Point and Dauphin Island, would caution him against hastily admitting the facts reported by submarine explorers. What effect will the surrender of the ports of Texas have upon our carrying trade? Let our Eastern shippers and tonnage holders look to that; it is their immediate interest. It belongs to navigation. Get the ports of Galveston and Matagorda, and you get the carrying trade of Vera Cruz. It is a branch of our coasting trade, and if wisely followed, will draw after it the entire carrying trade of Mexico, or New Spain. Every alienation on the Gulf will so far at least diminish your prospect of securing the carrying trade upon those seas. Will gentlemen from the East suffer the phantasies and delusions of a moment, to deprive them of such lasting and valuable advantages? A safe and sure trade upon the Gulf is as much the interest of the Eastern, as the Western States; will they permit local feelings, founded on visions and airy nothings, to govern them in questions of such general and substantial benefit? He would hope not. For his part, he would never so far degrade his station here, as to suffer local interests to govern him upon questions of great national concern. He thought it his duty to strengthen the cohesion of the Union. He had formerly voted, and he should again vote to encourage domestic manufactures. He had always voted for every bill intended to protect our commerce, and place it on an equal footing with that of other nations; and he intended still to do so, always giving the preference to agriculture; and holding the balance even, if he could, between commerce and manufactures. He would ask Eastern gentlemen to name an instance, in which Western members had arrayed themselves against the interests of the East. Yet they ought to know that we are not misled by the exploded doctrine, "that commerce can best protect itself." We have too many bills before us from the Committee on Commerce, to believe one word of it. This is the age of maritime restrictions, and we know very well that commerce will come to nothing, if we "leave it to protect itself."

The value of Texas as a coffee country, would claim brief notice. It was a subject richly deserving the attention of a statesman. The primary policy of this nation is, to make itself independent of the commercial world; particularly so far as relates to the common necessities of life. This is the basis of every argument in favor of domestic manufactures. Is it not equally as strong in favor of all articles of sustenance, especially coffee, which has become the common and daily beverage of all classes of society? Ought the supply to depend upon a foreign market? Such is our dependence now, and always has been; and the vicissitudes of trade, and war, and restrictions upon commerce, have made us pay dearly for what we have consumed. Our soil produces all the necessities of life, each climate yielding its indigenous supplies; but it so happens that Texas is the only coffee land we have, or ever can have, unless we conquer Mexico, or engage in the colonial system, either of which would be worse than madness. This, is, therefore, the last and only chance we shall ever have, to cut the cable of commercial vassalage, by creating a home supply for domestic uses.

These, if there were no other objections to the treaty, would induce him as an American statesman to reject it. He would leave them and pursue his course; his object was the high domain.

His great objection to the treaty, one which in his opinion was decisive, had not yet been pressed or amplified. The argument had chiefly rested upon the treaty-making power, and the power of this House; and upon title, and equivalents. His friend from Virginia (Mr. ARCHER) had debated the question of power, with an ability which did him honor. There, Mr. T. would let it rest. The view which he would take of the subject made it of little importance whether the first resolution should be affirmed or not. He would vote for the second, with the utmost freedom.

Title and equivalents apart, ought this nation to accept the limits settled by the treaty, and surrender Texas?

The boundary, in his opinion, was the main question. Most of the other stipulations were retroactive; had reference only to the interests of a few. But this is entirely prospective in its operation. It concerns every citizen of the Republic, and especially those of the West, whose barriers were about to be surrendered; the shield of whose commerce was about to be broken, and the emporium of their trade exposed to surreption and to plunder. It was of no consequence, he said, whether we had title or no title to the province in dispute. Not that he intended to yield our claim of title—far from it. He saw no room for doubt; the argument upon title was conclusive in our favor. That gave us the "vantage ground;" but he would waive it entirely, because he intended to sustain himself upon other facts and principles, and would endeavor to show that the surrender of Texas would be in every respect improvident and dangerous.

This, he said, was a Treaty of Limits. The Father of the Universe, in his peculiar providence, had given natural boundaries to every continent and kingdom—permanent, physical, imperishable barriers, to every nation, to shield it from invasion. Man, in his mad career of glory, his thirst for dominion, had rejected as useless the great and permanent boundaries of nature, and sought out ideal, perishable limits of his own creation. Look at the great profile of every continent, and you find them partitioned by the hand of Providence into portions and allotments convenient for the purposes of social happiness; and these allotments are every where protected by barriers and defences. Spain herself is an instance. She is bounded by two seas and one mountain—the Atlantic and Mediterranean, and the Pyrennees. Hundreds of wars have arisen upon questions of ideal boundary, and millions of human beings have been slaughtered to beat back ambitious nations into their natural limits. Compacts and paper boundaries are men of straw in the hands of domination. It is physical barriers alone that check encroachment, and give repose to feeble nations. In Europe, questions of boundary are settled by the law of accident, of conquest, of necessity, of weakness—by the law called "the balance of power." Density of population, conflicting interest, and long established usages, preclude all hope of voluntary change. Ours, on the contrary, is a new world, sparsely settled, (partly unpeopled,) inhabited by nations in a state of pupillage. We alone have risen from minority to manhood. We have fought one war for independence; another for "free trade and sailors' rights;" and another must be fought for barriers and boundaries, if you ratify this treaty. We are acting on a new theatre, under new auspices, and new principles.

What ought to be the confines of our Union? That was the great question confided to our Minister. No public functionary ever held a higher trust, or filled an office more responsible—the sacred trust of giving limits to the only free nation in existence. Called as he was to that high trust; holding as he did in his hands the destiny of millions; animated, as he surely was, by all the mo-ties that could stimulate his love of country, he should have spurned the higgling policy of Kings, the truck and traffic of European despots, and their ambidextrous Ministers, and, mounting upwards to first principles, demanded at once our natural limits, the barriers of our country, and yielded with equal promptitude all claims beyond them. Nations are individuals in relation to each other; and, as self-defence is the first law of man, so is national defence the first law of society. The boundaries of States and Kingdoms should be settled with reference to their military defence and maritime protection. Every nation should possess the military positions which defend its frontier, and the keys which protect the emporiums of its commerce. These barriers are hostages for the peace of nations; and no people can neglect them with impunity, or surrender them with safety. It is by acquiring these, in times of peace, that preparation is best made for war. These, said Mr. T., are maxims established by experience and sanctioned by all history. Are they found in this treaty? Do they sanction its stipulations, or had they been forgotten in the lapse of diplomacy? he was mistaken if they were not. He would conjure gentlemen not to mislead themselves with doubts about the title. We were purchasing territory, and fixing limits. Title was nothing. Boundary and barriers were every thing. There lies the pith and marrow of the subject.

1st. Where are the natural limits and barriers of the Republic?

2d. Was it in our power to obtain a cession for those limits?

3d. Were they necessary or desirable for military purposes—for protection and defence?

4th. Were they wanted as safeguards to our commerce and commercial depots?

5th. If we transfer our claim, be it bad or good, shadow or substance, may not some hostile Power, some jealous adversary, occupy the province, and use it to assail New Orleans, and destroy our Western commerce, or load it with exactions?

These were inquiries of first magnitude, and claim our cool deliberation. The Rio del Norte, the Puerco, and the Apachee mountains, and Sierra Obscura, (dark mountains,) are our national limits, on that side of the confederacy. Examine, if you please, a map of our country; compare it with that of other nations. Like France, we are bounded by two seas and two mountains—the Atlantic and the lakes on those sides, and by the mountains West and South. The Rio del Norte is to us what the Rhine is to France, and Texas is our low country—our Netherlands. Spain authorized her Minister to cede all as far as the Rio del Norte; wherefore shall we surrender all beyond the Sabine? The Minister had full powers, and his secret instructions permitted him to cede much farther than he did—rumor says, a large portion of New Spain; meaning “Louisiana, as it should be,” to the Rio del Norte. Why did we yield? Why not adhere to every acre? The Spaniard had fears, and our interests were set off against his fears—our barriers and defences, to save his head. The commercial interests of eight States, two Territories, parts of two States, and all the transmontane regions surrendered, now and forever, to save a Spaniard from potential danger.

New Orleans, he said, was the only entrepot for the commerce of the Mississippi and its waters. No city, of ancient or modern times, possessed the same advantages; certainly none of ours had equal prospects for the future. It was destined to become the great emporium of the new world. It was the heel of Achilles—our vulnerable point. Florida, Texas, and Cuba, are the great military and naval positions which defend the city and its commerce, or threaten it with invasion. It is peculiarly exposed to combined operations—to simultaneous attacks by land and water. Let it be taken, and the tree is belted; the country above it will deaden and decay. We have no other market. Our produce will perish on our hands. Expose New Orleans, and you expose our interests in the same proportion. A place of such importance should be guarded by positions which bid defiance to assault. The three positions he had named belong properly to our continent. Cuba, said he, we shall never get; and the treaty offers to surrender Texas, leaving us Florida, the weakest of the three, to defend the city. He would say the weakest, because he should hazard nothing in affirming that Orleans is most vulnerable on its right flank—on the side of Texas; and always would be so, until that province is settled by our people. From Florida and Cuba the line of attack upon New Orleans is by water; the land route from East Florida being impracticable for any army of invasion. The enemy would have to debark itself in the face of defensive armies, an operation never desirable, and almost always dangerous. But the base of a campaign against Orleans, laid in Texas, and aided by the fine horses of that country, and the facilities of descent by the Red river and Mississippi, would insure success; and, even if defeated, the men and means of that defeat would cost this country more than twice the sum which would at this day purchase the whole province. This line of attack unites all the advantages of land and water movements. A fleet could actively operate upon the Gulf, and furnish the invading army with supplies, by the rivers and bayous of the country. All this was so clear to him, so palpable, that he marvelled greatly at those who could not see it. He would ask, if New Orleans had nothing to fear from a transfer of Texas to England? Nothing from a coalition between England and New Spain? Nothing from the ambition of a Creolian Emperor of Mexico, possessing the very sinews of war, the mines and precious metals, and stimulated by the love of domination?

England, he said, had fought us two wars, and committed the same errors in each. It was not for him to expose her blunders; experience would not be lost upon her; she could feel for a soft place as well as other nations. It is said she urges Spain to ratify the treaty; and it is also said that she holds a secret treaty of cession for the island of Cuba; that has been denied. Perhaps it is only a cession of Texas, in part remuneration for subsidies furnished during the war in the Peninsula against Napoleon and King Joseph. Next to Cuba, it is the most important acquisition she could make upon our borders; especially if she intends to fight us another war. She would then hold the barriers of our country on each flank—on the North and South; and while we besiege Quebec she would plunder Orleans. If she demands the province, can Ferdinand refuse? Where was he, and what his condition, in February last? At Madrid, surrounded by discord and confusion; his coffers empty; his subjects mutinous; and his army in rebellion. Where is he now? Perhaps winging his aerial flight after his cousin the Duke of Berri; perhaps an exile from his native land, living upon the bounty of the allies; perhaps a fugitive, houseless and friendless in his own dominions; perhaps a tenant in his own dungeons, the companion of State criminals, the victims of his mad policy.

Mr. T. rejoiced that he was a son of the new world; a citizen of a free government; a companion of freemen. Had his lot been cast elsewhere, Ireland of choice should have been his birth-place, the land of hospitality and heroes, of patriots and martyrs; and, next to Ireland, France. The French, said he, are a brave and generous people; heroic, magnanimous, and lofty; their renown in arms will be remembered, when the dynasties of the Bourbons and Napoleons are forgotten. They deserved to enjoy a bright day of liberty, of which they saw only the twilight. The holy alliance may persuade Louis XVIII to abolish the law of elections, the freedom of the press, and the trial by jury, and to revive the lettres de cachet; but the king should beware. The spirit of freedom in France is unbroken—it only sleeps—the ultras will ruin him. Even now his power totters to its base. But, as to his cousin Ferdinand, he dare not send him subsidies. He dare not march an army into Spain. Frenchmen may fight to build up a constitution, they will not fight to put one down. What can Ferdinand do? Where can he turn for succor? What are his means to purchase it? His colonies are torn away by revolution, never to re-unite. He has nothing left but Cuba, and Porto Rico, and Texas. New Spain is nothing, because Apodaca will be Emperor of Mexico, whenever time and chance will favor him. Cuba is the brightest gem upon the Crown; that comes to the hammer last. What has he left but Texas, which is available to purchase subsidies? Like other bankrupts, he must surrender his effects, and England must take Texas for a shilling in the pound. The purchase would give her commercial advantages and military strength. Would she value it for military purposes? He could state a fact which would serve him as an argument. No one, he said, had forgotten the affair of the Chesapeake; on that occasion the war whoop resounded through all parts of the Union; England heard it, and began to prepare for probable events.

An officer was sent to New Orleans, to make topographical reports of the country, and furnish plans of campaign against the city. That officer suggested three plans. 1st. By Lake Borgne, and the Mississippi. This was the assault in front, or direct line of attack. 2d. By Lake Borgne, Ponchartrain, Maurepas, and the Iberville river, descending by water upon New Orleans. This was the attack by the left and rear. 3d. By laying the base of the campaign in Texas, and crossing that province, descend the Red river and Mississippi, and strike the city. This was the line of assault by right and rear. In each plan the front was to be held in check by the co-operation of a fleet upon the Gulf. General Pakenham adopted the first plan, with what success need not be told; the world and history would long remember it. The second plan might have conducted him to victory; but the third was then, and ever will be, the best and most certain of success, because the lines of approach are so numerous that it is impossible to fortify against them; and, if the attack is made at the same season of low water, when supplies and reinforcements cannot descend the Ohio, Orleans would fall beyond a doubt—nothing but accident and mischance could save it. Let gentlemen look at a map of that country, and mark the plans referred to, and the facilities of each, and compare them with the physical means of resistance which the country furnishes. Let them combine the effects of positions on each other, their action and re-action. Let them, above all, remember that the best possible plan of campaign is that in which the invading army (without weakening itself by detachments) performs en masse the double operation of intercepting supplies and reinforcement, at the same time that it presses a siege, or makes an escalade, and they will have to admit that Orleans has most to fear from the province of Texas.

He said, he had no intention to deceive himself or to mislead others. He had no complaint to make against the Cabinet for having assented to the treaty. He was sure the President intended to do every thing he could in favor of that section of the Union, consistent with his general duties to the nation, and that it would give him peculiar pleasure to put the finishing touch to the great Mississippi question, in the management of which he had been so conspicuous from its origin to this day, and for which distinguished services he deserved all the applause which the nation had awarded him. Mr. T. knew well enough that members residing at different parts of the Union might have different views of the subject. It was his settled opinion that Texas was worth more than Florida, and he would express his sentiments with the frankness of a freeman. It was worth more for agricultural purposes; for military defence; for maritime protection; for a hostage of peace between us and Mexico. As a colony of England, we should find it a whip of scorpions. With it we surrender the control of the Comanches, the Lepans, the Tetans, and various tribes of Indians who inhabit its plains and mountains; the most powerful and warlike Indians on the continent—numbering from ten to twenty-five thousand warriors, of great muscular strength and vigorous constitutions—mounted upon the finest horses in our country—the Andalusian blood crossed with Arabian. These wild men are the unconquered descendants of Montezuma, inhabiting the Switzerland of New Spain; a determined, vigilant, and crafty race—fruitful in stratagem, skilful in arms and horsemanship, and fierce in battle. They are the Cossacks of America; the Spartans of modern times. Let no man despise the children of the Sun!

What if England should get the province, subside the natives, and establish a line of posts along our Southern border? Is experience lost upon us? Have we forgotten the rude lessons of last war? Here we are, contesting the point of honor about the Missouri expedition; listening to wise counsellors, who teach us the value of Northwestern posts; of holding checks upon the Indians in that quarter, and counterchecks upon the influence of British traders, and at the same time advise us to surrender Texas; a country of rich soil and mild climate, about one hundred leagues wide, and extending more than seven hundred miles along our Southern frontier; exposing us, thoughtlessly and carelessly, to the vexations and dangers of Indian warfare on that border, but carefully and promptly creating counterguards elsewhere. Here we protect you against the ruthless savage; there we expose you to his tender mercies. The contrast struck him with amazement. France had a cordon of posts around us while we were colonies; she had forts from Quebec up the Lakes, and down the Ohio and Mississippi to New Orleans. The effect was not forgotten. In the war of '56, she brought the Indians upon our frontier from Lake George to the swamps of Florida. The blood of our people was shed in copious streams; thousands of lives were sacrificed, and millions of money spent in repelling the barbarous invaders. England pursued the same policy during the Revolution, and again the savages laid waste our frontier from the Mohawk to the Oconee and St. Mary's, in Georgia.

We had barely recovered from this blow, when the Mississippi question struck us with consternation and dismay. He alluded, he said, to the famous proposition to surrender the transmontane country to Spain. We shall find it upon the secret journal; the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. PINCKNEY) had told us so from his place in this House, and he was a member of that Congress. We of the West were to have been pruned off from the Tree of Liberty; our soil rented to a foreign despot; leased for a term of years; ourselves threatened with the insolence of Spanish power, and the horrors of Spanish tyranny. Who would have been our Viceroy or Captain General? One of our own countrymen? No, sir, a foreigner, some royal parasite; a myrmidon of power; a bloody and merciless Morillo, with inquisition at his heels, to crush the spirit of independence or drive us from the country; our hardy, fearless woodsmen, after surmounting the perils of migration, and subduing the Spartans of the forest, must have bowed, silent and sullen, to the yoke of Spain, or paid the forfeit of resistance in lingering torments to glut the vengeance of unholy altars; and our heroic, enterprising females, after breasting the tomahawk, and scalping-knife of savage war, would have been spared, only to witness the horror-breasting scenes exhibited not long since in Valencia; the blood of maiden innocence, gushing from its naked limbs, and dripping from the torture and the rack. That thunderbolt went by; and now another comes. Our barriers are surrendered—bartered away. The equivalent is nothing; barriers have no equivalents; they are above its standard; they are the gift of God to nations; the shield and buckler of defence; the guards and counterchecks against invasion. The great Engineer of the Universe has fixed the natural limits of our country, and man cannot change them; that at least is above the treaty-making power. To that boundary we shall go; "peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must;" beyond it, all to us is worthless; we would not have it as a gift; not if Spain would give a dowry with it: that would lay the foundation of perpetual collisions; the other would exclude them so far as human wisdom can avert the danger. Boundaries fix the destiny of nations for peace or war. The primary law of all communities is self-defence, protection from assault, shelter from invasion, safeguards for commerce, and commercial depots. They who surrender barriers; betray themselves; it is high treason against posterity; the evil ends not with time present; it operates in perpetuity. Why sell the birthright of our country? Our ancestors left us a goodly heritage; let us preserve it unimpaired; we are responsible for the estate, and its abutments and defences; not to those who have passed away, and sleep with their fathers; no, sir, to ourselves; to this nation, the only free one on the globe; to a long line of succeeding generations; to the cause of freedom and humanity itself. Will you hazard a failure of this great political experiment, "in the full tide of its success?" Will you jeopardize the integrity of the nation by surrendering its safeguards, and thereby inviting foreign Powers to seize our emporiums, and smite us with disunion? No act of his should create even potential danger of that sort; his vote should be against such measures so long as he had a place in the councils of the Union. His solemn protest was against the treaty; it cedes without equivalents; takes private property for public purposes, and repays only a moiety; expatriates allodial citizens; surrenders the navigation of the Multnomah; girts us closely up with a line of posts; barbers away our coffee land; surrenders our natural boundary, our barriers against Mexico; exposes the emporium of western commerce, and violates all primary principles which govern the establishment of boundaries and limits.

MR. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, said that he regretted very much to see the course in which the gentlemen who had preceded him had thought proper to indulge themselves. A course which went in every way to depreciate Florida, and to give to Texas such exaggerated advantages as he believed no country ever possessed. He had never heard until lately that the acquisition of Florida was not eminently desirable to this country; not only on account of its positive advantages, but for the purpose of excluding from all ownership any foreign Power, whose neighborhood would always be unfriendly, and particularly for preventing its occupation by a Power which had a strong naval force. The complete natural boundary which its possession would give us, its fine ports, the command of the Gulf, (an advantage always in the recollection of those whose productions passed to market through the channel of the Mississippi,) had formed the reasons which induced the American people to desire it. Without having any particular information on the subject, which was not common to every gentleman, Mr. A. said that he had yielded to those reasons which seemed so obvious, and had partaken of the general anxiety. Public sentiment had decided on the importance of the acquisition, and the Executive department of the Government has been stimulated by a knowledge of the universal wish that Florida should belong to us. It may be safely affirmed that for many years the people have never looked to a settlement of our differences with Spain, without combining with that adjustment the acquisition of Florida. So strongly had it seized on the public mind that the original cause of our negotiation with Spain had become only an incident in public sentiment. This general anxiety was connected, too, with a belief that its purchase was essential to the complete suppression of the Indian hostilities, which had so long vexed our Southern citizens.

During the long and tedious negotiations which preceded the treaty of February, 1819, this general belief had been cherished and augmented. Nothing was said or published to divert the public attention, nor to show the people or the Government that they attached to the country an improper value. But it is now becoming the fashionable opinion that if the treaty is ratified, we shall have acquired nothing valuable; that Florida is a sand-bank; that it is, at any rate, what we can do very well without at present. All the value which we have heretofore attached to that country is now transferred to Texas; the climate of Texas, its soil, its relation to the Gulf, its fine port, its high maritime importance, have been spoken of in language of the highest praise. Mr. A. said that much of this may be true; the map showed to him the climate, and he had heard that there was much fine land. But the nature and accuracy of the information of the gentlemen, he presumed, depended upon authority very much like his own; he had seen very few people who had ever been there. And as it regarded the naval importance of the country and the fine port spoken of, he would observe that he considered the statements of the gentlemen wholly wrong. The general opinion, founded on the uncontradicted statements of our naval officers and others, was, that there is no port on the whole coast; and he could say that he had never heard of it, until it was mentioned yesterday by his friend, the Speaker. It had been frequently mentioned as a peculiarity and a commercial misfortune attending the coast of the Gulf, for a very great distance to the southward of the mouth of the Mississippi, that there was not even a tolerable harbor.

Mr. A. said he thought it peculiarly unfortunate that gentlemen should, under existing circumstances, when the acquisition had been made so far as the authorities of our Government extended, depreciate that which we had gotten, and for the payment of which our constituents might soon be called on to contribute, and should endeavor to enhance the value of that country which the same authorities had determined did not belong to us. He thought such a course might have a very unhappy effect on the public mind; and he deprecated very much every thing which would now tend to produce dissatisfaction towards a treaty which we had ourselves promoted and ratified.

On the subject of our power to interfere, in the way proposed, Mr. A. said he had no difficulty. He believed that it was competent to the House of Representatives, on any occasion in which they might constitutionally interfere, to bring to punishment the betrayers of the public trust, or which they might be ultimately called on to aid by an appropriation of money, to anticipate the case, and to avert the evil, which they foresaw was about to fall on the country. He believed that this House, on every great occasion, might so far embody and give expression to public sentiment, as to declare by resolution its opinion, for the purpose of averting a great national calamity which the treaty-making power or any other department was about to bring on the country. A right ultimately to prosecute the offenders seemed itself to give a power to avert the offence, by forewarning the agents. But, while he had no doubt of the right of the House to act in this case, in which, if the treaty were made, they would be called on to make the appropriations to fulfil it, he strenuously contended that no case had been made out to justify our interference. The utmost ingenuity of gentlemen had been exerted to ascertain whether the treaty were a good or a bad one. Where differences of opinion might exist as to its policy, it was essential that the treaty-making power should be uncontrolled; that the department which had the power to act should act on its own responsibility; that the exercise of this power should in no way be controlled, nor its responsibility shared by us. With these sentiments, he could have wished that the resolutions had not been introduced. If they had tended towards another purpose, to which an allusion had been made in the course of the debate, they should have had his cordial support. He would most cordially co-operate in any public measures which should go to establish between this country and the independent Governments of South America those relations which he believed the feelings of our citizens and the just claims of those Governments required—relations which he believed would soon exist with the approbation of every one.

There is another consideration which should make this House cautious in adopting the resolutions before us—cautious in abandoning the high ground we have obtained by our forbearance and magnanimity. The course of this protracted negotiation has gained to us much honor in the eyes of the world. Although we have failed as yet in getting a recompense for the wrongs done to us, we have acquired a character which was worth much more. We have shown to the world that we sought justice, not aggrandizement; we have shown that we could abstain from war, even when our adversary had given to us the amplest justification. We have defeated the malicious predictions of the politicians of Europe, who declared that we only sought an apology for seizing on Florida. The present state of the negotiation has just brought those Courts to the acknowledgment (a proud one for us) that we sought only peace and a fair settlement.

But, if we pass these resolutions, we suddenly relinquish this high ground, and assume the station of our adversary. For fourteen years we have been urgent, Spain reluctant; we have pressed, Spain has receded; but now, when there is an indication of peace, we suddenly change sides—Spain presses, and we recede. We thereby defeat all our declarations of anxiety for peace; we charge as unequal the terms which for several months have been regarded as the terms of peace, and which have been sanctioned by all the authorities of the Government. This course would present the American Government in a point of view wholly different from the one in which her conduct throughout the negotiation had placed her. It would manifest a variability of public counsel—an instability of decision—in no way calculated to maintain our character among foreign nations, or among our own citizens. Such a political fickleness would create at home and abroad a distrust of the permanence of all our public measures. It must be borne in mind, too, that this House has approved the treaty in the most solemn manner in which it can act—by the passage of a law. A bill was introduced and passed for the purpose of executing the treaty, in all those parts which were susceptible of immediate execution, and for establishing a provisional government in Florida. It has been said that this bill passed without discussion. This was true, only because there was no objection or dissent. The forms of our Government do not admit any further ratification than this treaty has received. It received the approbation of that department to which such duties are, in the first instance, assigned. The House of Representatives then originated and the Congress passed a law for carrying it into effect. He did not contend, for a moment, that the treaty was now binding on us—the King of Spain having failed to ratify it within the time prescribed. But, Mr. A. said, he could not consent so soon to contradict the formal declarations which we have made to the world, and now declare to our own citizens that we have ratified a treaty which was not only unequal, but unconstitutional. He would leave to the President and Senate the further negotiation of the subject; and, whether any recent circumstances had occurred, which would induce them to reject those terms of settlement to which they had lately assented, he would submit to them, and let rest on their responsibility the duty of making such an adjustment as our rights demanded.

Mr. A. saw nothing in the whole course of this transaction which called on us for our interference. He did not think that the circumstance of the President and Senate having made one treaty, which we did approve, gave any evidence that they would now make one which we did not.

He would now proceed to consider the resolution presented by the Speaker, in reference to its application, without attending closely to the phraseology. In its operation, it contained a denial of the right of the treaty-making power to declare the Sabine river as the western limit of Louisiana. Although, in form, the first member of the resolution purported to be a declaration that the President and Senate could not cede any of the territory of the United States, still its meaning is so far explained by the second resolution and the speech of the Speaker, that it was fair to consider it in its operation, and not in its abstract form. This view of the subject would save him from a most laborious discussion, which an examination of the question of ceding territory belonging to the United States would involve. Whether the power to acquire territory does include a power to cede? Whether territory be as much under the regulation of treaties as other property? Whether there be any limitation of the treaty-making power, in relation to territory, produced by any special exception in the Constitution; and, indeed, what are the limitations to this power? are, singly, questions of great magnitude; some of which will probably produce much unpleasant contention before they are finally settled. He was, however, happy to think that the present case required no such discussion. It was sufficient for him to show that the treaty, as concluded, was within the powers of the department which made it, without indulging in any speculations on the construction of the Constitution on other controverted points. His single aim, then, was to show that the President and Senate might safely declare, in a treaty of limits, that the disputed province of Texas was not included within the possessions of the United States, without at all assuming the power to cede any of the public territory.

To present the proposition, with distinctness, to the Committee, it may be stated that there are three situations, in one of which the province of Texas must be placed:

- 1st. It may belong to Spain certainly;
- 2d. Or to us;
- 3d. Or it may be disputed territory.

In the first mentioned state of the case, there could be no difficulty; there could be none in recognising that which previously existed. That supposition, then, will be no farther pursued. The second case, then, produces the difficulty, and is the only one on which the resolutions can be maintained. There is no pretence for sustaining the resolutions until it is first shown that Texas belongs to us; but no attempt has been made to prove it. The very ground on which the demand of gentlemen for our votes must be supported has not been touched. The debate has assumed, as a fact, that which the Spaniards have never conceded, and which, in fourteen years of negotiation, we have never been able to determine. It has assumed, as a fact, that which we may all believe, but which, inasmuch as there is no standard between nations to measure the respective rights of each, must be uncertain, so long as both parties assert their claims. Probably no American has ever read the long discussions on this subject, which have been conducted by the secretaries of the two countries; without an ardent wish to find proofs to sustain the claims of his country to the farthest boundaries contended for; and very few of us have ever read without finding that for which we all looked. But these reasons are of no avail, so long as there is no common tribunal to enforce them. Mr. A. said, then, that he should not go into the ultimate question of the right, which he considered utterly useless to him who held the negative of the proposition before the House, but should attempt to show that the country referred to was in the third class; or was disputed territory. And there is certainly nothing which falls more aptly within the power to form treaties than the settlement of the limits of disputed or undefined territory.

The history of the transaction shows, that the ownership of this province has never ceased to be a question. That there never has been a moment of time, since the original purchase of Louisiana, at which our claims were admitted by the other contracting party. There are three facts, which alone must assign this country to that class, in which he had placed it.

Spain has never agreed that it belonged to us.

We have never had possession.

The President of the United States approved the arrangements made by the American officers with the Spanish commandant, in 1806, by which the Spaniard was to retire with his forces beyond the Sabine; and neither party was to molest the other on their respective banks. This arrangement was made by the military officer for a temporary purpose, but was acquiesced in by Mr. Jefferson, as appears by his Message at the succeeding session, has never been violated, and has, to every purpose, been heretofore the western limit of our purchase. It would be difficult to devise any circumstances which would more certainly affix on this country the character of a "disputed territory;" there is no trait of such a character absent. After volumes have been written by the agents of the Governments, to maintain their respective rights, it would now indeed be extraordinary to declare that its ownership was not a subject of negotiation; for, if the final settlement is not within the power of the department which has acted on it, the previous negotiation has been idle.

We hold the deed of cession, which we declare, grants the country to us; while Spain holds the country and denies that the deed embraces it. When it is remembered, that between nations there is no common arbiter, by which the rights of each can be ascertained, our claims will, in the eyes of the world, be considered equal, unless, indeed, the possession of our adversary should create in his behalf a presumption against us. Our own convictions that the country is within Louisiana can have no effect; as there is no test by which it can be demonstrated. An American statesman may rise and declare, that "Texas belongs to us; I know it; I can prove it;" but it is a vain declaration;—of what avail can it be, when the Spaniard, standing on the land, says "it is mine: I hold it, and there is no judge between us?" It is a matter not susceptible of demonstration; and there is no tribunal to which either is bound to submit. The result certainly is, that the western limit of Louisiana has ever been so uncertain, that its adjustment is clearly within the power which has acted on it. It seems to have been admitted, that, where the extent of a purchase of territory was undefined, the President and Senate could, by treaty, define its boundaries. Nothing can be more plain, than that the same power which can acquire territory, can define the extent of the acquisition; or, in other words, declare how much it did purchase.

There is nothing which can, under the distribution of powers in our Constitution, be more certainly assigned to the President and Senate, than the settlement of disputed boundaries. Probably, there is no single subject on which so many treaties have been made. None which is more peculiarly the attribute of the department to which belongs the peace-making power. From the very great extent of our territory, and the undefined state of its limits, on several sides, this power must be frequently called into exercise. Its frequent operation on the settlement of differences of this kind, must have been contemplated by the convention; and it could never have been intended, that, in a general grant of the power, it should be construed not to apply to cases, which had been invariably, in all countries, the subjects of its operation. In the short course of our history, treaties have been made, in which boundaries theretofore uncertain, have been fixed; and territory before uncertain as to its ownership, has been declared to belong to us, or, to the other contracting party, as it should fall on the one or the other side of the designated line.

It has been contended, although the Senate might Constitutionally declare the boundaries of a territory till then uncertain, that in the present case there was a cession of territory. A little examination of the subject will show that this treaty was, like all others, made for the purpose of settling limits.

The usual mode of settling disputed boundaries, is by appointing, in the treaty, commissioners for the purpose of ascertaining and settling the lines left uncertain in some previous treaty; this was the mode prescribed by the Treaty of Ghent. But it is perfectly plain that the two contracting parties might, without the intervention of commissioners, have declared what were the limits of the territory. The substitution of commissioners is used as a matter of convenience only. In the present case, they might have been appointed to ascertain what were the true boundaries of Louisiana; but it is equally certain, that the parties may themselves decide and declare the limits. If these agents had been appointed, and had agreed upon the same line which the late treaty contemplates, there would then have been no doubt of the power of the Senate to ratify the decision. Can there be any more doubt of the power of the Senate to declare that the Sabine is the true line, without any reference to commissioners? Whenever a country is granted by name, as was the case in the instance of Louisiana, if there be any misunderstanding as to its extent, the exercise of the power of defining limits is indispensable. Are the President and Senate to be restrained from declaring that our claim does not extend to a certain part of the territory, because others may think that it does? By whose opinion shall we abide? Shall we submit to his judgment who says that we own the land to the Colorado, and cannot give it up? or to his, who only claims to the Trinity, and admits that there is no harm in declaring that the balance belongs to Spain? Mr. Chairman, there is but one safe guide. The power which acquired the country must declare the extent of the acquisition.

The language of the treaty has been referred to, for the purpose of showing that a cession of territory was in the contemplation of the negotiators. Mr. A. said, that he considered the treaty as he should consider any other written instrument, by its legal operation. He thought that the word "cede," was improperly used; but it was an impropriety only in phrase. The intention of the clause was, clearly, a designation of boundary only. If the result was within the Constitutional powers of the President and Senate, it would be unnecessary cavilling to censure the language in which the exercise of that power was expressed.

Mr. A. said that the Treaty of Ghent offered a very strong case in illustration of the idea which he had endeavored to present to the Committee in the course of his observations. The doctrine which prevailed in that negotiation, and which has been sanctioned by every department of our Government, establishes the position that territory, which has been in our possession, and formed a part of a State, may, by circumstances, so far become disputed territory, as to be placed under the control of the treaty-making power. Certain islands in the Bay of Passamaquoddy, which had been in our possession since the treaty of peace in 1783, and formed a part of the State of Massachusetts, were, by the fortune of the late war, thrown into the hands of the enemy. At the making of the treaty in 1814, the British Commissioners, in behalf of their Government, set up a claim to those islands, which they asserted had belonged to them during the whole time that we had possessed them. This claim, so stale, was still considered as of sufficient importance to form the subject of a separate stipulation, and commissioners were appointed "to decide upon the said claims, according to such evidence as should be laid before them on the part of His Britannic Majesty and the United States, respectively." Here, then, is a case in which territory, for more than thirty years in our possession, has become the subject of negotiation. No one can for a moment doubt, that our plenipotentiaries might, if they had considered themselves sufficiently acquainted with the subject, have declared where the line should be, or, in other words, to whom the islands did belong, without substituting commissioners to ascertain it. The slightest consideration will show, that, in every point of view, Texas has many more features of a disputed country than those islands had.

The late convention concluded at London in 1818, shows that on the subject of wild and undefined boundaries, even a liberal construction has been indulged, for the purposes of promoting tranquillity in the settlement of conflicting claims. In the treaty of peace of 1783, it was declared that the northwestern boundary of the United States should be a line drawn "from the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods, on a due west course, to the river Mississippi." In the late convention, that line is rejected, and it is agreed that a line from the same point on the Lake, along the 49th degree of north latitude, shall be the northern boundary of the United States, from the Lake of the Woods to the Stony Mountains. Under this regulation, it is very uncertain, on account of our imperfect knowledge of the country, whether we shall gain or lose by the change; but it is very certain, that the ancient limit is changed. In the case now under debate, we do not contend for a power to change the boundaries, but merely to declare what those boundaries are.

But do gentlemen see with clearness the consequence to which a doctrine would lead, which should deny to the President and Senate the power of determining by treaty, that Texas or any other controverted territory, to which we had a claim, but never had possession, did not belong to us? What tribunal would they propose, to settle the controversy? If they reject the one which we propose, there is no other test but the sword. The result would be, that, in every case of disputed lines, unless our neighbour would unconditionally relinquish to the full extent of our claims, our pretensions must be asserted by war; and that war could not be abandoned, however disastrous it might be, until we had completely succeeded. No treaty could be sooner made, because it would cede a part of our territory. And in the case of Texas, how long should we fight for it? Until the House of Representatives shall be of opinion that it does not belong to us? The very moment, in which you take from the Senate the power of determining the right to the property, you are on the ocean without a pilot. The opinion of each individual in the community is entitled to equal weight in this consideration. To the man who thinks that the country is ours, a treaty involving a relinquishment of it will be unconstitutional, while to him who is of a different opinion, it will be valid and without objection. The mischiefs of that construction, which must be to substitute the sword for the Senate, could not be obviated by the arbitration of any foreign or disinterested Power. This would be entirely inadmissible, as the President and Senate could not refer to others a decision on a point, which they themselves had no authority to decide.

Mr. A. said he wished it understood, that he applied his arguments only to a country situated like Texas; a country which was really in dispute, one to which we had a claim, but which we had never possessed.

Mr. RHEA observed, that two resolutions had

The Spanish Treaty.

H. OF R.

been submitted, and were under consideration, to wit:

“Resolved, That the Constitution of the United States vests in Congress the power to dispose of the territory belonging to them, and that no treaty purporting to alienate any portion thereof is valid, without the concurrence of Congress.”

This resolution seems to contain several propositions, viz: that the Constitution of the United States vests in Congress the power to dispose of the territory belonging to them; that no treaty purporting to alienate any portion thereof is valid without the concurrence of Congress; that a treaty purporting to alienate any portion thereof is valid with the concurrence of Congress. A treaty being a compact with some foreign Power, another proposition presents itself, viz., that the Constitution of the United States vests in Congress the power to alienate, by treaty, to any foreign Power, any portion of their territory.

It appears as if the first resolution endeavors to bottom itself on the second clause of the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution. That clause declares that “Congress shall have power ‘to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States or of any particular State.’”

It will be observed, that the word treaty is not used in this clause, in relation to the disposing of the territory belonging to the United States; and, inasmuch as territories are not disposed of or transferred by any power to a foreign Power, otherwise than by treaty, except in cases of conquest, it follows that the first part of that clause of the third section only empowers Congress to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations for surveying and dividing into such portions as shall have been judged proper for the disposition and sale, to the people of these United States, for cultivation and habitation, the territory of the United States, and for the government thereof, in territorial form, and no more. That clause of the Constitution cannot, by any forced interpretation, be so construed as to empower Congress to alienate, by treaty, to any foreign Power, any part or portion of the territory belonging to the United States; and this is evident by the last part of that clause, which declares, “and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States or of any particular State.” It is to be regretted that that sentence in the second clause of the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution has not been made a separate and distinct article; by having been made a separate and distinct article, it would have been more conspicuous; controlling and prohibiting every attempt to dispose of and make rules and regulations, under the pretension of being needful, respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States, to the prejudice of any claims of the United States; that is, of the people of the United States, or to the prejudice of any claims of any particular State; that is, of the people of any State, either generally or individually.

The power vested in Congress by that second clause of the third section, “to dispose of and ‘make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States,’” is, notwithstanding the generality of the terms expressing that power, restrained and limited, not only by the verb dispose, which signifies to divide, or to set apart separately, but also conclusively, by the last sentence in that clause, declaring, “and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States or of any particular State;” and therefore is of an internal and economical nature only, and not in any manner empowering Congress to alienate, by treaty, to any foreign Power, any portion of the territory belonging to the United States.

The first proposition in the first resolution may, in respect to the object of that resolution, be considered as relating to territory absolutely and definitely belonging to the United States, and this seems to be the principle assumed in the first resolution. If, then, it be correct that territory does absolutely and definitely belong to the United States, I do not admit, said Mr. R., that the Constitution of the United States vests in Congress power to alienate, by treaty, to any foreign Power, any portion of that territory.

To alienate, by treaty, to any foreign Power, territory absolutely and definitely belonging, pursuant to the Constitution, to any particular State of the United States, will prejudice the claims of that State, and is, therefore, prohibited by the second clause of the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution. To alienate, by treaty, to any foreign Power, territory absolutely and definitely belonging to the United States, will prejudice the claims of the United States, and is, therefore, prohibited by the second clause of the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution. Hence, it is concluded that the Constitution of the United States does not vest in Congress any power to alienate by treaty, to any foreign Power, territory absolutely and definitely belonging, pursuant to the Constitution, to any particular State of these United States; and that the Constitution of the United States does not vest in Congress any power to alienate, by treaty, to any foreign Power, territory absolutely and definitely belonging to the United States, or that has been, or may be incorporated into this Union. The Constitution of the United States does vest in Congress power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States in the District of Columbia; but the Constitution of the United States does not vest in Congress any power to alienate, by treaty, to any foreign Power, any part or portion of the territory or other property, belonging to the United States in the District of Columbia. The Constitution of the United States does vest in Congress the power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States in the State of Louisiana, and in the territories of Missouri, and Arkansas, and Michigan; but the Constitution does not vest in Congress any power to alienate, by treaty, to any foreign Power, any portion of the territory or other property belonging to the United States in the State of Louisiana, or in the territories of Missouri, Arkansas, or Michigan. All these are, with the other States of these United States, incorporated into this Union. If the Constitution of the United States vests in Congress the power to alienate, by treaty, to any foreign Power, territory belonging to the United States, the Constitution does then vest in Congress power to alienate, by treaty, to any foreign Power, the territories of Arkansas and Missouri, and the State of Louisiana, or any other State or territory of these United States, notwithstanding they all are incorporated into this Union. That the Constitution does vest in Congress that power, cannot be admitted; and if it be contended that the Constitution does vest in Congress that power, let it be manifested, if it can.

Believing that the Constitution of the United States does not vest in Congress power to alienate, by treaty, to any foreign Power, the territory, or any portion thereof, belonging to the United States, or that has been incorporated into this Union, I am, said Mr. R., prepared to vote on the first resolution.

Second resolution. "Resolved, That the equivalent proposed to be given by Spain to the United States, in the treaty concluded between them, on the 22d day of February, 1819, for that part of Louisiana lying west of the Sabine, was inadequate; and that it would be inexpedient to make a transfer thereof to any foreign Power, or to renew the aforesaid treaty."

In considering this resolution, a question presents itself, that is to say—what is the extent of the territory lying west of the Sabine, which, being part of Louisiana, does absolutely and definitively belong to the United States? Let the limits and boundaries of Louisiana, alienated and transferred to the United States by France, by the Treaty of Paris of April, 1803, be expressly and absolutely ascertained, determined, and defined, and then it will be to be manifested that the Constitution of the United States does vest in Congress power to alienate, by treaty, to any foreign Power, any portion of Louisiana, alienated by France to the United States, and determined and defined, absolutely and definitively, to belong to the United States. The Constitutional prohibition will then attach to Louisiana, so limited, defined, and determined to belong to the United States, and will prohibit Congress to alienate any portion thereof, by treaty, to any foreign Power. In that case, it will be more than inexpedient to alienate, by treaty, to any foreign Power, any portion of Louisiana belonging to the United States; it will be unconstitutional.

The territory alluded to, lying west of the Sabine, is presumed to be the province or territory of Texas. If, then, the province of Texas be a part of Louisiana, and does absolutely and definitively belong to the United States, in virtue of the Treaty of Paris, of April, 1803, the Constitution of the United States does not vest in Congress any power to alienate, by treaty, to any foreign Power, the territory or province of Texas, or any portion thereof. Spain has not ratified the late treaty within the time limited for that purpose. If, for that reason, that treaty be of no effect, the claim and right of the United States, whatever it was, by the Treaty of Paris, to the territory or province of Texas, remains as it was; and the claim and right of Spain, whatever it was, to the province or territory of Texas, remains as it was. There appear to be, if the late treaty with Spain be of no effect, two claims, one of the United States, the other of Spain, for the territory, that is, the territory or province of Texas lying west of the Sabine. How is this diversity of claim to be adjusted and determined? Will it be by an amicable adjustment of limits made by the parties interested; or will it be by war? In respect to obtaining the territory or province of Texas by war, it is not necessary to speak at this time, inasmuch as that subject is not now directly under consideration.

Equality or inequality of an equivalent is known when such party previously knows that which actually and absolutely does belong to him. They who made the late treaty between the United States and Spain, are presumed to have understood the claims of each party to the vast territory through which the line described in that treaty does run from a point in the ocean at the mouth of the Sabine, to the Pacific ocean, in latitude forty-two degrees north. That line is presumed to have been the result of an amicable settlement of the adverse claims of the parties in relation to boundary and limits of territory. By that settlement, the right of the United States to a very large extent of territory, including the mouth of the Columbia river, that the province of Louisiana is not said to have included, was acknowledged by Spain, and the boundaries and limits of the United States on the south and west were determined and defined, as provided for in that treaty.

Mr. R. observed that the Constitution of the United States does confide the treaty-making power to the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; that the safety, happiness, peace, and welfare, of these United States, require, that the boundaries and limits of all their territory, on every side, shall be determined and defined, to the end that hostility and war, by reason of contested and disputed territory, with any foreign Power, may be prevented. To the end, therefore, that limits and boundaries between the territory of the United States and the territory of Spain, in America, may be determined and defined, so that peace between the United States and Spain may be preserved, it is expedient that the treaty-making power of the United States do so act in respect to the said late treaty that the rights of the United States shall be retained, and peace with Spain be preserved. If all negotiation with Spain will fail, the Constitutional power of the United States, on being informed thereof, will direct the course to be pursued. If they to whom the Constitution had confided the treaty-making power will make a treaty, and that treaty shall be presented to the House of Representatives, during the time he had the honor of being a Representative, he trusted that he would be prepared to give a Constitutional vote thereon.

The great and wise men of the Convention in which General Washington presided, who formed the Constitution of these United States, do not appear to have contemplated any alienation of territory belonging to the United States to any foreign Power, by treaty or otherwise. They do not appear to have had any idea of vesting in Congress power to make an alienation of territory belonging to the United States to any foreign Power. They did not propose any Constitutional provision for such purpose to the several States. That Convention formed a Constitution for the government of an extensive and powerful confederacy of sovereign and independent States; and the people of these United States have, by adoption, made it their own. This Constitution provides that Congress may admit new States into this Union, and therefore contemplates an honorable extension of territory. This Constitution provides for the augmentation and enlargement of this nation, but not for the diminution of this nation, nor of the territory absolutely and definitively belonging to the United States. The whole extent of territory included within the defined boundaries and limits of the United States and their territories, and incorporated into this Union, or absolutely and definitively belonging to the United States, is the property and domain of the sovereign people of this Union—an indefeasible inheritance in allodial sovereignty to them and their posterity forever.

These opinions, said Mr. R., have, after mature and deliberate consideration of the Constitution of the United States, impressed themselves on my mind, and I believe them to be correct; and unless reason, stronger and more cogent than any heretofore known to me presents itself, I will continue to hold them; not only because I believe them to be correct, but because they do comport with the increasing greatness, the comprehensive extension, the dignity, and augmenting power of this nation.

Mr. BRUSH spoke at considerable length in opposition to the resolutions.

Mr. CLAY replied to those who had opposed the resolves moved by him.

Mr. RHEA rejoined.

After which the Committee rose.

Previously to the rising of the Committee, Mr. CLAY submitted the following resolves, with an intimation that, should the business of the House permit, he should call them up at a future day:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide by law a suitable outfit and salary for such Minister or Ministers as the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may send to any of the Governments of South America which have established and are maintaining their independence on Spain.

Resolved, That provision ought to be made for requesting of the President of the United States to cause to be presented to the General the most worthy and distinguished, in his opinion, in the service of any of the independent Governments of South America, the sword which was given by the Viceroy of Lima to Captain Biddle, of the Ontario, during his late cruise in the Pacific, and which is now in the office of the Department of State, with the expression of the wish of the Congress of the United States that it may be employed in the support and preservation of the liberties and independence of his country.

The House adjourned at 5 o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, April 5.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce, reported a bill to amend an act, entitled "An act enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. WOODBRIDGE, the Committee on the Public Lands were directed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for annexing the lands, of which the Indian title has been recently extinguished by the Treaty of Saguna, to the district of Detroit, in the Territory of Michigan, in order that the same may be brought into market.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of this House of the following titles, to wit: "An act making further appropriations of money for continuing the work upon the centre building of the Capitol, and other public buildings;" and "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1820," with amendments to each, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendments of the Senate to the civil appropriation bill, and the amendment to the bill making appropriations for continuing the public buildings, were read, and the first committed to the Committee of Ways and Means, and the latter to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. MORTON, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for an earlier commencement of the next session of Congress than the stated period, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

This motion was opposed by Mr. BALDWIN and supported by the mover, and the House divided on it—the majority in favor of it being about 20 votes.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the resolution submitted some days ago by Mr. SAWYER, for appointing a committee to inquire into the expediency of abolishing certain offices of the customs; and the same being so modified as to refer the inquiry to the Committee of Commerce, was agreed to.

REMISSION OF DUTIES.

The House then proceeded to the bill for the relief of certain persons who have paid duties on goods imported into Castine, and the amendments reported thereto by the Committee of Ways and Means were agreed to.

Mr. COCKE moved further to amend the bill, by adding the following proviso:

"Provided, also, That it shall appear that the duties paid by said claimants to the United States were not reimbursed on the sale of said merchandise."

This motion was negatived.

A motion was made by Mr. COCKE that the bill be postponed indefinitely; and the question thereon was decided in the negative—yeas 56, nays 94, as follows:

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time, as amended in this House, by the introduction of the names of the several claimants, and the addition of a proviso that, before the act takes effect for their benefit, they shall satisfy the Secretary of the Treasury that they were residents of Castine or Bucksport, or purchasers or consignees, from residents, of the goods on which duties have been imposed.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the amendments of the Senate to the annual Military Appropriation bill.

[There are two amendments: the first increasing the appropriation for clothing from three hundred thousand to four hundred and thirty thousand dollars; and the second increasing that for the Quartermaster General's department, from four hundred and fifty-thousand to five hundred thousand dollars.]

Mr. SMITH, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, moved to disagree to the first amendment, and assigned reasons to show why it was not necessary, on account of the quantity of clothing at present on hand.

Mr. STROTHER opposed the motion, on the ground that those charged with the responsibility for the due management of the Army, were the best judges of what was necessary for it; and, they having recommended the amount of appropriation proposed by the Senate, he was in favor of granting it.

The question on Mr. SMITH's motion was decided in the affirmative, and the first amendment was therefore disagreed to.

Mr. SMITH then, under the instructions of the Committee of Ways and Means, moved that the second amendment be disagreed to; declaring, at the same time, that he differed on this question from the committee, being of opinion that the amendment ought to be agreed to.

Mr. STORRS supported the motion, as well on the score of its expediency, as on the ground of resisting the interposition of the Senate in what he considered the peculiar province of this House in two points: first, as it regards the amount of appropriations to be made, and, secondly, as regards the object of this appropriation, being for military purposes. He declared, in the course of his remarks, that, on an appropriation bill for the support of the army, originating in the House of Representatives, on which the House had, after full discussion, deliberately refused an extraordinary appropriation for an object which they deemed it inexpedient to prosecute, they should be extremely tenacious of their opinion; and, as the immediate Representatives of the nation, maintain their control of the military forces of the nation, as to all extraordinary objects, by adhering scrupulously to the exercise of their prerogative, as a constituent branch of the Legislature, in determining the amount of public moneys which should be applied to the support of the Military Establishment.

Mr. LINCOLN delivered his sentiments at large against the prosecution of the Missouri expedition, which it was the object of the Senate, he presumed, to authorize by this appropriation. He considered it as calculated to provoke war, and ultimately to hasten the extermination of the Indian tribes.

Mr. ERVIN spoke in support of the expedition, on the ground of its own merit; on that of the sanction given to it by previous votes of this House; of its correspondence with the policy of this Government, in respect to Indian trade and intercourse; and of a due regard to our relations with foreign Powers.

Mr. COBB made a few remarks against the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. FISHER said, on the present occasion, he should have observed his usual course, that of listening and voting in silence, but for the circumstance of having changed his views on this subject since it was last before the House. He was then of opinion that the expedition ought to stop at the Council Bluffs. He thought now that the interest of the country required that it should proceed to the Mandan Villages. Mr. F. said that he would briefly state some of his reasons for the opinion which he now entertained. In speaking of the Yellow Stone Expedition, as it is called, the first inquiry that presents itself to the mind is—what is the object of this expedition? This question has been fully answered by the Secretary of War, in his letter of the 29th December, communicated to this House. He says: “The expedition is part of a system of measures which has for its objects the protection of our Northwestern frontier, and the greater extension of our fur trade.” These being the objects, said Mr. F., the next inquiry is, are these objects of sufficient importance to justify an expedition of this kind, and to this extent? He thought they were. As to the first object, no one would deny that it was the duty of the Government to afford protection to the frontier. The only question, then, that could arise on this part of the subject was, whether this is the best way to furnish that protection? He thought it would so appear in the course of the remarks he was about to make on the other object proposed—the extension of the Indian trade.

Sir, said Mr. F., the Indian trade is important to us in the same respects in which it has been valuable to the British Government. 1st. As a means of controlling the Indians. 2d. The profits of it. That the British Government set great value on this trade may be proven from many circumstances. It has always received her particular fostering care. Of such high importance did she esteem it, as to make it the subject of serious negotiations in her treaties. In the treaty of 1794, called Jay’s Treaty, among other advantages surrendered to Great Britain as equivalents for advantages gained, was the right of trading with the Indians within the limits of our territory.* This right, thus acquired, she took care to exercise to the greatest extent, even to the present time, though the right itself expired with the commencement of hostilities in 1812. It has always been a leading feature in the Canadian policy to encourage this trade with the Indians, and maintain an influence over them. Hence talks were periodically held, and presents annually distributed among the Indians.† Presents were sometimes, too, received from the Indians. Mr. F. remembered reading an account of a very rare present, some years ago, from the chief of one of our Northern tribes to the royal Governor of Canada. It consisted of eighty or one hundred human scalps, nicely dried and hooped, torn from the heads of men, women, and children, in the war in which Harmer and St. Clair were defeated. Sir, the Indians have been induced every year to visit Malden and other posts in Canada. From these places they always return laden with presents, and with their minds poisoned against our people. In the year 1815, we are told, that between three and four thousand of them, from our Northern tribes, visited Malden and Drummond’s Island alone; and, at these two places, upwards of ninety-five thousand dollars, in presents, were distributed among them. Not a year has passed since 1794 but presents have been given to these savages greater in amount than the sum asked for the prosecution of this expedition, and this course of policy has given to the British Government complete control over the numerous tribes of warlike savages that swarm in our Northern forests. How this influence has been exercised the bloody pages of our history will tell. Sir, every Indian war that has harassed our frontiers, from the Revolution down to the present time, was brought upon us by this influence. Who, that is at all conversant with British history but remembers even the debates in Parliament upon the policy of employing the Indians against us, when a few with souls above the rest, in strains of indignant eloquence, denounced the practice as cruel, inhuman, and diabolical.* Sir, was it not said to be the same kind of influence that brought on the war which was terminated by General Wayne? Was it not the like influence that turned the savages loose upon our defenceless frontiers in 1811? Is it not known that, at the battle of Tippecanoe were found, in the hands of the Indians, English rifles, English tomahawks, and scalping-knives? And ammunition was supplied from the same source. All this took place before hostilities commenced with Great Britain in 1812.

This, said Mr. F, is not all. This same influence brought on the Creek war in the South;‡ the first spark of that war was kindled by the breath of the prophet from the North; the first blood spilt was by the hands of a few stragglers, returning from the North, where they had caught the spirit of hostility. If we go back, even beyond the Revolution, we will find that the same kind of influence, though in different hands, always moved the Indians in their wars against us. The war in which Braddock fell, and Washington rose—the war in which Putnam suffered, were produced by the same means. Now, sir, count the expenses of these wars; estimate the cost of the last one we had, and it will exceed by twenty-fold the cost of the expeditions in question. And, sir, will you make no effort to destroy an influence so prolific in wars, in bloodshed, and destruction? Justice demands it; humanity calls for it; and true economy dictates it. Sir, it is a matter of no surprise that the British Government should strive to retain this influence; it has been of too much consequence to them to let it pass out of their hands without a struggle. Hence the stand that was made at Ghent upon this subject. In that negotiation, they asked not merely for a renewal of the right to trade with the Indians in the manner formerly acquired by Jay's Treaty. No; that would have left the power of future control in our hands; but, by fixing a boundary between us and the Indians, their influence over the savages would have been complete in their hands; and we know how it has been exercised. But, sir, the scheme at Ghent failed; the Indian trade within our limits was lost to the British; and, sir, the object of this expedition is to destroy their influence too, and thereby afford the best protection to our frontiers. The necessity of this measure was seen and felt during the last war, by the Government, and by our suffering settlements. The Fourteenth Congress saw it, and acted upon it; they passed an act, 29th April, 1816, regulating the trade with the Indians, by the last section of which the President was authorized to use the military forces of the nation to execute the law. This law contains the policy of this expedition—it is a wise policy, and, I hope, will prove a successful one.

* The right of trade with the Indians was first guaranteed to each other by the English and French, in the Treaty of Utrecht, as early as the year 1713. The Northwest Company was established in the year 1793.

† Mackenzie says: “St. Joseph’s Island is a place of no trade, and the Indians visit there only to receive the presents which Government allows them. That the Americans pay very little attention to the Indians; but that the British commanders, in the name of their father, distribute presents among them.

* The Earl of Chatham, in 1777, speaking of the Ministers, said, “They have let the savages of America loose upon their innocent unoffending brethren; loose upon the weak, the aged, and defenceless; on old men, women, and children; on the very babes upon the breast, to be cut, mangled, sacrificed, broiled, roasted; nay, to be literally eat. These, my lord, are the allies Great Britain now has!”

But gentlemen may ask, how is it to be executed? Sir, by driving out the British traders, now scattered over the territory within our limits, and keeping them out by a chain of posts. Their most valuable trade is within our line; the richest and rarest furs on this continent, it is said, are produced and taken on the head waters of the Missouri. This is confirmed by Lewis and Clarke. Several of the trading establishments of the Hudson Bay Company are south of the 49th parallel of latitude. Drive out these traders, and turn the trade into our own hands. This will at once give us the control of the Indians; for whoever has their trade holds the cord that binds them. Trade is every thing to them. "Withhold their trade," said Colonel Atkinson, in his letter to the Secretary of War, "and you bring them to any terms. Afford it, and you make them do any thing." But, gentlemen may say, trade is a civil pursuit; why use the military? Sir, not only to be able to drive out the persons just alluded to, but also to make a display of our power to the savages. It cannot be denied but the policy of the British has been to make the Indians believe that they are the great Power, and that we are a poor and feeble set of people. In this these tribes should be undeceived. We should show them that we too have forts, soldiers, and big guns: then they will fear us and respect us. Again, the military is necessary to expel another class of traders; a vagabond and abandoned set of men, from Canada and the United States, called private traders.

It is the conduct of these wretches that impresses the Indians with mistaken ideas of our people: they abuse each other, cheat the Indians, and foment quarrels. This class of men are well described in a very sensible letter from Major Thomas Biddle to Colonel Atkinson, (from which Mr.

F. read several extracts.) These wretches must be driven out from among the Indians, and the trade confined to honest and fair dealers. There are still other important objects that may be accomplished by these expeditions up the Missouri and Mississippi rivers. Some of them are stated in the report of the Secretary of War on the subject. The opposers of this expedition have laughed at these, as wild and chimerical. For his part, Mr. F. said, he saw nothing in them impracticable.

Sir, it is in this way you are to protect your frontiers, by annihilating the very causes that hitherto produced the Indian wars; and if by accident an Indian war does come upon us, they will not be able to injure us as much as formerly; for where will they get supplies of arms and ammunition? Their trade with Canada is cut off, and we will hardly furnish them with instruments of destruction to wield against ourselves.

Sir, a few words as to the value of this trade: that it is very valuable we all know, but the amount of its profits is hidden from us. It is valuable to the British, as furnishing rich materials for their manufactures, and as affording an article of commerce in their Eastern trade. It will be valuable to us in the same way. By furnishing materials for our manufactures, it will be the best protection they could ask; and such of the peltry as is not used in our own country, will supply the place of specie in the China trade. We hear complaints from every quarter that the China trade drains the country of specie, and it will continue to do so unless we can find a substitute for Spanish milled dollars; and, sir, here is a substitute—to the amount of this article supplied in that trade, that amount in specie will you retain at home.

Sir, there are still other advantages to flow to from these expeditions. Science will receive new lights; new resources of our country may be discovered, and every department of natural history may be enlarged. To the friends of Indian civilization it opens the way for the execution of their humane plans. The Indians will be brought in contact, as it were, with us, and from the intercourse that follows they will learn some of the habits and arts of civilization.

These remarks, said Mr. F., regard only the policy and expediency of this expedition, and the advantages to flow from it. Much fault has been found of the manner in which it has been conducted: corruption and favoritism have been alleged. If it is so, I will only say, let gentlemen bring the actors to light; expose and punish them; but let them not urge these as objections to the measure. If the measure is right in itself, errors in its execution cannot make it wrong. Correct the errors, and let it proceed.

Mr. Cocke next spoke, at considerable length, against the further prosecution of the expedition. He denied the advantages calculated to result from its further progress. He condemned, also, the manner in which the expedition had been prosecuted; contending that, if necessary at all, it ought to have been by the way of the Lakes, at the head of which was the seat of that foreign influence among the Indians, which it was the princial alleged object of this expedition to counter-act, &c.

Mr. BROWN replied to some of the remarks of Mr. STORRS. If it had been intended that this House alone decide on questions relating to appropriations, the Constitution would have so provided. But it does not; and he, therefore, not considering that objection which appealed to the pride of opinion of this House as of any weight, proceeded to show why, in his opinion, it was wise to extend this expedition further, &c. He considered the concurrence of the views of the Senate with those of the Executive in support of this measure as an argument in its favor, rather than against it.

Mr. WARFIELD next addressed the House. He considered the measure unnecessary, and "in hostility to the best interests of the country. He disclaimed any intention indiscriminately to oppose the measures proposed by any Department of the Government, intimating that he should, on every such question, judge and act for himself. But he proceeded to show, by a variety of arguments, why he thought that the advantages which had been anticipated from this expedition would not be realized; and why, therefore, he could not vote in favor of it. He was of opinion, also, that, were the ultimate object of the expedition reached, by its arrival at the Mandan Villages, the whole force would be in imminent danger of being entirely cut off by the Indians, &c.

The question was then taken on disagreeing to the amendment, and decided in the affirmative.

The Committee of the Whole then rose. The House concurred in the disagreement to the first amendment without a division.

The question on concurring in the disagreement to the second amendment, (that which includes a supposed appropriation for the further prosecution of the Missouri expedition,) was decided by yeas and nays, (which were required by Mr. SIMKINS.) The result was—for concurring in the disagreement, 90; against such concurrence, 68, as follows:

So both the amendments of the Senate were disagreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, moved that the House proceed to the consideration of the amendment proposed by the Senate to the Constitution of the United States, respecting an uniform mode of election of electors and representatives, &c.

The House refused to take it up, and then adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 6.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1820," made a report thereon; which was read, and, together with the said amendments, committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

Mr. SMITH, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of John Steele; which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole last appointed.

Mr. BEECHER moved that the House do now proceed to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. BRUSH on the 23d February last, in relation to the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio; and the question being taken thereon, it was decided in the negative.

The resolution from the Senate, fixing a day for the adjournment of Congress (the 24th instant) was taken up.

Mr. GROSS, of New York, moved to refer it to the committee yesterday appointed to inquire into the expediency of fixing on an earlier than the Constitutional day for the meeting of Congress.

Mr. TAYLOR then moved to postpone the further consideration of the resolution to Monday the 17th instant.

After some debate, this motion was decided in the negative—yeas 77, nays 73.

Mr. GROSS's motion was then agreed to.

Mr. BARBOUR submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table for one day:

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of this House, to wit: "No petition shall be received at the first session of any Congress, except within the first ninety days thereof; nor at the second, or any subsequent session, except within the first sixty days thereof."

APRIL, 1820.

Mr. COBB moved that the House do now proceed to consider the resolution submitted by him at the present session, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in relation to appointments to office. The motion was determined in the negative.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports of the Chief Engineer, of the Colonel of Ordnance, and of the Second and Third Auditors, with sundry accompanying documents, which contain the information in relation to contracts which have been made for the building or repairing of fortifications, arsenals, and magazines, since the year 1815, as required by the resolution of this House on the 1st instant; which letter and reports were ordered to lie on the table.

LOAN OF PUBLIC MUNITIONS.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, who were instructed, on the 14th ultimo, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, measures are necessary to be taken for the greater security of debts due to the United States, in consequence of certain loans of powder, lead, and other munitions belonging to the Government, having been made to private citizens, by any officer of the United States, made a report thereon; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House. The report is as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a resolution, of the 14th of March, directing them to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, measures are necessary to be taken for the greater security of debts due the United States in consequence of certain loans of powder, lead, and other munitions, belonging to Government, having been made to private citizens by any officer of the United States, report, That they have had the said resolution under consideration, and have examined the several cases to which it is supposed more particularly to refer, as they have been communicated to the House by the Secretary of War. The liability of those who have been concerned in these loans is already determined by the contracts and by the existing laws; and the committee believe that it could not now be increased by any act of legislation. How far it might be proper, by any expression of opinion or otherwise, to endeavor to restrain the practice for the future, it is not referred to the committee to consider. If, however, any provision on this part of the subject be deemed expedient, the committee would respectfully suggest that it belongs more properly to the Committee on Military Affairs, who have the best means of judging what the public service may in such cases require.

The remedies already provided by law for the recovery of the debts growing out of the loans appear to the committee to be sufficient for the purpose, and the application of them, depending, of course, upon a variety of circumstances unknown to the committee, is for the Executive department of the Government. They therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the Senate's amendments to the bill making appropriations for the support of Government; and some discussion took place on them.

The Committee reported to the House their agreement to some amendments, and disagreement to others.

The House concurred in disagreeing to two of the amendments: that which increases the salary of the Attorney General's clerk from 800 to $1000, and that which proposes an appropriation of $15,000 to pay certain balances due to old collectors of the internal revenue.

The amendment which appropriates the sum of $15,000 to indemnify John Steele, Collector of the port of Philadelphia, against a judgment obtained against him for a certain seizure made in the execution of his public duties, was stricken out, on recommendation of the Committee of Ways and Means, to the end that it might be included in a separate bill; the committee being of opinion, as stated by the chairman, (Mr. SMITH, of Maryland,) that such claims should be provided for by separate bills, and no longer be included in the general appropriation bills, as heretofore the practice.

The other amendments of the Senate were agreed to.

The bill reported this morning, by the Committee of Ways and Means, for the relief of John Steele, having passed in Committee of the Whole, was also reported to the House. The question was then stated on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. BALDWIN moved to lay the bill on the table, on the ground that he was not able to see why bills for the relief of collectors should be allowed to pass as matter of course, when the claims of other citizens experienced a fate so entirely different. He was desirous to place all claims on the same footing as to the mode of proceeding on them.

On the question to lay the bill on the table, the House was so divided, that the Speaker's vote would have turned the scale. He was opposed to laying the bill on the table, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

The Senate's amendment to the bill making appropriations for the public buildings, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was concurred in by the House. [This amendment appropriates $2,400 for making alteration in the Senate Chamber.]

MAUSOLEUM TO GEN. WASHINGTON.

Mr. EWING, of South Carolina, submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of said States be requested to take measures to obtain from the honorable Bushrod Washington the body of the late General George Washington; and, if obtained, that he cause to be erected over it, in the Capitol square, east of the Capitol, a suitable mausoleum, with inscriptions emblematical of the principal events of his military and political life.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to give the sum of — dollars for the best plan of a mausoleum; which plan of a mausoleum, and the inscriptions thereon, shall be approved by the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Chief Justice, the Secretaries of the different Departments, and the Attorney General, or a majority of them.

Be it further resolved, That the President do cause to be procured an equestrian statue of bronze of General George Washington, to be executed by some eminent artist, which shall be placed on the top of the said mausoleum, in the centre building of the Capitol, or in any other place within the public square, which, by a majority of the persons in the preceding resolution referred to, shall be deemed most suitable.

And be it further resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to make the necessary appropriations of money to carry into execution the objects contemplated in the preceding resolutions.

Mr. ERVIN addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I consider it among the fortunate incidents of my life that I have the honor of a seat in the great council of my country, and enjoy an opportunity to vote for a statue and monument to General George Washington, late President of the United States; not, sir, in the hope to confer honor, or to perpetuate the fame of this great man, but to join in manifesting to the world and the latest posterity our admiration and gratitude for his eminent virtues and most distinguished services.

It is not my intention; nay, it is unnecessary to repeat any considerable portion of his history to this enlightened assembly—it lives in our memories, it dwells upon our tongues: or his virtues, for they are embalmed in the bosom of our affections. To their narration I can impart no new ornament; for, in their praise, eloquence has poured forth all her eulogiums, and even panegyric itself has been exhausted.

Nor is it, sir, for the purpose of mere idle declamation that I hope to claim the attention of this honorable body to the resolutions which I have done myself the honor to present. Considerations more momentous have influenced me. The storm has not yet wholly subsided which lately threatened, not only the peace and tranquillity, but the union of these States. To the motives of common security and common interest which have so happily and gloriously united us, I wish, if possible, to add those of sentiment and kindred sympathy; and I know of nothing more calculated to beget the one or awaken the other, than to entomb the father of our country in a mausoleum, with inscriptions emblematical of the great events of his political and military life, erected at the national expense.

Cold, indeed, will be that heart which could ever approach it, without experiencing mingled emotions of veneration and respect. The wise, good, and oppressed from every clime, will come and survey, with wonder and delight, the gratitude of the American people to him "who was first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

At its pedestal the ambitious will learn the vast difference between promoting the glory and happiness of millions of freemen, and that of mere personal aggrandizement. Whilst statues, monuments, and the applause of unborn millions, will be the soul-ennobling reward of virtuous ambition in the one case, they will behold the other sitting upon the ruins of Carthage, more emblematical of fallen greatness than the very ruins which surrounded it. They will follow it in its flight from the bloody plains of Pharsalia, and behold it naked, lifeless, friendless, and inurned on Egypt's sultry shore; they will see it for a few splendid years awing the world—then behold it stript of imperial power and splendor, cut off from all the endearing sympathies of our nature, our consolation in misfortune, and exiled to a rock in the great Pacific ocean.

Here, sir, when we who are now guiding the destinies of our country will be silent in the dust, our children from the North and the South, from the East and the West, will meet in mournful silence; the great events of the Revolution will pass in solemn review before them; the disasters of defeat, and the triumphs of victory. They will behold the man whose cause I now advocate, guiding the storm and directing the energies of an injured people, determined to be free. They will remember the joint exertions, the kindred blood which flowed to purchase our freedom, and will kneel around it, and with full hearts swear to transmit the rich inheritance unimpaired to their latest posterity.

All the enlightened nations of antiquity considered it a duty not only to commemorate the virtuous deeds, but to perpetuate to their posterity the very form and appearance of their illustrious dead. To this end all their literature and arts were equally subservient. On the one hand, whilst history recorded, and eloquence rendered immortal, their virtues and warlike achievements; on the other hand, the marble, decorated with the ornaments of drapery, seemed to breathe under the chisel of the artist, and an artificial form on canvass was almost penciled into life—dividing empire with the grave, and handing down to posterity the venerable image of the benefactors of their country. Hence the incentive to great actions; hence that undaunted courage which made them superior to the dangers of the field; and hence that noble emulation which stimulated them to aspire after generous fame and everlasting renown, when they knew, and acted under the influence of that knowledge, that they would survive the decay of nature, and be seen and venerated in other times.

Do we fear the amount of the expenditure? Quadruple the sum expended whilst debating the Missouri question, will cover the amount necessary. But, admitting it should be more, will my country promise, and promise, and never perform? On the 17th of August, 1783, in the moment of triumph, when the services of WASHINGTON called forth universal expressions of grateful feeling, the Continental Congress unanimously voted him an equestrian bronze statue; but, notwithstanding his virtues and great achievements, he had the mortification to outlive the gratitude of his country, for it has never been procured.

In 1799, after having done all the good in his power, and he was summoned to join the general congress of virtue above, remember the pledge that was given to this mighty people, who were then in tears. Your chair, sir, was shrouded in black; the then Congress, in a body, waited on the President of the United States, in condolence for the national loss. They requested of his illustrious, disconsolate consort, the body of the Father of our Country, which was assented to; and in May of the subsequent year a bill was introduced into this House to erect over it a mausoleum. And what, let me ask, has been done? Other revolutionary claims have been adjusted; but this great national debt of gratitude yet remains to be paid. The eyes of the world are upon us. The affection of the American people demands it; and will you not gratify them? Will you justify the imputation of the charge of ingratitude, which history informs us is the vice of Republics? Will you, in moments of joy or sorrow, when the soul is animated or melted with the noble, generous feelings of the heart, decree statues and monuments, and, when those feelings have subsided, suffer yourselves to be governed by motives of a character less meritorious?

If you should be thus unfortunately influenced, authorize a national subscription, proclaim to the patriotism of the American people, that money is wanting to procure a statue and erect a monument to WASHINGTON: Riches would pour forth her treasures, and the poor Revolutionary soldier, whose heart has been often cheered with his voice, whilst fighting the battles of his country, will perform his last pilgrimage, and give all he has to give, his tears.

But, sir, I know I may be told, that apprehensions are entertained for fear of the danger of the precedent: that others less meritorious may wish the like distinction. My regret is, sir, that the annals of mankind have not as yet, and I much fear will never produce such another subject of commemoration. But if, in the course of human events, our country should be invaded, and liberty driven to her last entrenchments, some mighty genius should arise, whose victorious arm should beat back the invading foe—sweep them off with the besom of destruction, and redeem the sinking destinies of my country, I would commemorate his exploits by every expression of national gratitude, and erect to his memory a monument more durable than the pyramids of the Nile. All these glorious exploits, and more, have been performed by this illustrious man; and if ever man deserved the distinguished evidence of a nation's love, it is WASHINGTON. So eminent have been his services, that he has been, and will be throughout every age, the theme of universal panegyric.

The liberties of other countries have been acquired by the united exertions of numbers; but whilst I justly admire and duly appreciate the talents, the firmness, and integrity of other illustrious patriots of the Revolution, I appeal to history to say, whether the liberty of this country was not acquired as much by his skill and prudence, as by the force of numbers. At the commencement and during the Revolutionary war, remember the difficulties he had to encounter; at the head of militiamen, undisciplined, and without any motives for union but those of common danger, he dared to oppose a Power whose veterans had recently conquered in every clime, and whose flag waved in proud triumph round the world. Hannibal like, he soon converted the licentiousness of freemen into the orderly discipline of the soldier, and by superior military skill, drove his arrogant confident foe from his encampment in Boston. On the 15th of November, 1776, two thousand seven hundred of his soldiers were captured at Fort Washington. The 1st of December of the same year, their term of service having expired, twelve thousand more claimed their discharge, and left him with less than three thousand effective men; with this remnant, in the dead of Winter, and in the face of a vastly superior force, he kept the field, and convinced his foe that although his physical numbers were diminished, his moral force was the same, and that he might destroy, but could never conquer freemen.

At this awful moment, the stoutest hearts were appalled; not only the poor and humble, but the rich and influential, gave up all as lost, and numbers claimed the protection of a powerful enemy. Yes, sir, he was forsaken, and when counselled to make his own peace, he indignantly repelled the advice, and declared that he would carry the war into the upper part of his native State, and if driven from thence, he would raise the standard of liberty beyond the mountains. Oh! my country, he was our father—he was our friend. In the most gloomy moments of our Revolution, when all our prospects were darkened—when hope herself was sinking in despair, his great mind never faltered. No matter what disaster befell you, no matter what misfortune awaited you, he was faithful: he rose superior to the one, and prepared with manly fortitude to encounter the other; and after enduring trials the most afflicting, and encountering dangers the most appalling, he succeeded in establishing the liberties of his country, by triumphing over the hero who was nursed in arms on the plains where Wolfe, Montcalm, and Montgomery fell.

At the close of the American Revolution, he exhibited to the world a spectacle to which history furnishes no parallel. His country was exhausted; without union, without money, and without credit; flushed with victory, and a gallant army at command, like other conquerors he, too, might have taken advantage of the times, triumphed over the rights of the people, and ascended to empire. But, ambition stop thy mad career, and copy the glorious example. Instead of fomenting, he appeased and suppressed the discontent of an enraged soldiery; and after having led them from victory to victory, and dispelled the horrors of a bloody and protracted war, and there was nothing else to conquer but himself or the liberties of his country, he stripped victory of her chains, embraced for the last time his officers, the companions of his glory, and with tears in his eyes bid his soldiers an everlasting farewell; then repaired to the Hall of Congress, and resigned back to the representatives of the people that power which he had used only to redeem them and their countrymen from misery, from slavery, and from death.

Mausoleum to General Washington.

H. of R.

What American, within the hearing of my voice, whose heart does not melt with gratitude at the name of WASHINGTON! What language so barbarous as does not speak his name! What nation so distant as does not resound with his praise! Eminent without magnificence; superior without vanity; and elevated without pride, he was the admiration of an astonished world. Faithful to his friends, generous to his companions, and a philanthropist to the very being of man, he lived loved by the good, caressed by the great, and feared and respected by his very enemies. Firm and inflexible in the pursuit of justice and truth, he scorned equally simulation and detraction.

Greece may tell of her legislators; Rome may tell of her heroes, but what age or country can boast a WASHINGTON—a man so renowned both in peace and war? Leonidas was patriotic; Aristides just; Hannibal was patient; Fabius prudent; Scipio was continent; Cæsar merciful; Marcellus courageous, and Cato of inflexible integrity: yet, these virtues which separately distinguished those mighty men of antiquity, were all united in the character of this singular great man, and raised him above the level of mankind; he was so pre-eminent that envy never dared to raise its malignant glance to the elevation of his virtues. Other heroes are renowned for subjugating—he for liberating his country. Kings and Princes derive honor from crowns and from sceptres—he, less from the splendor of station than the dignity of his own mind. Cæsar and Pompey, on the plains of Pharsalia, competed for the mastery of the world—here, amidst contemporaries capable of saving and ennobling empires, ran his splendid career without a rival or competitor. To crown all his other great qualities, and, if possible, to consecrate human greatness, he was a christian—not only the favorite of the earth, but we humbly hope of Heaven.

Whilst the conduct of other great men in public life tend to ennoble the hero and render illustrious the statesman, in private it is cursed with every vice which degrade the man. In public life, WASHINGTON'S conduct was unrivalled; and, in private, there was not one circumstance of his whole life which virtue would blush to own. As, in the meridian of life, religion gave dignity to every action, so in the evening of his days, when the troubles and perils of life were past, it beamed resplendent, like the rainbow on the skirts of the storm that is gone, the blessed harbinger of eternal sunshine in the realms of everlasting day.

But, Mr. Speaker, to estimate still more correctly the character of this great man, let us pause for a moment, and take a cursory view of the present unhappy situation of other countries and people, compared with our own. Look through the extensive continents of Africa and Asia, and there is not the least vestige of learning* or liberty to be found, however industrious the research. Egypt, the cradle of letters, is now the abode of ignorance and fanaticism. The descendants of Ham are sold into every clime, and those that remain wither under the despotism of chieftains, who consign them to destruction with as little remorse as the rude storms of the desert which ravage their native clime.

Assyria, once the proud mistress of Asia, has long since been blotted from the face of empire. Bablyon, with her wall which proudly defied the Persian, has mingled with the dust, and the lonely traveller weeps over the ruins of Palmyra with scarcely a page to tell its name.

Where are now the sons of Abraham, once the favorites of Heaven? They are banished from the land of promise, and, as was prophesied, are "sifted among the nations of the earth."

Look into humbled Europe, and lo! there is not one azure spot to cheer the gloom of the political horizon. The Ottoman slave treads, insensible, the glorious field of Marathon, and despotism sways her iron sceptre at the very Strait of Thermopylæ. Persecuted liberty has fled from England, the country of Hampden and Sydney, and, although the workshop of the world, she is cursed with a debt which no industry can redeem. Poland, martyred Poland, with sixteen millions of people, forms one of the outposts to the empire of the descendant of Magog! Italy, the home of the Cæsars, and the grave of the heroes of antiquity, cringes under the domination of timid Austria. Whilst France, generous, gallant France, plundered and exhausted, weeps over the recollection of the splendor of days that are past.

Then turn your attention to this happy country, "the land of Washington and sky of Franklin;" the home of the homeless; the last refuge of oppressed humanity. Here agriculture flourishes; our commerce whitens the ocean, and every wind that blows wafts into our ports the riches of every clime. Here we find an empire of laws which guards our rights, both civil and religious, and which knows no distinction but such as merit confers and virtue approves. Where the poor man, in the tattered garb of plebeian humility, sits enthroned upon the altar of justice, and there is no titled, fictitious greatness to injure or oppress him.

Contrast this happy situation with that of Europe, Asia, and Africa; contrast it with your own situation under colonial servitude; read your Declaration of Independence, and realize, if you can, the black catalogue of injury and oppression under which you then groaned; your petitions rejected—your complaints derided and suppressed—not by a redress of grievances, but by menaces; a whole people outlawed, and given up to military despotism; then ask yourselves who headed your armies, who fought your battles, who most contributed to raise you from that state of misery and dependence, and gave you rank among the nations of the earth. And O my country, I blush to think this our greatest earthly friend, almost within sight of the very walls in which we deliberate, reposes under the humble clod of the hill, without one national stone to tell posterity where he lies. I call upon the venerable patriots of the Revolution, some of whom I yet see mingling in the deliberations of my country; I call upon the friends of Warren and of Greene, of Mercer, Sumter, Marion, and Montgomery; nay, I call upon the Representatives of the whole American people to redeem my country from such deep ingratitude; and if any remnant of affection for WASHINGTON still lingers about the heart, I know I will not call in vain. When did your country ever call, and he did not obey? When did it ever want his aid, and he did not readily yield it his assistance? What is your whole history? It is but little more than the record of his obedience, his virtues, and his services; and, painful to think, this same history, whilst it will record the unfeeling ingratitude of his country, will inform posterity that, for that very country, he staked his life, determined to redeem it from slavery or perish in the attempt. And can you—will you refuse to bury him? Oh no! Let us rise up at once, and with united acclaim decree him a statue. Let us outstrip the march of ages, and erect a monument, not merely equal to our present condition, but commensurate with the splendid destiny which awaits us. He is the Father of our Country; let us demand his body, and erect over it a mausoleum at which Time in his passage to eternity will point and tell to every age the glorious gratitude of the American people. And when the national sympathy shall be forgot, and the memory of man faded away; when tradition itself shall have had an end, and history be regarded as the splendid fiction of fancy or tale of romance, this monument shall stand throughout every age, the imperishable evidence of his virtues and a nation's love.

When Mr. E. had concluded, the question was taken that the House do now proceed to consider the said resolves, and it was decided in the negative.

SAVANNAH SUFFERERS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate, for the relief of certain sufferers by the late fire at Savannah.

Mr. REID moved to amend the bill (which proposes to remit one-fourth of the amount of duties on imported goods destroyed by the fire) so as to provide for the remission of the whole amount of such duties.

In support of this motion, Mr. REID delivered a speech of some length, sustaining himself by precedents adduced from the statute book, as well as by arguments going to show the equity, and expediency of Legislative interposition, to the extent which he had proposed. He described the extent of this calamity in glowing terms, and invoked the justice of this House, to relieve the sufferers from the additional loss of the amount of duties on goods destroyed.

Mr. CUTHBERT, of Georgia, delivered the following observations:

Mr. Chairman, I entirely approve of the motion before the Committee, and should have proposed it myself, had I not been anticipated by my friend and colleague. Every reason which should induce Congress to remit one-fourth, with the same force requires us to remit the whole of the duties under consideration. In order to show the propriety of remitting these, I will draw the attention of the Committee, for a moment, to the designs with which duties are imposed. One object intended to be accomplished by them is the encouragement of domestic manufactures.

In more populous countries labor is cheaper, and manufactures are in general executed with less expense than in the United States. The merchant might import foreign fabrics with so little cost as to sell them at a price that would be ruinous to the domestic manufacturer. To guard against this evil, to prevent the domestic manufacturer being driven from the market, enable him to enter into the competition with a hope of success, a duty is laid on the foreign fabric, intended to raise its price to a level with that at which the domestic manufacturer may afford to sell his wares.

The other design of duties is to raise a revenue in a mode the least unpleasant and burdensome to the people. The importer pays the duty to the Government, and adds it to the price at which he might otherwise have sold his goods. The burden is thus transferred to the consumer. He knows the price before he makes the purchase, and his purchase is an act of his own will. He does not feel that he is paying a tax to the Government in addition to the natural price of the article. He is, at his own discretion, consulting only his own individual happiness. The mass of the people know that vast funds are acquired by the machinery of Government; but they do not feel that they are daily contributing to raise this revenue.

When goods are imported, not to remain, but to be exported to some third country, both of these reasons for imposing the duty cease to operate. When foreign goods are thus exported, they are withdrawn from the competition with domestic manufactures. Their existence can no longer prevent the sale, or reduce the price of wares fabricated within our country, and a duty on them can have no influence in encouraging domestic manufactures. And in this case the collection of a duty on them would not be that least unpleasant and burdensome mode of raising a revenue, which we have noticed. On the contrary, it would be an insupportable burden on the merchant, consuming his profits, impairing his energy, and repressing his spirit of enterprise.

The reasons of the duty having ceased, it ought not to be collected, and, by a general provision of the law, in all such cases it is remitted. Then does the merchant pay for the privilege of importing? No. For if he imports goods, and then exports them, he pays no duty. The duty pays for something additional to the right of importing; it pays for the right of importing and selling in the country. In the cases which the present bill is designed to cover, the goods have not been exported; they have, while in the possession of the importers, been destroyed by an overwhelming calamity, which no mortal prudence could avert, whose desolating fury no human activity or courage could arrest, and which has laid in ashes one of our finest cities.

The merchants have had only the privilege of importing; they have not the possibility of selling. The reasons of the duty have as entirely ceased, as if the goods had been exported. Are they not withdrawn from a possibility of injuring the sale of domestic manufactures? Do they not cease to afford the least unpleasant and burdensome mode of raising a revenue? On the contrary, would not the collection of a duty on them be an insupportable burden, weighing down to the earth unfortunate men, who are now tottering under the stroke of Heaven? Yes, sir. The reasons, the equity of the duty have as much ceased as if the goods had been exported—the collection of it would be an act of injustice and oppression.

Do you doubt your power? You have power to impose, and have you not equal power to take off duties? In numerous instances, in which the interests of religion, or of the fine arts, were thought to be concerned, Congress has remitted duties; it has remitted duties in several cases precisely parallel to the present. By the act of August 4th, 1790, the duties were remitted on salt, destroyed by a flood at Annapolis. Two importations of coffee, into Norfolk and Portsmouth, were destroyed by fire; by the act of May 9th, 1794, the duties on these were remitted. By the act of June 7th, 1794, the duties were remitted on spirits destroyed by fire in Vermont. By the act of March 3d, 1804, duties were remitted on tea, destroyed by fire at Providence. Such has been the repeated practice of the Government. But the gentleman from North Carolina says, that the Constitution has given us no power to remit duties. Does he look into the Constitution of the United States for authority to act with fairness, equity, and honor? I hope that the members of this body have sufficient instructions in their own bosoms thus to act, and that, for principles of equity and honor, we have no reason to resort to written constitutions. The same gentleman has said, that the present application is contrary to the established principles of trade. He has said, (I use his own language,) if A sells to B goods, which are destroyed by any casualty, while in the possession of the latter, as well might he request A to release him from the debt incurred by his purchase. This case is not parallel to that of the applicants of Savannah. On the supposition of the gentleman from North Carolina, the bond given by B to A was the equivalent for goods which A had parted with. B. cannot restore to A the consideration, the property, for which the bond had been given. Widely different is the case of the merchants of Savannah.

The Government has not parted with any property. The bonds or other specialties given as an equivalent for the goods destroyed are still due, and must be paid to merchants in Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and England. That consideration, for which the bonds that you hold were given, has returned to you entire and unimpaired. The conflagration has produced, in the supply for Georgia, a chasm which will be filled up by a subsequent importation. That very privilege of importing and selling goods to the amount destroyed by fire, for which the bonds in question were given, has been taken, by the irresistible hand of Providence in a dreadful calamity, from the unfortunate merchants, and will be sold by you to other importers. If the tariff should be raised, as proposed by a bill on the table, this second sale will yield you a sum greater than the amount of the bonds; and even after you have remitted the bonds, your Treasury will have gained by the burning of Savannah. Does any one still believe that the revenue will be impaired by the passage of this bill? I will endeavor to make the subject a little more clear. That part of the revenue which arises from imports, is proportioned, not to the goods imported, but to the goods used in the country. It is then proportioned to the domestic demand for goods. The annual revenue arising from imports in Georgia, is proportioned to the average annual consumption in that State. This proportion may not exist in every year separately, but in a series of years it will not fail to be preserved. Suppose, for example, that the annual consumption of foreign merchandise in that State amounts to a million of dollars, and that the duties on that amount are two hundred thousand dollars. By unavoidable misfortune one-fourth of this merchandise is destroyed in the stores of the importers, and on the merchandise thus destroyed Government holds bonds for duties to the amount of fifty thousand dollars. The goods saved from destruction are less by one-fourth than the annual consumption, and the demand, to the extent of that deficiency, will be supplied by another importation. On this new importation duties will accrue to the amount of fifty thousand dollars. If Government exacts the payment of the bonds given on the importation of the goods destroyed, instead of its average annual revenue of two hundred thousand, it will in this year receive two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. What will be the cause of this increase of your revenue? The losses of the merchants of Savannah. Who will pay this extra duty on goods not used in the country? The unfortunate applicants of Savannah, most of whom have in one night been reduced to poverty. If you exact the payment of the bonds, you will gain some addition to your revenue from the sufferings of your citizens, from the burning of one of your cities. Can this be your desire? Do you not look with abhorrence on such an acquisition? Shylock may demand his pound of flesh, but I hope that the Government of my country is actuated by different feelings. If you remit the bonds you will only consent not to gain by the losses of your citizens, and your Treasury will be in the situation in which you would have seen it if the terrific flames had not swept Savannah with the besom of destruction.

This Congress is distinguished by a laudable zeal for economy; a spirit which should characterize our Government at all times, and which is peculiarly necessary in the present condition of our finances. But I hope that this zeal for economy will not lead us to an indiscriminate retrenchment of expenditures which are necessary to the honor and prosperity of our country; nor excite in us a passion for unhallowed gain. The Government should never pursue a course which would be disgraceful to an individual. If we see an individual refusing expenditures within his power, which are necessary to his health and honor, we do not admire his prudence—we despise his parsimony. If we see an individual grasping at every thing within his reach, and availing himself of the letter, while he violates the spirit of a contract, to extort the last farthing from his unhappy debtor, we detest his unprincipled, hard-hearted, cruel avarice. I am aware that when men are acting in behalf of the Government, they have not that regard for reputation, that sense of honor, that tenderness of conscience, which the same men would feel if acting for themselves. Under a consciousness that they are influenced by no narrow selfishness, and that they are watching over the great interests of their country, they believe that public virtue consists in guarding the public purse, and they feel not a scrupulous respect for the just claims of individuals. I entreat my friends in the Committee not to yield to this illusion. The reputation of our country should be as dear to us as our individual honor; we should be as careful to guard our country from the imputation of injustice as to preserve ourselves from this foul reproach. And, indeed, he who suffers injustice from the Government, feels more deeply than if he had suffered the same injustice from an individual. In the latter case he may hate the avarice, he may resent the dishonesty, of his fellow-citizen. But when with the sense of injustice he connects the idea of the irresistible power of the Government, exerted to oppress him, while he broods over an injury for which there is no redress, he feels a deeper hatred. He detests both the injustice and the tyranny under which he suffers. I hope that Congress will always carefully avoid those acts of injustice towards individuals, which are calculated to excite this gloomy and deep-rooted hostility to the Government.

If my judgment were consulted in this case, the Government should not merely be just, it should be liberal. It should not only refrain from oppressing, it should show a paternal solicitude for the welfare of its suffering citizens. With an arm no less bountiful than powerful, it should comfort the afflicted—it should sustain the sinking—it should be foremost to shelter, and feed, and clothe those who, in consequence of one severe visitation of Heaven, are houseless, and hungry, and naked. But we seek no charity; we appeal not to your generosity; we ask only a liberal and enlightened justice. When we recommend the remission of duties, the reasons and equity of which have ceased, we propose to you to cancel a debt which you cannot collect without visiting the habitations of distress with injustice and oppression.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, reluctantly opposed the amendment. Were he governed by his feelings alone, to which this case so strongly appealed, he should vote for the bill, and even for the proposed amendment to it; but, obeying the impulse of duty, he could find no power in Congress to disburse the public moneys in acts of charity or generosity, or for other purposes than those designated in the Constitution. He denied that this bill rested on justice for its support, however sympathy and feeling might recommend it. He argued that this case could not be distinguished from other losses, from casualties of various sorts, &c., and he could see no difference between remitting this duty and taking so much money from the Treasury, which he contended Congress had no right to do, and not having the right, he denied the force of precedent to justify it.

Mr. COBB replied to Mr. SMITH. Where, he asked, was the scruples he now expressed, when, the other day, a bill passed to remit the duties on a statue of WASHINGTON, imported by the State of North Carolina; and what was there in that case to make it stronger than this? Mr. C. then proceeded to make a number of remarks in support of this bill and of the amendment proposed to it. Many of these importers, he said, were rendered, by their losses, absolutely penniless, and were from every consideration entitled to relief.

Mr. FLOOR, of Connecticut, said, he presumed it would be unnecessary for any member of this House to state, that his sympathies towards our unfortunate fellow-citizens of Savannah were strongly excited. We commiserate their sufferings; but, sir, we are not to legislate under the influence of sympathy. The power of Congress is a delegated power; and, sir, I find no authority to extend the hand of charity: my instructions contain no such power. The question now before the Committee is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. REID,) to the bill from the Senate, extending to the remission of all the duties, instead of one-fourth, as proposed in the bill.

Sir, I am opposed to that principle of the bill which remits any portion of the duties, on the ground that Congress can no more remit these duties, which have become a debt, than appropriate a sum of money from the Treasury, in charity. The principle is the same in both cases. But I am opposed to the amendment on other grounds. Will not the amendment embrace the whole amount of duties which have accrued within from nine to eighteen months? It will be impossible to ascertain the amount remaining on hand unsold. If the principle of the bill be correct, it is but fair to presume that not more than one-fourth of the goods remained in the hands of the importer, and of course the amount proposed to be remitted by the bill, would probably embrace the amount of the goods destroyed in the hands of the importer. Sir, I am disposed to grant all the relief in our power, consistent with our duty, and shall offer an amendment to extend the time of credit on those duties, when this amendment is rejected.

In answer to the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. COBB,) who asks, where have been our Constitutional scruples on former occasions? the gentleman will recollect that, with me, this principle has always been maintained. He will recollect my opposition to the bill granting land to the deaf and dumb asylum, upon the same principle. My course has been uniform. The gentleman calls upon us to exercise our reason. This, sir, we intend to do, and I ask him to do the same. I highly applaud the zeal of the gentleman in favor of the unfortunate sufferers of his own State; but he must recollect that we are to sympathize as men, but not as legislators.

The gentleman begs of us some better reason for opposing the bill than Constitutional doubts! This is sufficient for me, sir; but there are other and cogent reasons which would induce me to vote against one of the principles of the bill. If it is to be considered an act of charity, it ought to be distributed equally; if of justice, impartiality is indispensable. But, sir, this bill is confined to the importers merely. Why not extend it also to the purchaser? He, sir, has already paid to the importer the amount of duty, and of course would have a stronger claim to relief.

But, sir, the importer, who has prudently insured his property, and paid his premium, receives no relief. Are we, sir, to be incorporated into an insurance company, with the President of the United States for president, as was lately proposed to establish a turnpike company on the Cumberland road?

Gentlemen claim on the ground of former precedents. If they will rest their claim on this ground, they will find, on examination, the balance of precedents against them. True it is, that, in some instances, such relief has been granted; but, sir, it is equally true that, in most cases, relief has been refused.

Do gentlemen propose to open the doors of the Treasury to remunerate for all the losses by fire? Sir, your Treasury would be beggared; your boasted twenty-seven millions annually would scarcely remunerate the losses which are annually sustained by this destructive element. Sir, you would soon find a more alarming deficit than now exists in your Treasury.

The report of the committee of the Senate on this subject having been read—

Mr. PINDALL delivered his sentiments in favor of the bill, and of the motion now depending. No case could be stronger; and even those who opposed the proposed remission were obliged to admit there were precedents in point on the statute book. It was indeed said that Congress had refused to remit duties in similar cases; but those cases had not been specified or enumerated, as those of remission had been. The Constitutional objection, he intimated, in the course of his speech, was entitled to but little weight; as it could scarcely be doubted that Congress had power to repeal or modify its own revenue laws, and the measure proposed was but a modification or repeal of them as to a particular case.

Mr. CUTHBERT again spoke, in reply to Mr. SMITH and Mr. FOOT. To refuse this equitable provision would, in an individual, he contended be disgraceful; and, in his view, every citizen, and particularly every member of this House, ought to cherish the reputation of the country as he would his own. This, and other considerations, he urged on the attention of the Committee in favor of the amendment and the bill.

Mr. WALKER made some remarks, earnestly in favor of the bill and amendment.

The question was then taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. REIN, and decided in the negative, by a large majority.

Mr. FOOT then moved an amendment to the bill, the object of which was to strike out so much of the bill as proposes to remit 25 per cent. of the amount of duties (and thus confine the bill to a simple extension of the credit on the bonds for two years.)

The motion was agreed to—63 to 53.

Mr. CLAY then moved to add a new section to the bill, the object of which was to appropriate fifty thousand dollars for the relief of the sufferers by the late calamitous fire at Savannah, to be applied under the direction of the Mayor and Aldermen of that city.

This motion was negatived by a considerable majority.

The Committee then rose, and reported the amendment which had been made to the bill.

Mr. COBB made some remarks, by way of remonstrance against a concurrence in the amendment made by the Committee of the Whole. Mr. FOOT replied to the observations particularly addressed to him on this subject. Mr. COBB rejoined.

The question was then taken on concurring in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole, and decided in the affirmative—70 to 63.

The amendment was then further amended, so as to extend the term of credit on goods destroyed, from two to four years.

Thus amended, the bill was passed to a third reading.

After spending some time in Committee on the bill for the relief of Walter Manning, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 7.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of affording some pecuniary relief to the widow of John Heaps, deceased, made a report, which was read; when, Mr. L. reported a bill for the relief of the widow of John Heaps; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. COOK moved that the House do now proceed to consider the bill authorizing the Governor of Illinois to obtain certain abstracts of land from certain public offices. The motion was negatived.

Mr. BARBOUR moved that the House do now proceed to consider the amendment submitted by him yesterday to the standing rules of the House. The motion was negatived.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate recede from their first amendment to the bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1820," and insist on their second amendment to the said bill, and ask a conference upon the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the said amendment, and have appointed managers at the said conference on their part; and they have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act providing for the better organization of the Treasury Department; an act further to amend the judicial system of the United States; and an act for the relief of the legal representatives of Tench Francis, deceased; in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill from the Senate, for the relief of certain sufferers by the late fire at Savannah, was read a third time as amended, and passed; the bill for the relief of Walter Channing was read a third time, and finally passed; the bill for the relief of John Steel was read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

The following bills, which originated with the committees of this House, to wit: the bill for the relief of Jacob Konkopot and others of the nation of Stockbridge Indians; the bill for the relief of Elkanah Finney; the bill for the relief of James Mackay, of the Territory of Missouri; the bill for the relief of Fielding Jones; the bill for the relief of Captain Stanton Sholes; the bill for the relief of John Wells; the bill for the relief of Beck and Harvey; the bill for the relief of Lewis Joseph de Beaulieu; the bill for the relief of Christopher Miller; the bill for the relief of Samuel B. Beall; the bill confirming the title of the Mohican or Stockbridge tribe of Indians; the bill for the relief of certain settlers in the State of Illinois, who reside within the Vincennes land district; the bill for the relief of Martha Flood; the bill for the relief of Charles S. Jones and Richard Buckner, jr., administrators of William Jones; the bill for the relief of the heirs and representatives of Isaac Melchior, deceased; the bill for the relief of William Coffin and others; the bill for the relief of James Merrill; the bill for the relief of John D. Carter; the bill for the relief of William King; the bill for the relief of Jos. W. Skinner; the bill for the relief of John B. Regnier; the bill for the relief of John Law and Jonathan Elliot, citizens of Washington—

These bills severally passed through Committees of the Whole, and were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, with the exception of the two following: The bill confirming the title of the Mohican and Stockbridge tribe of Indians; and the bill for the relief of William King. The two last were ordered to lie on the table.

SATURDAY, April 8.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill to alter the times of the session of the circuit and district courts in the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time on Tuesday next.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Peter Cardelli, reported a bill to encourage the art of making new models, and casts of busts, and other things therein mentioned; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. S., from the same committee, reported a bill to authorize the Secretary of State to issue letters patent to Henry Burden; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. S. also reported a bill for the relief of Susannah Stewart; which was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of Daniel Bickley and Catharine Clark, administratrix of John Clark, deceased; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. LINN, the Committee on Military Affairs were directed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, a more effectual remedy to prevent duelling in the Army and Navy of the United States and in the District of Columbia.

A motion was made by Mr. COCKE, that the House do now proceed to consider the resolution submitted by him on the 6th of March last, for an inquiry into the expediency of reducing the Naval Establishment; and, the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act providing for the better organization of the Treasury Department," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act further to amend the Judicial System of the United States," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Tench Francis, deceased," was read twice, and referred to the select committee appointed on the 7th of February, on the memorial of William Tilghman, administrator of Tench Francis, deceased.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider, the message from the Senate, asking a conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, on the second amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1820:" whereupon,

Resolved, That this House insist on their disagreement to the said amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate, on the subject matter of the said amendment, and that managers be appointed to attend the said conference on their part.

Ordered, That Messrs. COCKE, TAYLOR, WARFIELD, BECHER, and TYLER, be appointed managers on the part of this House.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Louis Joseph de Beaulieu; an act for the relief of Beck and Harvey; an act for the relief of William Coffin and others; an act for the relief of Fielding Jones; an act for the relief of Captain Stanton Sholes; an act for the relief of Christopher Miller; an act for the relief of Samuel B. Beall; an act for the relief of certain settlers in the State of Illinois, who reside within the Vincennes land district; an act for the relief of Martha Flood; an act for the relief of James Merrill; an act for the relief of Charles S. Jones and Richard Buckner, jr., administrators of William Jones; an act for the relief of John D. Carter; an act for the relief of the heirs and representatives of Isaac Melchior, deceased; an act for the relief of Joseph M. Skinner, administrator of George Skinner, deceased; an act for the relief of John B. Regnier; an act for the relief of John Law and Jonathan Elliot; an act for the relief of Jacob Konkopot, and others, of the nation of Stockbridge Indians; and an act for the relief of Elkanah Finney—were severally read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of James Mackay, of the Territory of Missouri, was read the third time, and the question was stated, Shall it pass; when

Mr. PINDALL moved that the said bill be recommended to the Committee on Private Land Claims, with instructions so to amend the same as to provide for a trial of the validity of the claim of James Mackay before a judicial tribunal.

Mr. RHEA then moved that the said bill be postponed indefinitely; which latter motion was rejected; and the question was then taken on the motion to recommit the bill, with instructions; and passed in the affirmative.

An engrossed bill for the relief of John Wells, was read the third time; and, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, the bill was committed to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting sundry documents, containing the information required by the resolution submitted by Mr LOWNDES on the 30th ultimo, in relation to the conduct of Captain Biddle, and the cruise of the Ontario in the Pacific ocean; which were ordered to lie on the table.

MONDAY April 10.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting additional documents in relation to the cruise of the sloop of war Ontario; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SILSBEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Captain Samuel C. Reid, in behalf of himself and the other officers and crew of the private armed brig General Armstrong; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Tench Francis, deceased," reported the same, without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. PINDALL submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the payment of pensions in the counties, parishes, or townships, in which the pensioners reside.

The resolution was read; and, on the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the negative.

On motion of Mr. COCKE, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to transmit to this House an account of the annual receipts and expenditures of the Department for Indian Affairs within the District of Columbia, from its establishment to the present time, with a statement of the nature and extent of the contracts entered into, and with whom; also, the amount of moneys due to the said establishment, and by whom due.

Mr. SMYTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, who were instructed, on the 28th January last, to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the allowance of bounty land to soldiers who enlisted in the late war, and who procured substitutes, made a report, that it is not expedient to provide for the allowance of the said bounty; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. WARFIELD, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency, of providing by law for the payment of any balances due by the Government to collectors of the internal revenue.

On motion of Mr. CASE, the Committee on the Public Buildings were directed to inquire into the practicability of rendering the Hall of Representatives convenient for the transaction of public business.

Mr. HARDIN moved that the select committee to which is referred the resolution from the Senate fixing a period for the termination of the present session of Congress, be discharged from the further consideration thereof. The motion was negatived.

Mr. COBB then moved the following order:

Ordered, That the committee to whom was referred the resolution from the Senate, on the subject of the adjournment of Congress, be directed to report thereon to-morrow.

The question was taken, Will the House now proceed to consider the same, and determined in the negative?

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William Pancoast," was read a third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting sundry statements in relation to the operations of the mint of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

DISTRICT BANKS.

The House then, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. STORRS in the chair,) on the bill concerning the District Banks. [This bill provides—

Sec. 1. That the charters of all the incorporated banks that now pay specie on demand be extended until the 16th June, 1825.

Sec. 2. Should any of said banks refuse to pay specie or lawful currency of the United States on demand, they are to pay an interest of 10 per cent. per annum until payment of such demand is made, and Congress is empowered forthwith to revoke their charters, and provide for settling their accounts.

Sec. 3. No bank to issue, re-issue, or receive in payment or deposit, any bill, note, &c., under five dollars, after the 1st January next, except to receive such note or notes as may have been issued before that time in exchange for current coin or a debt due such bank. Charter forfeited for offending.

Sec. 4. Any officer of a bank who shall conceal, embezzle, or connive at the concealment or embezzlement of any property of a bank, to be adjudged a felon, and imprisoned not more than ten years, and fined not less than 1,000 nor more than 20,000 dollars—one moiety to the United States, the other to the informer—all debts due by him to said bank being first satisfied.

Sec. 5. Any bank ceasing to pay on demand—no officer or director of said bank permitted to buy up, in person or by agent, or receive in payment any note or bill of said bank at a less price or value than its face purports it to be worth—for each offence, to be imprisoned for one month, and pay thrice the value of such bill or note.

Sec. 6. The present charter of the Bank of Columbia revoked on the 1st January, 1822, and rechartered on the same footing of the other District banks, until the 16th June, 1840.

Sec. 7. Revokes the charter of the Franklin Bank of Alexandria, and provides for settling their accounts.

Sec. 8. The president and directors of each bank to file their declaration in writing in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, within six months, assenting to the terms hereby granted, or to forfeit their charter, and settle their accounts, as allowed the Franklin Bank of Alexandria.

Sec. 9. Prohibits any corporation within the District of Columbia, other than said banks, issuing or discounting notes or bills after the first of January next—any mayor, alderman, councilman, &c., for each offence to pay not less than 100 nor more than 1,000 dollars.

Sec. 10. Any person who, shall sign, countersign, or endorse, any note, bill, &c., as aforesaid, in addition to said penalty, to be imprisoned not less than three nor more than twelve months.

Sec. 11. Declares null and void all drafts, bills, &c., given in payment for money discounted by any corporation, contrary to the provisions of this act, whether such bills are made payable to such corporation, or to any person as agent or trustee.

Sec. 12. Any mayor, alderman, councilman, clerk, &c., that shall, after the 1st of January next, issue and pass into circulation any bill or note as aforesaid, to incur all said penalties, notwithstanding said note may be signed prior to the said 1st day of January.

Secs. 13 and 14 provides for the consolidation of the banks of Alexandria into two banks, with a capital of one million of dollars each, to take place by written articles of association, prior to the 16th of June, 1825; provided they continue until that period. Charters to extend to the 16th June, 1840, subject to the present rules, conditions, &c., of the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, and also to the rules, conditions, &c., of this act.

Sec. 15 provides in a similar manner for the consolidation of the banks of Georgetown, other than the Bank of Columbia, into one bank, with a capital which, added to the capital of the Bank of Columbia, shall make the sum of two millions of dollars, and no more, subject to the present rules, conditions, &c., of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, and also to the rules, &c., imposed by this act.

Sec. 16 contains like provision for the consolidation of the Bank of Washington and the Patriotic Bank, with a capital of one million of dollars.

Sec. 17 in like manner extends the charter of the Bank of the Metropolis, with permission to augment their capital to one million of dollars.

Secs. 18 and 19 prescribe the modes of proceeding of such banks and stockholders as may or may not accept the provisions of this act.

Sec. 20. All banks in the District, except the Franklin Bank of Alexandria, from and after the 1st January, 1820, to pay one-sixth of one per centum on its capital stock, after netting six per centum to its stockholders, to constitute a school fund for the education of indigent children in each town. Each bank, semi-annually, on paying their dividends and the aforesaid one-sixth of one per centum, to render an exact account of its condition to the Secretary of the Treasury. On failure thereof, or an attempt to defraud the fund aforesaid, Congress have power to declare the charters null and void.

Sec. 21. This act to be in force from and after the passage thereof.]

Mr. COBB moved to amend the bill by striking out the whole of it, except the enacting clause, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That, for the purpose of enabling the several banking institutions within the District of Columbia to close their business and concerns, the several charters of the said banking institutions, as the same now exist, shall be and the same are hereby extended for and during the term of — years, from and after the first day of June next; from and after which day, the said several charters of each and every banking institution within the said District shall cease and determine."

Mr. COBB delivered his sentiments at some length in favor of this proposition.

When the reporter entered the hall—

Mr. MERCER was on the floor. He was examining the condition of the banks of the District, and comparing it with that of others in the United States; to which, he contended, they stood in no disadvantageous comparison. He then proceeded to reply to an observation which had been made, to the effect that the Branch Bank of the United States was competent to do all the actual transaction business of the District. This he denied on various grounds: the evils of a moneyed aristocracy; the distinction of interests in the District, requiring separate institutions for each; the impracticability of calling in, within any reasonable period, the amount of debt due to the banks, especially without substituting for it something like an equal amount of bank capital—which it could not be expected that the Bank of the United States would draw from the commercial cities where it is now employed.

Mr. WARFIELD followed, on the same side of the question. He denied that the bank capital of the District is too large, when we take into view the great extent of country in Virginia, and that portion of Maryland depending on the District for a market for its produce. No fraud, or misconduct, or want of punctuality, on the part of the banks, had been alleged; no petition had been presented from any part of this District, or from any portion of the United States, against a renewal of the charters of the banks. In no part of the Union had the increase of population or the progress of improvement been more rapid than in this District. The inhabitants were an enterprising people, and had done much within a short time. Their enterprise ought not to be cramped, nor their exertions paralyzed by the destruction of the banks, &c. The branch bank here, he contended, could not be competent to the business of the District; nor would it be wise, he said, to make the interests of the banks exclusively dependent on that institution, &c. For these, and other reasons, he was opposed to the motion before the Committee.

The question was then taken on Mr. COBB's motion, and decided in the negative by a large majority.

Mr. McLEAN, of Kentucky, moved to amend the bill by adding to it a provision to make the individual property of the stockholders of the banks liable for all the debts of the banks.

Mr. MERCER remarked that this provision was unprecedented in any other bank charter in the United States; which, itself, was a strong argument against the amendment.

Mr. McLEAN defended his amendment. The constitution of one of the States, he said, contained a provision that no bank should ever be incorporated therein without such a fundamental condition. If to be found in the charter of no other bank, it was high time the principle should be established, for reasons which he urged at large; and neither here, nor anywhere else, would he vote for the charter of any bank which did not contain such a provision.

Mr. BRUSH objected to the ex post facto operation of this proposition, as it would go to change the nature of existing contracts. He had no objection, he said, to modify it so as to operate prospectively.

Mr. WARFIELD spoke against the motion.

Mr. McLEAN modified his motion so as to make it take effect from and after the expiration of the present charters of the banks.

Mr. MERCER made some observations to show that such a provision was unnecessary, and would be oppressive, and, therefore, ought not to be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. McLEAN replied. Among other arguments, he likened banks to associations or partnerships for carrying on mercantile or trading business, of which, no one ever doubted that every partner in the concern was liable for the debts of the firm, &c.

Mr. MERCER again spoke in reply to Mr. McLEAN, and in vindication of the present provisions of the bill for securing the due administration of the banks, &c.

Mr. CLAY, after expressing his indisposition to amend this bill, understanding it had been arranged according to the wishes of the people of the District, made some remarks in favor of a prompt disposition of this question, and a curtailment of debate, with a view to the shortness of the remainder of the session, which would be left for the consideration of other important subjects.

Mr. COBB, in the course of some remarks in reply to Mr. CLAY, said that the Speaker was under a mistake in supposing that this bill was framed in accordance with the general wishes of the people of the District.

Mr. CAMPBELL spoke in favor of the amendment, and Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, also made a few remarks upon it.

Mr. MERCER spoke in reply to the suggestion of Mr. COBB, above stated. With a few exceptions in Alexandria, and the exception of a single gentleman on this side of the District, he had heard of no dissatisfaction of the people of the District with the provisions of this bill.

The question was taken on Mr. McLEAN's motion, and decided in the negative by a large majority.

Various other amendments were proposed and successively rejected, on which debate took place, in the course of which Mr. MERCER distinguished himself in defence of the bill.

Mr. CLAY then made a motion to amend the bill by adding thereto a new section, as follows, viz:

"And be it further enacted, That nothing herein contained shall prevent, or be construed to prevent Congress from repealing or modifying the whole or any part of this act, whenever they shall think proper."

This motion was agreed to without debate or opposition.

Mr. METCALF then moved to strike out the first section of the bill, with a view to destroy it.

Mr. METCALF spoke as follows:

I am aware, said he, of the exhausted patience of the Committee; but, as I am not in the habit of speaking often, and do not intend to speak long, I am induced to claim the indulgence of members for the purpose of giving, as concisely as possible, my views of this interesting subject.

With my respected colleague, who thinks it unnecessary at this time to enter deeply into the great principles upon which those institutions are founded, I cannot agree; and only regret that my inclination is not better supported by the qualifications necessary for the investigation of those principles.

The gentleman from Virginia very zealously entreats us to recharter these banks for the purpose of giving them time to wind up their business. But, since the rejection of the amendment which was just now offered, the object of which was to bind the property of individual stockholders, I am apprehensive that they are to wind up without taking in their notes, as some other banks of the District, which have been named by the gentlemen from Virginia in debate, have done.

During this discussion, we have been called on by gentlemen from various quarters to regard very sacredly the rights of the people of this District, and not to suffer our friendly feelings for the United States Bank to influence us against those of the District.

It is my sincere desire to deal tenderly with the rights of these citizens, and in all things to do them at least ample justice, because they have no other tribunal to whom they can look for legislative protection; but I am unwilling to extend to them a privilege which, in my opinion, should never again be extended to any portion of the citizens of this Republic. And it is quite certain that I am not influenced by feelings of friendship for the United States Bank. From this institution I anticipate the most serious evils to my country. Perhaps these evils may never be found to exist, except in my own imagination; but I cannot help viewing the United States Bank as the darkest speck which at this time is to be seen on the escutcheon of American liberty.

But, sir, if the able writers and eloquent statesmen who have lately disrobed these wicked, these insidious spectres, and exposed them naked to public view in all their deformity, together with their practical effects on society, as have been of late years, and are now so obviously, so manifestly experienced, do not flash conviction on the minds of the multitude, and arouse them in opposition to those brazen-fronted corporations, it will fill the enemies of free government with joy to think that they have at least a plausible pretext for the assertion which they have so often and so maliciously reiterated, "that a community of individuals are incompetent to the task of self-government."

Some of the ablest pens, and of the most eloquent statesmen and orators that adorn the present, and would have adorned any other age, have attempted a generous, a manly, a noble resistance to banking systems such as we have established in this Government, with no one principle of equity or of justice in them. Sparks of fire have been elicited and sent forth in burning streams among the people. And is it true that they cannot be aroused from their apathy? I hope it is not true. I trust the materials are combustible, and that a sacred glow of patriotism will at last light up their souls; and that a love of virtue, of justice, of equality, and of all the genuine, but violated principles of this happy Government, will determine them to resist the bold and daring encroachments made upon their rights by banking corporations.

In the first place, it does appear to me that one of the principal causes of the many blunders committed by American statesmen arises from this plain and simple circumstance. They are too apt to look beyond the waters for example. They bring all their materials from abroad; they go to monarchies, aristocracies, and hierarchies; examine minutely and critically every pin and wheel in the whole machinery by which those Governments operate; and, as I think, without due reflection, attempt the introduction of this unsuitable, this inappropriate and unhallowed kind of machinery into this free Government. They pluck from Governments which were established for the special and exclusive benefit and advantage of those who govern, of their minions and privileged orders, all the materials with which they propose to set in motion a Government that seeks to extend its benefits and advantages alike to all its citizens without distinction—all the materials out of which they propose to build the grandest, the noblest, the most stupendous work of human liberty, of human wisdom, and of human happiness.

This is a mighty error, and one that a little experience ought to correct. Can it be expected that such adverse principles will harmonize? Can it be supposed that such discordant elements will commingle and settle down in a placid union? To produce such a reconciliation would require all the nice, the subtle, the keen-eyed, the hairsplitting, and technical refinement of the present day; but I am sure it would baffle, completely baffle, good old-fashioned, practical, solid common sense; by the standard of which it would be found to be utterly contrary to the nature of things.

European writers, it is true, have attempted to prove the utility of banking institutions by the good effects which they are pleased to say resulted from them, in various parts of the old world, for the last six or seven hundred years. In Venice, Genoa, Amsterdam, France, England, and in many other places, they have made the experiment. And though it is acknowledged that at one time the most serious and distressing calamity was brought upon the French nation by one of these deceptive institutions, yet it is insisted that, with this exception, and that of the South Sea Company, and perhaps a few others of a similar character, they were not found to be mischievous.

They tell us that facilities were afforded to commerce, and it flourished; that towns and cities sprang up as if by magic, and all this. But they do not tell us that these wonder-working institutions extended alike to all classes of the citizens, under those Governments, the same benefits, comforts, and advantages, to the multitude who composed the physical strength of these nations, as well as to the few who govern them. No! their history would contradict the assertion. We know that the multitude were degraded, poor, and miserable, without either the prospect or hope of relief; and at their expense the few rioted in excess and in the most luxurious enjoyments.

Then, if it be true that those are the best Governments that dispense the greatest portion of human happiness, it does seem to me that there was, and is, a great deficiency in the Governments of which I have spoken, their banking corporations notwithstanding.

A nation may erect the most splendid temples—walls and towers of the most costly workmanship: pyramids, if you please, of invisible height. Or it may vest its millions and millions, as we have done, in one proud Capitol, supported on its numerous and lofty columns of polished marble, and still this is no proof of a nation's prosperity, or of the happiness of the people. So many towns and cities spring up by unjustly concentrating the labor and resources of a whole community, and applying it to that particular purpose. But, I repeat it, that, instead of this being a proof of a nation's prosperity, or of the happiness of the people, the contrary, in the general, is precisely the fact. These monuments of a nation's folly and extravagance, almost always take root in, and grow out of, oppression. Just such oppression as the banks of which I have spoken, and all others which may have been established on similar principles, had the power of inflicting, and did inflict on the multitude.

APRIL, 1820.

District Banks.

H. OF R.

To what class, according to political writers, does this privileged order, who are incorporated into a paper aristocracy, or, if you please, into a moneyed aristocracy, belong? Surely not to the productive classes. They produce nothing substantially or intrinsically valuable to the community, we all know. They barely serve to put in motion a machine, which, by its silent and secret manœuvring and contrivance, has the power most artfully to transfer the substance, the earnings, and property, of those who are productive, to the sole use, benefit, and behoof of themselves, and of other idle consumers.

As a late and able writer of Virginia has very justly said on this subject, "These corporations have the power to apply their law-chartered tubes to the great body of those whose labor is productive, and, unperceived, to draw away their substance, as the vampire is said to suck the blood from those who are asleep." Dr. Smith, however, has amused us with a very ingenious and fanciful description of banks. And as he is from beyond the waters—a subject of the good old mother country—consequently his work must be more entitled to our serious consideration than the work of the writer of whom I have just now spoken, than the son of Virginia—that truant daughter of this same good old mother.

The right fanciful Doctor has told us of roads leading to and from the banks, through the air, where carriages might run, (and I presume he might have said with at least the rapidity of a velocipede.) But these doctrines are not suited to a plain, homespun, matter-of-fact republican people. Is it not less hazardous for republicans to travel on the ground? Be it mountainous or level, rocky or smooth, give me good old terra firma.

Besides, I do not think it fair that the multitude should be taxed for the purpose of furnishing a balloon, and gas, and whatever else may be necessary for these airy travellers, without participating in their enjoyments; and I do most seriously dread the consequences about the time they are doomed to light! For human bodies to fly, is nothing—nothing at all. Perhaps a republican might fly. But, how is he to light? There lies the rub! And, depend upon it, that sooner or later, these aerial voyagers must light: and a sore fall they will have of it, either to themselves or to those upon whose heads they happen to descend, or to both.

However, in a government composed of privileged orders, and set in motion by that awkward and ill contrived machinery called checks and balances, a banking institution might be less mischievous. If properly poised, it might enable the commercial interest to check the usurpations of a feudal aristocracy. But even then it would soon become the task-master of the manufacturer, and all others under its control, as the feudal baron is the task-master of the actual tiller of the soil.

Again, sir: I hold the doctrine which I have somewhere seen to be undeniably true: "that all those who identify themselves with banks not founded on principles of mutual justice and security, have an interest adverse to the interest of the balance of society; that from the very nature of such an institution it is doomed to make continual and unceasing war upon the just rights of the balance of society." Now, man is said to be the creature of motive, and avarice a strong and almost irresistible passion. If, then, you would excite those who are high in power to useful action, give them no interest separate and distinct from the interest of the balance of society. Lead them not into temptation, for if you do you have not the power to deliver them from evil. And those who are thus situated will soon become too arrogant to ask that deliverance from Him who alone has the power to grant it. By the establishment of a bank, such as this which we have nicknamed (if it be not treason to mention it) the "United States Bank," with its various branches extending to the different States, the interest of the highest officers, Executive, Legislative, and Judicial, both of the General and State Governments, may become identified with the bank, and consequently inimical to that of the people. Now, I confess that I do not like to see the most exalted and virtuous characters thus situated; and I consider it very bad policy so to place them.

There is another objection, and one which, in my humble opinion, ought of itself to be sufficient to prevent the introduction of banks into any country: I allude to banks established on similar principles, and vesting the managers with similar powers to those which have heretofore been established by this or by any of the State governments, as far as my knowledge of them extends. They destroy all stability in the price or value of property. The managers of these mints can mingle, alloy, or purify the currency at pleasure; they can enhance or depreciate the value of property at will; they, and they alone, know when to buy and when to sell, so as to make the most advantageous speculations; they may keep the prices of property continually changing and fluctuating, the better to deceive, cheat, and defraud the citizen out of that property. Not to have a uniform standard of weights and measures is a most distressing evil in any country; but by no means so distressing as that of a fluctuating bank currency. No, I know of no evil so complicated, or of equal magnitude to that which is so snugly wrapt up in a legal mantle; so completely hidden and concealed from public security. How are your industrious and productive classes to guard against the effects of these terrible institutions? They cannot repose in safety under them; they must abandon their useful avocations, and keep their eyes (if I may be permitted to use a military phrase) continually turned upon the fugleman; they must become intimately acquainted with the arts and management of this dextrous juggler, by way of self-defence; and in doing so, they cease to be virtuous, useful, or productive: they become infected with poison, and in their turn begin to cheat and swindle—and thus the whole society becomes corrupt.

If you would have a virtuous and patriotic people, create no privileged orders. Protect individual industry and enterprise. Give no one class of your citizens any advantages over the next; and they will all of them rally around the standard of liberty and equality in times of danger. Yes; of liberty and equality, terms much abused here, as well as they have been in France and elsewhere; but, like the Christian religion, which has also been much abused everywhere; yet it is not the less true or the less righteous in itself, on that account. Then do not infer that I am in favor of a system of levelism as it is called. Or that, like ambitious Cæsar, I would be in favor of the passage of agrarian laws. I would not take one cent from the industrious and frugal economist for the purpose of dividing it with the idle and worthless prodigal. No; but I would have the Government to speak to all its citizens, as the just parent does to all his children; where there are no laws of primogeniture, of the good things of this life, give to each an equal portion; the same protection, the same benefits and advantages in all things, to each should be generously extended; and under Providence let the success and prosperity of each depend upon himself. These are the principles that constitute the pride and the glory of the American Republic—principles that ought to be cherished, that ought to be engraven on the heart, that ought to be indelibly impressed on the mind of every sincere friend to the perpetuation of republican liberty in its purity.

When Mr. M. had concluded—

The question was taken on agreeing to his motion, and decided in the negative without a division.

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill to the House as amended.

The amendment (moved by Mr. CLAY) agreed to in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

Mr. McLEAN renewed the amendment which he proposed in Committee of the Whole, with this variance, that the individual liability of the stockholder was now proposed to be confined to the amount of stock held by him.

This motion gave rise to some debate, in which Messrs. McLEAN, MERCER, BRUSH, and HARDIN, took part.

After which the motion was negatived; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading without any other amendment than that moved by Mr. CLAY.

TUESDAY, April 11.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill to annex certain lands within the Territory of Michigan to the land district of Detroit; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time on Monday next.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Margaret Perry; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act providing for the better organization of the Treasury Department," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. SMYTH, from the Military Committee, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing a more effectual remedy against duelling in the Army and Navy and in the District of Columbia, made a report, in which they state, "that they consider the existing law as amply sufficient, if executed, to repress duelling in the Army," and they therefore ask to be discharged from further inquiry on the subject. The report was adopted by the House.

Mr. SMYTH, from the same committee, made report on the memorial of Nathaniel Hall Loring, Thomas Ragland, Charles Rutledge Holmes, Charles R. Vining, and Wilson M. C. Fairfax, late cadets at the Military Academy at West Point; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the committee appointed on the petition of Joseph E. Bloomfield, on behalf of Richard S. Hackley, made report thereon; which was read, when Mr. S. reported a bill for the relief of Richard S. Hackley; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. ROBERT MOORE, from the committee appointed on the petition of John Webster, made a report thereon, which was read; when Mr. M. reported a bill for the relief of the said John Webster; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act to authorize the erection of a lighthouse on one of the Isles of Shoals near Portsmouth, in New Hampshire;" and "An act declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the State of Georgia," passed the 19th of December, 1818; in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said bills were read twice and severally referred to the Committee of Commerce.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to continue in force the act passed on the 20th day of April, 1818, entitled 'An act supplementary to an act entitled An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage,' passed the second day of March, 1799," be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

The House then proceeded to consider the said bill; and having amended the same, the amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time to-morrow.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to alter the times of the session of the circuit and district courts in the District of Columbia," was read the third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the benefit of the Columbian Institute, established for the promotion of arts and sciences in the City of Washington. The bill was reported with an amendment, which was read, and concurred in by the House.

Mr. COOK moved further to amend the said bill by adding thereto the following proviso:

APRIL, 1820.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

"And provided further, That whenever the same may be required for the public use, that their right shall cease and expire."

And on the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the negative. The bill was then further amended: when Mr. COCKE moved that the said bill be postponed indefinitely; which motion being rejected, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

The rest of the day was occupied in Committees of the Whole, in which the following mentioned bills were taken up and ordered to be engrossed for third readings to-morrow, viz: A bill for the relief of Stephen Baxter; a bill authorizing the sale of a part of the glebe of Rock Creek Church; a bill for the relief of John McGrew, Richard Cravat, Hardy Perry, and Beley Cheney; a bill for the relief of the representatives of Henry Willis; a bill for the relief of Angus O. Frazer and others; a bill giving the right of pre-emption to James Shields; a bill for the relief of Joseph Bruce; a bill for the relief of Ann McIntire, administratrix of Andrew McIntire; a bill for the relief of the heirs of Abijah Hunt and William G. Forman; a bill for the relief of Thomas Withers; a bill for the relief of Daniel Converse and George Miller; a bill for the relief of the widow of John Heaps, deceased; a bill for the relief of Daniel Bickley and Catherine Clark; a bill for issuing letters patent to Henry Burden.

The following mentioned bills also passed through Committees of the Whole, and were subsequently ordered to lie on the table in the House, viz: A bill for the relief of Margaret Hall, late Margaret McKenzie; a bill for the relief of Berryman Green, administrator of Samuel Kerby, deceased; a bill for the relief of General James Wilkinson.

Mr. COCKE, from the managers at the conference, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on one of the amendments of the Senate to the military appropriation bill, reported that the committee of conference had met, conferred, and were unable to come to any agreement on the subject. The report was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, April 12.

Mr. BALDWIN presented a memorial of the Pennsylvania Society for the encouragement of American manufactures, praying that further protection and encouragement may be extended to the manufacturing interest of the country generally; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PINCKNEY presented a memorial and petition of sundry merchants and underwriters, of the city of Charleston, in South Carolina, praying compensation for spoiliations committed on their lawful commerce, by cruisers under the French flag, between the year 1793 and the year 1800, their claims to which, upon the Government of France, for indemnity, were abandoned on the part of the United States, in the convention of the 30th of September, 1800; which memorial and petition was ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act concerning navigation;' in which bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to continue in force the act passed on the 20th day of April, 1818, entitled 'An act supplementary to an act entitled An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, passed the 2d day of March, 1799,'" was read the third time as amended. Whereupon, the said bill was further amended, by unanimous consent. The question was then taken, Shall the said bill pass, as amended? and passed in the affirmative. The title of the bill was then amended, by adding thereto the words: "and for other purposes."

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act for the benefit of the Columbian Institute, established for the promotion of arts and sciences, in the City of Washington; an act to authorize the sale of part of the glebe of Rock Creek Church, in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia; an act for the relief of Stephen Baxter, late paymaster of the third regiment of New York volunteers; an act for the relief of John McGrew, Richard Cravat, Hardy Perry, and Beley Cheney; an act for the relief of Angus O. Frazer, and others; an act for the relief of Joseph Bruce; an act for the relief of the heirs of Abijah Hunt, and William Gordon Forman; an act for the relief of Thomas C. Withers; an act for the relief of Daniel Converse and George Miller; an act for the relief of the widow of John Heaps, deceased; an act for the relief of Daniel Bickley and Catharine Clark, administratrix of John Clark, deceased; an act authorizing the Secretary of State to issue letters patent to Henry Burden—were severally read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act giving the right of pre-emption to James Shields," was read the third time, and the question was stated, shall it pass? When Mr. COCKE moved that the said bill be postponed indefinitely; which motion being rejected, the question was then taken, Shall the bill pass? and passed in the affirmative.

The engrossed bills for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Willis, and for the relief of Ann McIntire, were severally read a third time; and the first was, on motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, ordered to lie on the table; and the second, on motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The report made yesterday by the Committee on Military Affairs, on the memorial of Nathaniel Hall Loring, Thomas Ragland, Charles Rutledge Holmes, Charles R. Vining, and Wilson M. C. Fairfax, late cadets at the Military Academy at West Point, was, on motion, recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John H. Piatt," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Judiciary Committee, offered the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate "further to amend the judicial system of the United States," report, that they have had the same under consideration. The bill proposes to form the district of East Tennessee and that of West Tennessee into one circuit; and to appoint a judge for the same circuit, with a salary of three thousand dollars a year, and with all the powers of a circuit judge within the circuit so established. The committee are of opinion that it would be inexpedient to make such an innovation upon the existing judicial system. It will probably become necessary, at no very distant time, to make some general change, and, in the mean time, the committee think no partial alteration ought to be permitted essentially inconsistent with the present arrangement, and difficult to reconcile with any future systematic measure. Such would be the proposed establishment for the districts of Tennessee. The committee, therefore, respectfully recommend to the House not to concur in the said bill.

The bill and report were ordered to lie on the table.

DISTRICT BANKS.

The bill "concerning the banks in the District of Columbia," was read a third time; and the question being stated—"Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. FLOOR moved to postpone the bill until the next session of Congress, on the ground as well of opposition to incorporating anew so much bank capital, as of a doubt whether the bill was acceptable to the people of the District generally. He added that there was no occasion for haste on the subject, inasmuch as none of the charters of the present banks would expire before the 4th day of March next; and there would be time enough at the next session of Congress to act upon the subject.

Mr. CULPEPER hoped the motion for postponement would not prevail. It was true, he said, that the charters of the banks would not expire before the next session of Congress; but it was equally true, that, under the apprehension that the charters would not be renewed, curtailments of their debts would necessarily be made, which in these times would produce much distress among the people. It had been said, that the Branch Bank of the United States could furnish sufficient bank accommodation for the people of the District. Mr. C. said it could not do it, and, if it could, he was not willing to put the people of the District wholly into the power of the Bank of the United States.

Mr. MERCER opposed the postponement, with the same earnestness which he had shown in the previous debate on this subject. With respect to the sense of the inhabitants of the District, he said it was almost unanimous in favor of the bill. He had scarcely heard the voice of complaint against it; and, he supposed enough had appeared to satisfy any man, that a large majority of the people were in favor of this bill.

Mr. COBB said, he was opposed to this bill, in any shape; but was further opposed to it because he believed it was not generally acceptable to the people of the District. So far as it respected the merchants, bank directors, and that class generally being in favor of this bill, he had no doubt of the fact. It is their bill, said Mr. C.—it is to their interest that it should pass. But, if he were to recapitulate all that he had heard against the bill, it would take up more time than he was willing to consume. He knew the gentleman from Virginia was mistaken, when he said there was no dissenting voice, on this subject, among the people of the District. Mr. C. said he had spoken with as respectable men as any in the District, who had told him there was now too much bank capital in the District, and that it ought to be reduced. Objections to this bill, indeed, had reached him in various ways; he had received a variety of anonymous letters on the subject, and, so far from every person being in favor of it, he believed there were very many opposed to it.

Mr. C. then proceeded to take a general view of the question involved in the bill. He adverted to the dissatisfaction which had generally prevailed in regard to the state of the currency; which, it was universally admitted, had proceeded from the multitude of banks of recent creation in the country, whose paper did not circulate beyond their immediate vicinity. And, yet, what was the House about to do? To renew, in this District, the causes which had produced this derangement of the currency. Nay, more, it was proposed by this bill, to increase the capital of these banks from five and a half to six millions of dollars. Let us, said he, set the example of a better policy than that of the adjoining States; and, by the by, he said, it was distinctly understood they were getting sick enough of this bank system. And what, he asked, could the people of this District possibly want with so much bank capital? Not for commerce—a hog's-head of tobacco, or a load of flour, in this city, would gratify any man's eyes. Commerce here was out of the question: every thing done here was a mere huckstering business. But, he said, if this bank capital was granted, it must be turned to profit, and employed in something else besides commerce, &c. He had heard, indeed, that almost all the valuable property in the city was already mortgaged for bank accommodation. Mr. C.'s plan, in fine, was, to let the charters of these banks expire, allowing them five years to wind up their affairs. The Branch of the United States' Bank could issue capital enough for the circulation and business of the District. He should, he said, if the Bank of the United States were now before the House, vote against its establishment, because he had serious doubts about the constitutionality of it; but that was perhaps the only reason—for, say what you please, its paper is the only paper that will answer your purposes, being everywhere at par. The paper of all other banks was uncurrent at a certain distance from their location; and he was unwilling, by voting for this bill, to do any thing to perpetuate such a state of things.

Mr. WARFIELD expressed his surprise at the discussion on the third reading of this bill, after what had taken place on it in Committee of the Whole. He disclaimed any interest in the bill, but that which arose from his observation of the extensive business of this District, and his knowledge of the meritorious character of its population, which induced him to support this bill. Nor had the arguments of the gentleman from Georgia at all affected his views of the subject. With regard to the disorder of the circulating medium, Mr. W. went on to say, it had nothing to do with the paper of this District, in which there was so much confidence that it circulated everywhere freely, as far as his knowledge extended. With regard to the business and trade of this District, certainly the gentleman could not have given himself the trouble to ascertain the real fact. The exports from this District, he believed, exceeded those of the State of Connecticut. During the Winter season, as many as ten thousand barrels of flour had arrived at this place in the course of one day; and the citizens were extensively engaged in the trade of that and other articles for exportation. He had not prepared himself with statements to prove it, but he knew it might be shown that this capital was necessary—and, being now in existence, he was sure it would be productive of great inconvenience to abolish it, &c. With regard to the opinion of the people of the District on the subject of this bill, he believed, from the conversations he had held with them on the subject, that a large majority of them were in favor of the bill.

Mr. BROWN said, if the capital had been reduced to a reasonable amount, he should have no objection to granting new charters for so many banks as should appear necessary. But he thought the proposed amount too large; and, as the charters of the present banks would not expire until the end of the next session of Congress, he could see no great inconvenience which was likely to result from the postponement of the bill. He was therefore in favor of postponing it.

Mr. ROBERTSON was in favor of the passage of this bill, believing it to be the wish of a large majority of the people of this District that it should pass. With respect to those who had been so importunate against it in their letters to Mr. COBB, why, Mr. R. asked, if their motives were correct, had they withheld their names? Mr. R. assigned various reasons why, in his opinion, the bill ought to pass. If it did not pass at the present session, he said, it would become the duty of the banks to call in their debts, and thus oppress the people. Was the House, he asked, disposed to increase the distress, which, from the pressure of the times, the people of this District feel in common with their fellow-citizens? As to postpone this bill to the next session would be to inflict an irreparable injury on the people of this District, he felt himself bound to oppose the motion for postponement.

Mr. FLOOR said, if he believed it would be to the interest of the people of this District to extend the charters of the banks, he would vote for doing so. He would do it even if he believed it to be their wish. His acquaintance in the District was not extensive, but he had not heard a single voice in favor of the bill. And why had not the voice of the people been heard against it? Have you ever heard, said he, the voice of the people raised against a bank placed in the midst of them? No. Under such circumstances they are held in "duress vile;" the banks hold a rod over them, and their opinions are suppressed. His object was to give the people an opportunity, during the recess, to examine this subject and judge for themselves. The amount of bank capital in this District was excessive. If gentlemen would cast their eyes over this city they would find that the interest of the people had not been much benefited by it—the city being covered with premature ruins and half-finished houses, &c.—which he attributed to the quantity of bank capital employed in it. No injury, he said, could result from a postponement of this subject till the next session of Congress. It was true, it had been said, that some of the charters would expire at the end of the next session of Congress. Congress would no doubt give the banks more time; but should four of the charters be then permitted to expire, there would yet remain nine banks in the District, which he thought was quite enough.

Mr. HARDIN was opposed to the postponement of this bill. If, said he, the banks are not to be rechartered, tell the people so now. For what object is the bill to be postponed? That the people of the District may examine the subject and embody their opinion, has been said. How long, said Mr. H., has this subject been before the House at this session? About four months. In some shape or other, it was also before Congress at its two last sessions. Three years it has been agitated. If this was not time enough for the people to make up their minds on it, the few months of the recess would not afford them time. This motion for postponement was in fact nothing but a left-handed way of defeating this bill. The consequence of its success would be oppression and ruin on a large portion of the people, and inordinate speculations would be made, on the other hand, by those who were not willing to give their names to the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. COBB.) Men may be able to pay what they owe by selling their property; but when all are sellers and none are buyers, property must be sacrificed at least fifty per cent. below its value—and, in a few years, instead of this city looking like an assemblage of ruins, as one gentleman had said of it, we shall hardly be able to find where it is. Mr. H. said he had not been long acquainted with the city; but, since he had known it, it had greatly improved, and he hoped before long to see it as splendid a city as the capital of a commercial and agricultural—and, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BALDWIN) would have it, manufacturing country ought to be. If this were a question, in the first instance, whether these banks should be chartered, he should vote against it. If it were a question whether a bank should be chartered within the United States, he should vote against it. But that was not the question. These banks have been chartered, some of them twenty years; the commerce and business of the District is predicated on this amount of bank capital. If it were abolished, ruin must follow. This capital was not, he said, confined to the District, but extended its benefits to the neighboring counties of Virginia and Maryland. Capital, he said further, would regulate itself; and no apprehension need be entertained that more capital would be employed in banking than could be profitably employed.—Again: Mr. H. said he was in favor of rechartering these banks for a political consideration. He had been opposed to chartering the Bank of the United States—he thought it too great an engine of power—a great mammoth, which, at some day or other, would trample under foot the liberties of the country. As long as this was in operation, he would keep in being these banks—which Congress had undoubted power to do—within the District of Columbia; and, as long as they continued specie payments, they would form a sort of counter-current to the overwhelming influence of the Bank of the United States. Let every other bank in the country be destroyed, and we are bound hand and foot at the altar of this stupendous institution. There was, in the charter of the Bank of the United States, he said, a clause providing that Congress should not, during its existence, incorporate any new bank. Let these banks, then, said Mr. H., go out of existence, and the power of counteracting, in any degree, the influence of the Bank of the United States has passed out of your hands forever. With respect to the sense of the people, Mr. H. said, he had corresponded and conversed with many persons in the District on the subject, and he had never heard a single objection to this bill; but, as far as it had been spoken of, it had been thought the best plan for rechartering the banks.

Mr. MERCER spoke to the question regarding the public opinion, and stated various facts to show that from Alexandria there was evidence that a large majority of the population was in favor of the bill; that from Georgetown not a whisper of disapprobation had been heard; and that from Washington he had heard but one dissentient voice on the subject. With regard to the observation of the gentleman from Connecticut, that, if the charters of four banks were suffered to expire, there would yet remain nine, Mr. M. said it was specious rather than solid. This bill proposed, indeed, to reduce them to six in number; but if the reduction were effected by the process suggested by the gentleman from Connecticut, the whole of the debtors of particular banks would be oppressed perhaps to ruin, while the debtors of other banks would wholly escape their fate. Congress had better refuse to charter any; because all would then stand on the same footing. With regard to the supposed oppression of the people by the banks, was it oppression, Mr. M. asked, for the creditor to indulge the debtor? Such was the course of the banks, and which the postponement of this bill will compel them to change. The gentleman from Connecticut had talked about the ruins spread over this city. Now, Mr. M. undertook to say, that there was no ruin in this city but what that gentleman's predecessors had made. In passing daily between the Capitol and his lodgings in Georgetown, he had noticed but one ruin, and that was the ruin of the building in which the War Office had been placed, and consumed by fire twenty years ago. He knew of no other ruins in the city, except one which arose from the improvident speculations of an individual attempting to build houses he was not able to finish, before there was a bank in the city—and the ruins of the Capitol, which might perhaps be traced to the failure of those, who then represented the gentleman's constituents, to provide the means for its defence.

Mr. MOSELEY spoke against the postponement. He should not have risen, he said, but for the remarks of his colleague and the gentleman from Georgia, one of whom could see nothing but hucksters' shops in the city, and the other nothing but the ruins of Carthage. He then made a brief statement of the extent of the commerce of this District; the purport of which was, that the exports from the District were double the amount of the exports from the State of Connecticut, and that they were greater in amount than those of five of the States of the Union.

Mr. LIVERMORE was opposed to the postponement, but was also opposed to the bill. He did not believe it could be at all necessary to have a bank capital of six millions of dollars in a district of the extent of this, consisting of several small towns or villages, which, put them together, did not amount to a very large trading town. The adjoining country was not very extensive, however fertile, and however respectable the people. He would act upon this bill, he said, as if he were a member of a legislature for this District; and in that view, he could never consent to vote for it. In the course of some other observations against the bill, he enumerated the uses which the people of the District had for money, to pay their judicial expenses, &c., and, in this city, he added, they wanted money to keep the ragged boys and girls from the doors of the Capitol, importuning all who passed in and out, to the disgrace of the District, &c.

Mr. KENT next spoke against the indefinite postponement of the bill. If that motion prevailed, it would destroy the credit of the banks within this District, and would be the signal of oppression to the people. But, it had been said, that the United States' Bank would furnish capital, if the House would consent to put down the banks proposed to be re-chartered by the bill before us. The United States' Bank, Mr. K. said, has not the capital to spare. It has been engaged for some time in reducing its discounts; curtail, curtail, is the cry from every part of the country. Had the mother bank capital to part with, it would have sent more of it here, where its business has been conducted in a correct, satisfactory, and profitable manner. And, as highly as he respected the talents and integrity of the gentleman who presided over that institution, he feared, from the mismanagement of its early administration, it would be some time before it will be able to furnish capital for every part of the country. But, said he, what is the fact? You have a branch here, with what capital the mother bank can conveniently part with, and, notwithstanding that and the number of banks now in existence here, there is one bank, if no more, within this District, that is at this time transacting a business as beneficial to the community, at least that part of it within its sphere, and as advantageous to its stockholders, as any local bank in the United States: and is it possible that this House will consent to put down an institution thus situated, to make the people of this District dependent upon a foreign institution, with the directors of whom they have no acquaintance, of whom they have no knowledge, and who have not a common interest with them in the property and prosperity of the place? For one, I should be unwilling to make my immediate constituents, if they wanted bank capital, dependent on a distant corporation for it, who could grant or withhold it at pleasure; and I am equally unwilling to impose upon this unrepresented people any measure that I should resist being extended to those I represent. The capital of six millions of dollars, Mr. K. said, was provided for this District in the charter granted by Congress to the United States' Bank, and he could not suppose it reprehensible in the committee to give them the amount of capital that had by law been apportioned for them. Again; those who vest their money in bank capital expect something in return for it; and, if it is not wanting, it will yield no profit, and they will withdraw it, for which the bill provides. But a much larger capital can be employed in this District than gentlemen suppose. The cities within it are all young, and large sums are required to build houses and bridges, and make roads, streets, and canals; and the export trade of the District amounts to upwards of two millions. Probably, Mr. K. said, the bill was as satisfactory as the committee could make it; a convention of the banks of the District recommended, at the last session, the reduction of the banks to two in each city, and that part of the bill which related to the City of Washington was a transcript from the bill of last year. Most of the banks mentioned in the bill were in existence at the same time as the old United States' Bank, which had a branch here, and which did a good business, and, he was told, wound up without loss, and that too among a people who are said to have no profitable employment for bank capital; and, if they have, they have always had too much. This fact established the contrary.

District Banks.

Mr. SIMKINS said, until we had other data to go upon, and a different experience from that of every day, he must believe that the sentiments of the gentleman from Georgia respecting excessive issues of bank paper were not so wild as some appeared to apprehend them to be. What, he asked, had caused the pecuniary distress of the country, but the excess of banking capital, which it was now proposed, as far as regards this District, to re-charter and continue in operation? The present necessities of the people might call for it, but the ultimate effect of such a measure must be to depreciate the value of property, &c. The process of collection of debts due to the banks might, he said, pinch the debtors at this day: but, as legislators for them, it became Congress to legislate not for their momentary but their permanent interest. It was farcical, he said, to talk of six millions of capital, when there was not a third of the amount in specie. Nay, he asked, did any gentleman believe there was a million of dollars in the vaults of the banks of the District? And was it sound policy to incorporate institutions with capitals amounting to six millions, when it is known that they cannot produce more than half a million of dollars in specie—perhaps not more than three hundred thousand. Mr. S. contended that it was an imposition to say, that six millions of banking capital could be justifiably employed on so small a foundation of specie, &c. It was generally admitted, Mr. S. went on to argue, that Congress had the power to regulate the currency of the country. Would it be doing so to pass this bill? Would it not rather be the means of disordering the currency? In reply to the argument, that nearly this amount had been used advantageously for twenty years, Mr. S. said, that would appear more satisfactorily when all the debts to the banks should be called in. He knew that, in proportion as men could get money, they would run in debt. It was human nature to do so. But, said he, let the debts due to the banks be paid off, and see whether the people will be in the houses they have built—see whether they are the true owners—see whether the interest of the people has been promoted by the numerous banks. Mr. S. said not. They might indeed give a facility to borrow money, but it was this very facility which the House ought not to sanction. He was disposed to allow to the District not more than one bank in each of the three towns, with a reasonable capital; but he was not disposed to grant charters for this enormous fictitious capital. He was not for postponement, though against the bill, because he wished the people to understand now what they might expect.

Mr. COOK called upon gentlemen to reflect what they were about to vote for—for a bill for incorporating within this District six banks with a capital of a million of dollars each. He requested them also to examine the details of the bill. The charters of the present banks were referred to, as containing the rules by which the new banks should be governed. Few gentlemen, he presumed, had examined these rules; and, for himself, he was not prepared to vote for the bill until they were exhibited. He was opposed to this bill, because it proposed too large an amount of bank capital for this District, and the effect of which, within this District, was not confined to the District. The lavish effusion of paper currency within the District, had the effect to enhance the price of every article of life, and thus to compel Congress to increase the salaries of the public officers, &c., and tax the pockets of the people of the United States generally. After some other remarks, he said, he was in favor of extending the present charters of these banks to give them time to wind up their business; and should vote against the postponement, in the hope of an amendment being made to that effect.

Mr. MCCOY would not vote for the indefinite postponement of the bill: but he was not in favor of the bill in its present shape. Six millions of capital, he said, could not be necessary to do the business of the people of this District; it was far-eical to say that it was. This question, he said, was argued, as if nobody had any interest or concern in these banks but the people of this District. For one, he declared he had no confidence in these banks. He had hoped some gentleman would have told the House how some of these banks had swindled the people. The paper of one of these banks, he said, had been at from ten to twenty per cent. discount for some months; and, when Congress assembled, was at eight per cent. discount. By this bill, the Franklin Bank was permitted five years to wind up its concerns. Mr. M. said he was willing to allow all the banks the same time. The paper of the Franklin Bank, he said, was now at fifty per cent. discount. Those persons who sold produce in the District were obliged to take such paper as was in circulation, which was the paper of the banks of the District of Columbia. Some of these banks, he said, had been very badly managed; and he was not willing to give them six millions of capital for twenty years. If the amount of capital had been lessened in the same proportion as the number of the banks, he should have voted for the bill. Three banks with a million of capital each would be abundantly sufficient.

Mr. RHEA then delivered his sentiments against the motion to postpone, and in favor of the bill, at some length. If other banks in the States were to be put down, he said, let the District banks also be put down. But he saw no reason for putting them down exclusively, to the great prejudice, and indeed to the utter ruin of the District, &c.

The question to postpone the bill was then taken, by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative: For the postponement 45, against it 109, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Archer of Virginia, Brown, Buffum, Burwell, Campbell, Claggett, Clark, Cobb, Crawford, Edwards of North Carolina, Fay, Floyd, Foot, Ford, Forrest, Garnett, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hall of New York, Hall of Delaware, Hall of North Carolina, Herrick, Hostetter, Jones of Virginia, Little, Linn, Maclay, McLean of Kentucky, Metcalf, R. So the bill was not postponed.

Mr. SIMKINS then moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to the committee to bring in a bill to establish three banks, with a capital not exceeding one million each, one in Washington, one in Georgetown, and one in Alexandria.

This motion was opposed by Mr. MERCER, and supported by Mr. SIMKINS.

The question was taken on it, and the presiding officer counted 73 votes for the motion, and 72 against it, pronouncing the motion carried.

A second count was called; and it was then ordered that the question be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. WARFIELD delivered an animated appeal to the House against the proposition of Mr. SIMKINS.

Mr. MERCER followed, also in opposition to the motion, with his usual zeal for what he believed to be the interest of the District.

Mr. LITTLE moved to add to the instructions a provision requiring "That the names of the presidents and directors of said banks voting for each and every dividend made and declared by them respectively, shall be recorded in books kept for the purpose by them, at the time of making or declaring such dividends; and if made contrary to the provisions of this act, the president and directors giving their assent to such dividend shall be held liable to their individual private capacity."

And on the question to agree to this amendment, it was determined in the negative.

The question was then taken on the motion to recommit the bill, with the instructions proposed by Mr. SIMKINS, and determined in the negative—yeas 66, nays 89, as follows:

So the House refused to recommit the bill; and, without further question, the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

THURSDAY, April 13.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Superintendent of Indian Trade, showing the amount of goods furnished annually, since the peace of 1815, to each Indian trading-house, with the articles received in exchange or payment therefor, together with an account of sales of such articles, &c., made in obedience to a resolution of this House; which letter and report were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the erection of a lighthouse on one of the Isles of Shoals, near Portsmouth, in New Hampshire," made a report thereon, proposing sundry amendments thereto, which, together with the bill, was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, and to repeal all acts heretofore passed for that purpose; An act for the relief of Alexander Milne; An act to increase the allowance to the Judges of the Orphans' Court in the counties of Washington and Alexandria; An act to authorize the President of the United States to ascertain and designate certain boundaries; An act to establish the district of Pearl River; and An act for the relief of Solomon Prevost;—in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved to discharge the Committees of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill for the alteration of the present tariff of duties on goods imported, with a view to its postponement. But the motion was declared not to be in order before the reading of the following bill:

Thereupon Mr. BARBOUR moved to lay that bill on the table; which motion was negatived.

NAVIGATION BILL.

The bill from the Senate, supplementary to the act "concerning navigation," was twice read, and was, on motion of Mr. HILL, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, then moved to postpone, until to-morrow, the other orders of the day preceding that referred to by Mr. LIVERMORE, with a view to then moving to postpone that bill until the next session of Congress.

In support of this motion, Mr. W. said the subject was one of great importance; that a proper consideration of it would occupy the attention of the House exclusively, for at least a month, and would for so long protract the session beyond the time necessarily to be devoted to the consideration of other subjects. The question ought, therefore, to be now determined, whether the House would or would not act upon the subject at the present session.

Mr. LOWNDES said he concurred so fully in the views of the gentleman from North Carolina, that, if he now persevered in his motion, he should certainly vote for it. But, as the decision of the question would in fact be a decision on the main question of the bill for the present session, he wished the motion could be deferred until to-morrow, that the members of the House might be all aware of its agitation. Mr. L. said he did believe that, unless it was passed without debate, the bill in question could not be acted on at the present session.

Mr. WILLIAMS, assenting to the wish of Mr. LOWNDES, withdrew his motion, with the intimation that, if no one else moved it, he should himself renew the motion to-morrow.

GENERAL WILKINSON.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the bill for the relief of General James Wilkinson, (for the indemnification of General W. from a judgment obtained against him in one of the courts of the State of Mississippi, in an action for false imprisonment, during the alarm of Burr's conspiracy.)

Mr. RANKIN spoke at large in favor of the bill. He took an historical view of the circumstances of the case, which he conceived entitled General Wilkinson to the relief proposed to be given to him by this bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON spoke against the bill, not so much with a view to the demerit of the claimant, as that its passage might serve to impress the public mind unfavorably to General Adair, as supposing the verdict of the court in his favor to have been oppressive and unjust. Mr. R. took a brief view of the events of General Adair's life; he thought he had suffered unjustly, and that the passage of this bill might serve, by implication, to inflict upon him further injury, &c., and at a moment, too, when he was a candidate in his own State for the popular suffrages in an important election. Mr. R. concluded by moving that the bill be postponed to the next session of Congress.

Mr. BRUSH followed on the same side of the question. He had no personal knowledge, he said, of General Adair: but he was his fellow citizen, and, from all the evidence he had seen, he had been most oppressively and unjustly dealt by. He was not willing, therefore, to extend the hand of the Government, to take money from the Treasury to indemnify him from whom General A. had sustained the injury, &c.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, supported the bill. He allowed all the merit due to General Adair, but expressed his great regret that this bill should have been supposed to have any the least connexion with his fame, which it certainly had not. He took a general view of the case, the leading features of which were, that what General Wilkinson had done, he had done in discharge of his duty; that he was not able to pay this judgment against him; and, if this bill did not pass, he who had devoted his whole life to the service of the country must, in his old age, become the tenant of a prison, because of his zeal in the discharge of his duty.

Mr. LIVERMORE was in favor of the postponement, because he did not think Congress were under any obligation to pay the money. This question, he conceived, had nothing to do with the relative merits of General Wilkinson and General Adair, which he did not undertake to canvass. With regard to the arrests made under the orders of General Wilkinson, he said, incidentally, that they savored too much of the general warrant, &c. and ought not to be countenanced by any decision of Congress to indemnify him who made them.

Mr. PINDALL took the same ground as had been taken by Mr. BRUSH, and enforced it by a variety of elucidations, that there was no evidence, even had suspicion itself been imbodied in an affidavit, which would have justified the civil authority, much less the military, in arresting General Adair. He argued also that it was not the province of this House to interfere with a decision of the supreme judicial tribunal of a State, and indemnify those against whom a verdict had been awarded, after full investigation, and with all the facts before them, by a jury of the country.

Mr. COCKE opposed the postponement of the bill, for reasons which he assigned at large. From the situation of the country at the time of the arrest of General Adair, it was necessary that formality should be dispensed with, prompt action being necessary. General Wilkinson, he said, was on that occasion placed in this situation: if he obeyed the orders he had received from the Executive, a prosecution hung over him, and judgment would follow. If he did not obey them, he was to be arrested, punished, and disgraced. Under these circumstances, he thought the Government ought to indemnify General Wilkinson, &c.

Mr. WALKER spoke at some length, and decided in favor of the bill; and Mr. NEALE also spoke at large in support of it.

Mr. CULBRETH assigned the reasons why he should vote for the postponement of the bill; not that he was opposed to the principle of the bill, but because he had never heard that the collection of the judgment was proposed to be enforced on General Wilkinson; and the passage of the bill, therefore, appeared to him to be unnecessary.

The question had been for some time loudly called for, and was at length taken, on the proposed postponement, and decided in the negative—86 to 58. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SURVIVING REVOLUTIONARY OFFICERS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the following bill:

Be it enacted, &c., That the accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they hereby are, directed and required to adjust and settle the claim of each and every surviving officer of the Army of the Revolution, who, by the several resolves of Congress, made on or before the 21st of October, 1780, was entitled to half pay for life, and who shall apply for such settlement within ——— months from the date of this act, by deducting from the arrearages of such half pay, computed from the reduction of the Army, five years full pay; and the balance of such arrearages being thus ascertained, a certificate shall issue for the same, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government: Provided, That if the whole amount of the balances so to be ascertained shall exceed one million of dollars, they shall be respectively and rateably reduced, so that the aggregate of the certificates to be issued shall not be more than the said sum of one million of dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the date of the said certificate, each and every officer to whom it is issued shall be placed on the half pay pension list of the United States, and shall be entitled to receive the half pay in half yearly payments, for and during the term of his natural life: Provided, That if the aggregate of the said half pay shall exceed forty-five thousand dollars per annum, the same shall be reduced, by a rateable deduction, so as not to amount to more than that sum.

The bill having been read through—

Mr. SERGEANT delivered his sentiments in favor of the bill, and enforced them with eloquence and argument.

Mr. RHEA delivered a speech of considerable length against the bill; when,

A motion to that effect having been made, the question was taken on striking out the first section of the bill and decided in the affirmative by a majority of about twenty votes.

This decision (vitaly affecting the bill) was reported to the House; when, on motion of Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, the report of the Committee of the Whole was ordered to lie on the table, in order that it might be finally acted on, in full House; and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 14.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce, to which was committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act concerning navigation,'" reported the same without amendment; and the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the erection of a light-house on one of the Isles of Shoals, near Portsmouth, in New Hampshire.

Mr. ALEXANDER SMYTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was committed their report on the memorial of Nathaniel Hall Loring, Thomas Ragland, Charles Rutledge Holmes, Charles R. Vining, and Wilson M. C. Fairfax, late cadets at the Military Academy at West Point, reported the same without amendment.

The House proceeded to consider the report; when,

Mr. COCKE moved a substitute for the report more favorable to the cadets than the original report, and less so to the officers having charge of the academy.

Mr. FOOT moved to lay the report and amendment on the table—negatived.

And they were referred to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting copies of all contracts made and entered into by the Commissary General of Purchases, for supplying the Army with provisions, &c., rendered in pursuance of a resolution of this House; which letter and its accompanying documents were ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting a list of unproductive post routes, for the year 1819; which letter and list were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ROBERTSON submitted to the House the articles of compact, made and entered into between the States of Kentucky and Tennessee, in relation to the boundary line between the said States; which were ordered to lie on the table.

The bill to establish a district court in the State of Alabama was taken up, amended so as to reduce the salary of the Judge from two hundred to one hundred and fifty dollars, and ordered to a third reading.

The following bills from the Senate:—

A bill to amend and prolong the charter of the City of Washington; a bill concerning the Orphans' Court of the District of Columbia; a bill to authorize the survey of the boundary line between the States of Indiana and Illinois; a bill to establish the collection district of Pearl river, (Mississippi); a bill for the relief of Solomon Provost; a bill for the relief of Alexander Milne; were severally twice read, and referred to various committees.

The engrossed bill for the relief of General James Wilkinson (appropriating $3,000 to indemnify him from a certain judgment obtained against him by General John Adair) was read a third time and passed by a vote of 70 to 54, and was sent to the Senate for concurrence.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of persons holding certain unlocated claims to land in the State of Illinois; the object of which was explained by Mr. CAMPBELL, and the bill was reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States, at the commencement of the present session, as relates to the subject of Revenue, made a detailed report thereon, accompanied by a bill to authorize the President of the United States to borrow two millions of dollars, and for other purposes; which bill was committed, with the said report, to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The report is as follows:

The committee also submit: That no part of the principal of the funded debt becomes payable until the year 1825, except the annual reimbursement of the deferred stock; and they present the following view of the sums annually reimbursable on the public funded debt, for the years 1825, 1826, 1827, and 1828, to wit:

Year 1825, six per cent. stock, per act of 14th March, 1812 -	$6,187,006 44

The committee further state that, from the 1st of January, 1801, to the 1st of January, 1808, inclusive, there was redeemed of the principal of the public debt, the sum of - $32,257,841 10

And between the 1st of January, 1817, and the 1st Jan., '20, the sum of - $32,085,750 17

An act passed on the 3d March, 1817, "to provide for the redemption of the public debt." That act vests in the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund the sum of ten millions of dollars, to be applied yearly by them to the payment of the interest and charges, and to the reimbursement or purchase of the public debt; and provides that the said annual appropriation shall be paid from the proceeds of the duties on merchandise, the tonnage of vessels, internal duties, and sales of Western lands. Although that act is not considered as a pledge of those funds, yet it is understood at the Treasury that the appropriation for the Sinking Fund has a preference over every other, and must (if required by the Commissioners) be first paid. The documents before the House show that there is no part of the principal of the public debt payable during the years 1821, 1822, 1823, 1824, except the reimbursement of the deferred stock.

The Sinking Fund can operate, of course, during those years only in manner following, (unless the United States stock should be purchased at par,) to wit:

1821, interest and reimbursement payable this year -	$5,307,770 76
1822, do. do. do. -	5,307,770 76
1823, do. do. do. -	5,307,770 76
1824, do. do. do. -	5,023,126 24
And for the present year of 1820, as already stated -	7,711,502 71

Total of actual demand on the fund - $28,657,941 23

Leaving the sum of $21,342,058 77 for those years which cannot be applied to the payment of the principal of the debt in any other way than by purchase. No purchase can be made, agreeably to the act, unless the same can be effected at or under par. The present market value of the United States six per cent. stock is known to be three and a half to four and a half per cent. above par, and it is believed will continue above par during the years 1821 and 1822, and perhaps longer. Under those circumstances it is submitted, whether it is not more for the interest of the United States to authorize the Treasury to transfer to the surplus fund the balance of the Sinking Fund, which may remain unexpended on the 31st December, 1820, than that the same should remain in the Treasury un-employed.

The unexpended balances of the Sinking Fund are transferable (under the existing laws) to the surplus fund, two years after the calendar year for which the appropriations have been made, in like manner as all unexpended balances for other objects of expenditure are transferable.

The preceding statement shows, that the expenditures authorized by law, for the year 1820, will exceed the receipts into the Treasury, of that year, the sum of $3,773,498 95; that sum may be reduced to $1,485,001 66, by the application of the balance of $2,288,497 29, which will, agreeably to the preceding view, remain unexpended of the Sinking Fund on the 1st January, 1821. In recommending the application of the surplus of the Sinking Fund to the current expenses of the present year, your committee deprecate a recurrence to a like resort in future years, if the same can with any propriety be avoided; and it is hoped that such retrenchments will be made in the public expenditures as may render a recurrence to that fund unnecessary.

A resort to Treasury notes, to meet the deficit, appeared to your committee inexpedient. Such notes could not, in their opinion, become a medium, unless the banks should be authorized to tender them in payment for any demands made on those institutions; without such authority, Treasury notes would be sold and bought in the market, for the purpose of paying the public dues; and, when paid into the bank, could be considered by the bank only as a special deposit of the Treasury, on which it would not be bound to pay either its own notes or specie.

It appearing to your committee inexpedient to resort to Treasury notes, and it being impracticable (if no objections existed against the adoption of such a course) to carry into effect a system of internal duties in time to meet the deficit of the present year, your committee had only to choose between a loan of a temporary character or one of longer duration. They have preferred the latter, because it carries the time beyond that in which other debts are payable, and because it is believed that the loan will thereby be obtained on decidedly better terms than on one of a shorter duration. By authorizing the subscription of the Mississippi stock, of which two-thirds must otherwise be redeemed during the current year, it is inferred that little new debt will be created. Conformably with those views, the committee respectfully submit a bill to authorize a loan of $2,000,000.

The committee have deemed it useful to present a view of the probable receipts for the year 1821, and of the expenditures which, under the existing laws, are indispensably chargeable thereon. They have founded their statement of expenses on the appropriations actually made for 1820; and have shown that therefrom a variety of items, amounting to $1,856,790, (which will not be required for 1821,) may be deducted; at the same time, they are ready to admit that new and unforeseen demands may arise, which may show that too much reliance ought not to be placed upon an expectation of an expenditure less than that of the current year. The view for 1821 is founded on the indispensable expenses, and does not include the amount of principal, which the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund are bound to purchase, if the same can be bought at or under par. Taking that view, the estimates of receipts and expenditures will be shown by the following statement, to wit:

Permanent expenditures	-	-	-	$11,378,975
Temporary	-	-	-	13,596,034
				<hr/> 24,975,009
From which deduct items not required
(as specified) for 1821	-	-	-	1,600,000
				<hr/> 23,375,009
Estimated amount of receipts for 1821, per statement	-	-	-	19,720,000
Leaving a deficit, in 1821, of	-	-	-	<hr/> $3,655,009

Your committee having assigned the reasons which have led them to recommend the bill herewith reported, beg leave respectfully to present their views of the necessity which exists for retrenchment and economy in the public expenditures. They approach this subject with feelings which the House can duly appreciate. A Government, like individuals, will generally increase its expenditure in proportion to its increase of means. The revenue, after peace, had swollen to an amount surpassing all former experience; and passing from a state of war, during which expensive establishments were indispensably necessary, it was not to have been expected that we could have immediately made such reductions as a state of profound peace would render prudent and proper. The war pointed our attention to the weak points of the nation; and the appropriations of former years have been increased by objects of great national importance, which have added to our security, and by an act of benevolence towards the survivors of the army of the Revolution.

Large outstanding claims, resulting from the war, to an amount exceeding thirty millions of dollars, have been discharged; and the sum of $32,085,750 of the public debt has been redeemed since the first day of January, 1817. Establishments have been created under the sanction of law, which to maintain and advance, will make it necessary, either to resort to annual and successive loans, or to a system of internal revenue. As to the first of those alternatives, it cannot be necessary to urge any observations; their natural tendency to involve the nation in debt is obvious; and they will be avoided when they are not indispensably necessary. We are warned against the effects of a large and accumulating debt, by the experience of other nations. A nation laboring under the pressure of a large debt, no more than an individual, can be considered independent. Money is power; and that nation will become powerless who shall mortgage its resources, without the prospect of relieving them by discharging its engagements.

Reasons, powerful and cogent, exist against a resort to internal duties and direct taxes, to supply a deficiency occurring during a state of profound tranquillity, and ought to be avoided if the necessity be not evident and pressing, and such has heretofore been the policy of the nation. We have been accustomed to a system of taxation which, in its operation, has been paid without being perceptibly felt, and will reluctantly resort to one of a different character in times of profound peace.

From the extraordinary depression of commerce within the last three years, the stagnation of our navigation, the depreciation in the value of our exports, the corresponding depreciation in the value of property of every description, and the serious embarrassments under which every branch of industry now labors, economy and retrenchment in expenditures of every citizen are imperiously required. The finances of the nation being seriously affected by those causes, there would seem to arise a correspondent obligation on the Government to retrench its expenditures and economize its means. In the infancy of our institutions our expenses were, in the general, limited by our receipts. We have been satisfied to advance gradually in furthering the system of national security and independence. Our pace has been greatly quickened towards the accomplishment of those objects since the restoration of peace by the great accession of our revenue. From that period our revenue has been in what may be considered a forced state. We are now getting back to a condition more congenial with our population and national wealth.

The committee believe that wisdom requires us to recur also to the policy which has heretofore governed us. Our nation is still in its infancy; its resources are daily increasing. If, then, we should keep pace in the building up of our national establishments with the revenue of the country, we shall have consummated all our wishes without oppression to the citizen.

APRIL, 1820.

Revolutionary Officers—Duties on Imports.

H. OF R.

Therefore, resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause such a plan to be prepared as will enable Congress, at its next session, to make such reductions in the various branches of public expenditure, as may be required by the state of the finances and the public good.

REVOLUTIONARY OFFICERS.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider, the bill for the relief of the surviving officers of the Revolution; and, the question being stated and taken, to concur in the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, to strike out the first section, which section is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they hereby are, directed and required to adjust and settle the claim of each and every surviving officer of the Army of the Revolution, who, by the several resolves of Congress, made on or before the 21st of October, 1780, was entitled to half pay for life, and who shall apply for such settlement within twelve months from the date of this act, by deducting from the arrearages of such half pay, computed from the reduction of the Army, five years' full pay; and the balance of such arrearages being thus ascertained, a certificate shall issue for the same, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government: Provided, That, if the whole amount of the balances so to be ascertained shall exceed one million of dollars, they shall be respectively and rateably reduced, so that the aggregate of the certificates to be issued shall not be more than the said sum of one million of dollars.

Whereupon a debate of considerable interest arose, in which MESSRS. LIVERMORE, NELSON of Virginia, GROSS of New York, HEMPHILL, CUSHMAN, MEIGS, and WARFIELD, advocated the bill, and MESSRS. HARDIN and SOUTHARD opposed it.

The question on concurring in the report of the Committee of the Whole, to strike out the first section of the bill, was then decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—MESSRS. Abbot, Adams, Alexander, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Baker, Barbour, Bateman, Beecher Brown, Buffum, Burwell, Butler of New Hampshire, Campbell, Cannon, Cobb, Cocke, Crafts, Darlington, Dennison, Dewitt, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of North Carolina, Fay, Fisher, Folger, Foot, Garnett, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hall of New York, Hall of Delaware, Hall of North Carolina, Hardin, Hazard, Herrick, Hibshman, Holmes, Hooks, Hostetter, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Kinsley, Linn, Lowndes, Maclay, McCoy, McLean of Kentucky, Mallary, Marchand, Meech, Metcalf, R. Moore, Morton, Murray, Parker of Massachusetts, Parker of Virginia, Phelps, Philson, Pindall, Pitcher, Plumer, Reed, Rhea, Rich, Richards, Richmond, Russ, Sampson, Sawyer, Settle, Shaw, Simkins, Slocumb, B. Smith of Virginia, A. Smyth of Virginia, Smith of North Carolina, Southard, Stevens, Strong of Vermont, Tarr, Terrell, Tompkins, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Walker, Wallace, Wendover, Williams of Virginia, Williams of North Carolina, and Wood—94.

NAYS—MESSRS. Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of

New York, Allen of Tennessee, Archer of Virginia, Baldwin, Ball, Bayly, Bloomfield, Boden, Brush, Bryan, Burton, Butler of Louisiana, Case, Clark, Cook, Crawford, Crowell, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cushman, Cuthbert, Dickinson, Dowse, Earle, Ervin, Floyd, Ford, Forrest, Fuller, Gross of New York, Hackley, Hemphill, Hendricks, Heister, Hill, Kendall, Kent, Kinsey, Little, Livermore, Lyman, McCreary, Mason, Meigs, Mercer, S. Moore, Monell, Moseley, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Pinckney, Ringgold, Robertson, Rogers, Ross, Sergeant, Silsbee, Sloan, Smith of New Jersey, Smith of Maryland, Storrs, Street, Strong of New York, Tomlinson, Tracy, Van Rensselaer, and Warfield—70.

So the first section was stricken out, and the bill of course rejected.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. LIVERMORE then moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill which proposes to change the tariff of duties on goods imported, with a view to move its indefinite postponement. He proceeded to assign the reasons for his motion. This bill, he said, had for its object essentially to change our revenue system, and to change it, in his opinion, for the worse. The time, too, for making this experiment was, he said, of all times the most unfortunate, at a moment when it is known that the Treasury is drained to the very dregs.

Mr. SPEAKER here arrested Mr. LIVERMORE's speech, by declaring that debate on the merits of the bill was not in order on this motion, according to the rules of the House.

Mr. BARBOUR, with a view to bring the question into a shape susceptible of debate, moved to amend Mr. LIVERMORE's motion, so as to add to it a provision to postpone the bill indefinitely.

This motion, and debate on it, were also pronounced irregular, for reasons which Mr. SPEAKER assigned.

After some observations on the point of order, from MESSRS. BARBOUR, LIVERMORE, and LOWNDES,

The question on Mr. LIVERMORE's motion was taken without debate, on the merits of bill, and decided as follows:

YEAS—MESSRS. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Ball, Barbour, Bayly, Bryan, Buffum, Burton, Burwell, Butler of New Hampshire, Butler of Louisiana, Cannon, Cobb, Cocke, Crafts, Crawford, Crowell, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davidson, Earle, Edwards of North Carolina, Fisher, Floyd, Garnett, Hall of North Carolina, Hardin, Holmes, Hooks, Jones of Virginia, Kent, Livermore, Lowndes, McCoy, McCreary, Meech, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Virginia, Overstreet, Parker of Virginia, Pinckney, Pindall, Rankin, Reed, Rhea, Richards, Ringgold, Robertson, Settle, Silsbee, Simpkins, Slocumb, B. Smith of Virginia, A. Smyth of Virginia, Smith of North Carolina, Strong of Vermont, Swearingen, Terrell, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Walker, Warfield, Whitman, Williams of Virginia, and Williams of North Carolina—71.

NAYS—MESSRS. Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Baker, Baldwin, Bateman, Beecher, Bloomfield, Boden, Brown, Brush, Campbell, Case, Clark, Cook, Culbreth, Cushman, Darlington, Dennison, Dewitt, Dickinson, Dowse, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Folger, Foot, Ford, Forrest, Fuller, Gross of N. York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hall of Delaware, Hazard, Hemphill, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Heister, Hill, Hostetter, Jones of Tennessee, Kendall, Kinsey, Kinsley, Little, Linn, Lyman, Maclay, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Kentucky, Mallary, Marchand, Mason, Meigs, Metcalf, R. Moore, S. Moore, Monell, Morton, Moseley, Murray, Newton, Parker of Massachusetts, Patterson, Phelps, Philson, Pitcher, Plumer, Rich, Richmond, Rogers, Ross, Russ, Sampson, Sawyer, Sergeant, Shaw, Sloan, Smith of New Jersey, Smith of Maryland, Southard, Stevens, Storrs, Street, Strong of New York, Tarr, Tomlinson, Tompkins, Tracy, Trimble, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Wendover, and Wood—96.

So the House refused to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the consideration of the said bill. Whereupon,

Mr. STORRS offered the following resolution, and moved that it be committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union :

“Resolved, That it is expedient to provide, by law for the establishment of a system of internal revenue.”

This resolve was referred, as moved, without debate.

MILITARY LAND WARRANTS.

The bill supplementary to the act, providing for cases of lost military land warrants, passed through a Committee of the Whole, Mr. HILL in the chair.

[The bill is to extend the provisions of the law to Canadian volunteer land warrants.]

Whilst in Committee of the Whole, a motion was made by Mr. CAMPBELL to amend the bill so as to embrace in its provisions the assignees of military land warrants as well as the original holders ; but this motion was opposed by Mr. McLEAN, of Kentucky, and Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, on the ground of its opening a door to evasion of the law for the benefit of the Canadian volunteers, and was negatived.

The bill next in order was the bill to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy. Mr. SERGEANT moved that the House do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on that bill. This motion was negatived, 56 to 47 ; and the House being thin, and the hour late, the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, April 15.

On motion of Mr. BRYAN, the Committee on Indian Affairs were directed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the act, entitled “An act making provision for the civilization of the Indian tribes adjoining the frontier settlements,” passed the 3d day of March, 1819.

Mr. ALEXANDER SMYTH submitted the following resolution :

“Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to prepare a statement of the whole number of militia in service during the late war against Great Britain, showing the periods of their service, their pay, and from what States and Territories drawn, to be laid before this House at the next session of Congress.

Mr. COCKE moved that it lie on the table ; which being rejected, the resolution was then agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PINCKNEY, the Committee on the Judiciary were directed to report on the expediency of so far altering and amending the Judiciary system as to enable defendants, in all suits originally brought in the district courts of the United States, to have the same right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States as they would have been entitled to had the suits against them been originally instituted in the circuit courts thereof.

Mr. MEIGS moved that the House do now proceed to consider the resolution submitted by him on the 5th of February last, in relation to the abolition of slavery within the United States. The motion was determined in the negative.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit : 1. An act for the relief of John Rodriguez ; 2. An act for the relief of Pierre Denis de la Ronde ; 3. An act to establish the district of Blakeley ; 4. An act to establish additional land offices in the State of Alabama ; and 5. An act relative to the Arkansas Territory ; in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said bills were severally read twice, and the first and second referred to the Committee of Claims, the third to the Committee of Commerce, the fourth to the Committee on the Public Lands, and the fifth was ordered to be read a third time on Monday next.

The bill from the Senate, entitled “An act to establish a district court in the State of Alabama,” was read the third time, and passed as amended.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit : An act for the relief of persons holding confirmed unlocated claims for lands in the State of Illinois ; and An act supplementary to “An act providing for cases of lost military land warrants, and discharges for faithful services ;” were severally read the third time, and passed.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider, the resolution giving the consent of Congress to a compact concluded between the States of Kentucky and Tennessee, for the settlement of their boundary line ; whereupon, it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider, the engrossed bill, entitled “An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Willis, deceased.” And the question recurred, Shall this bill pass ? And being taken, it passed in the affirmative.

Mr. LOWNDES submitted the following resolution :

“Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures be instructed to report to this House such evidence or estimates as it may be in their power to present, showing the several rates of wages given, and expense of all kinds incurred in the different branches of manufacture which, in their opinion, require additional encouragement, with the prices of their product, so as to exhibit the profit which, at the present prices of subsistence, materials, and labor, and the present value of land, buildings, and machinery, may be obtained in such manufacture, skilfully and economically conducted.

The resolution was read and ordered to lie on the table.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. COBB then moved that the House do now proceed to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on a resolution submitted by him, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States in relation to appointments to office.

And the question being taken thereon, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 71, nays 69.

Mr. COBB, of Georgia, addressed the Chair as follows—

Mr. Chairman: Having had the honor to be the mover of this resolution, it will, no doubt, be expected, that I should support its propriety by a few remarks. Yet, in favor of a measure so plain in itself, and founded upon principles now so familiar and well understood as to have assumed the nature of undeniable axioms in all free governments, little original matter can be urged, without extending my views into particulars in which perhaps I ought not to be tolerated. Nor am I so vain as to believe that I possess the talent of giving to an old argument a new dress, which will make it appear more attractive. The proposed amendment of the Constitution is not a novel one. More than once heretofore its principle has been brought to the consideration of the nation. It was discussed in the Federal Convention; and, at a later period, it has been renewed upon the floor of Congress, in a shape not differing materially from the one in which it is now presented. In both instances, and especially the latter, it seems to have been well received; and yet was rejected, for causes not now easy to be traced or understood. Upon each of these occasions, it was supported with an ability to which I make no pretensions. The principal arguments urged on the last have been preserved, and I have no hope of adding to their number, their strength, or their beauty.

The proposition, as submitted, is very general in its nature. I made it so, designedly, that the Committee might not be forced, in their deliberations, to confine their attention to a single insulated point; but that, after a full and free discussion, it might receive such amendments and modifications as will make it best answer the purposes for which it is intended. It is now, in substance, and almost in the very words, in which it was proposed by two of the States (Virginia and New York) at the time of their ratification of the Constitution. There is one amendment which I shall myself offer before I take my seat; but it is such an one as I hope will not be unacceptable to the friends of the motion. Yet I hope that the measure will not be smothered in its birth, by the kindness of its friends, in vainly attempting to give it too great a degree of perfection.

The object of the motion will be obvious. It is, to secure more effectually the independence of the legislative branch of the Government. How very desirable it is, that those who are the immediate representatives of the people—"the guardians of the sword and the purse" of the nation, and to whom are confided the preservation of the Constitution itself, should be placed above all control, save that of their responsibility to their constituents, and the honest dictates of their own consciences, is a point that all will concede, and requires no argument to prove.

The separation of the great departments of the Government, to wit: the Legislative, the Executive and Judiciary, and the independence of each, but especially the first, has become an undeniable principle. It is indeed, the basis of liberty, and is now received as one of those political truisms so ingrafted upon the very nature of free governments, as that they cease to be free without it. The amalgamation of these departments, into whatever hands, (whether one or two hundred, is immaterial,) has been aptly given, by the authors of the Federalist, and others, as a correct definition of despotism. If, of the three, any one ought to be placed above the influence of the others, it is the Legislature; for, upon this branch depends every thing. It emanates from the source of all power—the people. It is composed of those by whom the interests, the wishes, and the circumstances of the nation are presumed to be best understood. I am far from contending that they should be placed beyond all control. The Legislature may err; and therefore a check has been provided by the creation of the other two departments, not dependent upon the Legislature for the gift or tenure of their offices. Against this Constitutional check upon legislative excess, I urge nothing. My wish is to prevent an unconstitutional and illicit control upon the legitimate exercise of legislative will and opinion; to increase, and to render permanent and safe, that confidence in those to whom are intrusted the most important interests of the people, which constitutes the "strength of the Government." So long as these shall be placed above all influence, except that of their own virtue and intelligence, all will be safe. But, if ever they become "identified with the will of the Executive," and the submissive servants of his wishes, whether by open corruption, or the more concealed instrumentality of the distribution of offices and honors, "the spirit of liberty is gone;" its form will scarcely remain, and the whole machinery of government becomes a feeble and nerveless mass, the sport of intrigue and ambition, and the curse of the nation.

In our Government, and indeed in every other in which this separation of the departments constitutes a principle, that branch into which their consolidation is most to be apprehended is the one in which the power of nomination to office is vested. It is a prodigious engine, and, if skilfully used, can be wielded to the utter prostration of those virtues that give dignity to the citizen. Even where the other departments are placed beyond its reach, it is sufficiently fearful in its operations upon the great body of the people, and cannot, therefore, be watched with too much jealousy.

Under the Federal Constitution, this dreaded instrument is confided to the hands of the Executive, subject to very little restraint. I say little restraint, because the Senate, intended to control it within proper bounds, is itself left within the sphere of its influence; and I shall not be guilty of the folly of admitting that there is to be found in that body a degree of integrity greater than pervades this House, or the nation at large, or that it is in any manner better protected against the danger of corruption.

A glance at the Official Register, placed during the present session on our desks, will afford ample cause of jealousy of the patronage thus placed in the gift of the Executive. It forms a volume of about two hundred and twenty pages, in a small print, and containing but little else than the names and salaries of the officers appointed, directly, or indirectly, by the President. What is the amount of salary annually paid to this long list of officers I have never pretended to calculate, nor do I know that it would reward the curiosity of him who should undertake the task. Judging from the declarations of others, heretofore made, I should presume that the aggregate sum, inclusive of the Post Office Establishment, would be little, if any thing, short of ten millions of dollars. If this prodigious sum is at all times disbursed for the public interests alone, it will indeed be fortunate for the nation. But it is not difficult to conceive the possibility of it being used for the worst purposes.*

We shall have profited but little by revelation, history, or our observations upon mankind, if we are now blind to human frailty. In all ages, and in all Governments, man has ever shown himself to be the same yielding victim of temptation. That the citizens of our own country are the most virtuous and enlightened of any upon the face of the earth, and our own form of government the most perfectly adapted to promote their happiness, are sentiments flattering to our pride, and which we shall most reluctantly yield. Such sentiments are worthy of being cherished, and all our political measures should aim at their preservation. They will imperceptibly enter into our national character, and eventually contribute much to give reality to that which, at one time, had much the appearance of affection. I hope I shall be the last to destroy them, even were they illusions. But, let us not be misled by our faith in this virtue and perfection. Let us not forget that the citizens of our country are, at last, but men, the issue of a depraved stock, and that, consequently, our Government may not prove to be incorruptible. If we have any real cause to boast, it is not that we are perfect, but that we are not so corrupted as other nations. To us, as to the people of all other countries, the love of honors and distinctions is so great as to appear natural, and our sacrifices of principle will be proportioned to our desires to obtain them. Hence the eagerness manifested in their pursuit. Let us not flatter ourselves that a seat upon this floor will defend us against the contagion of this universal desire. We are no better, perhaps, after a short period, not so good, as those by whom we are sent. We boast no greater perfection; we pass through no ordeal by which our integrity is more refined. Indeed, it will be wonderful if we are not less secure from contamination than our constituents. Placed just at the great fountain; daily witnesses of the profuse distribution of official favors; observers of the dignity and consequence acquired by the fortunate solicitor, and the rapid and advantageous change made in his style and appearance; it would afford an unexampled test of disinterestedness if our desires were not increased to run the same glorious race, when the prize is importance and fortune, and the only price required is a proper degree of subservience. The proposed amendment will go very far to check this inordinate passion, by removing the temptation. "Place it out of the power of the Executive to buy us," and, by the same operation, "we shall place it out of our own power to be bought." In uttering these sentiments, I set up no pretensions to peculiar integrity. It may be that I should prove not more inaccessible than other men. I know not what effect such a temptation might make upon me. I can only say that it has not been presented, and I have not sought it.

I therefore advance the opinion that office hunting pervades the nation, and that even in this House it is to be found. The means of success has become so much a matter of regular science, that the candidate for favor is distinguishable without difficulty by his conduct. If, indeed, the members of the National Legislature could be withdrawn from the crowd that year after year infest this city, the danger would be lessened. But the appointment of these is a growing practice. To quote instances would be an unprofitable, perhaps an invidious task. We have only to tax our recollections in a silent manner, and cases will arise by the dozen. By proceeding in this manner, a friend and myself have pointed to the appointment of twelve Senators, and about double that number of Representatives, to offices of one kind or another, and probably these do not constitute one-half.

The inquiry would not prove unprofitable to examine with some scrutiny into the political opinions of such as have received appointments under the several administrations of this Government. I think it would result in an acknowledgment, that, with very few exceptions, they will prove to have been the uniform friends and admirers of the Executive Magistrate at whose hands promotion was received; and that, in most of the cases, it was bestowed after a course of the warmest support of their favored chief. Cannot our memories at this time furnish many of us with cases of this kind? Have none of us observed, from conduct sufficient to leave no doubt upon the mind, instances of servility under the mask of affected independence? Can we remember no solicitations by, and recommendations given to, members of Congress? Have we never heard of a wish to obtain a seat first upon this floor, and thence a promotion to the Senate as bringing them nearer to the object of their desires by a kind of regular march to the summit of honor? In short, can we remember no appointments being actually made of these importunate solicitors? Short as has been my political life, I have thought that I have witnessed something of this kind.

* In the session of 1810-11, a representative in Congress from Massachusetts stated (upon what authority is not known, unless it be actual calculation) that there was "annually distributed, from the great departments, an amount not less than $5,500,000, and from the Post Office Establishment not less than $4,500,000, making an aggregate of $10,000,000." It is believed that this calculation was intended to embrace salaries and emoluments only. Whether correct or not is not known; but this is certain, that neither the number or emoluments of officers have undergone any diminution since that period.

Amendment to the Constitution.

To suppose, then, a seat in Congress, and the responsibility of the member to his constituents, are effectual barriers against corruption, is relying too much upon a perfection, that experience contradicts. As I have said, it only brings us within view of the tempting bait. The clause in the Federal Constitution, to which the amendment more particularly attaches, is itself founded upon the possibility of corruption in the Legislature. Its defect is, as I will hereafter attempt to show, that it does not provide a sufficient guard against it.

The history of this Government points to the necessity of this amendment. From this we know that, in times past, the spirit of party has run into extremes in search of offices and dignified stations. We have heard of the creation of offices by an expiring faction, just sinking under public indignation, to be filled by themselves or their friends, in the hope of yet retaining power in some of the departments of Government. Nay, the time has been when the Executive has been reduced to great difficulty by being forced to choose between two legislative friends in search of the same nomination. And here I do not wish to be understood as hinting that there have been open cases of bargain between the Executive and an individual for office. I know of no such case; and, if I did, prudence would induce me to forbear mentioning it. But, where the Executive can give, and the individual wishes to receive, there are a thousand ways in which matters can be understood, and yet never a word spoken. In cases of this kind the Executive is certain to lose one friend, if he appoints either, and, if he refuses both, he forfeits the support of both. By the adoption of the proposed amendment of the Constitution, all these evils and difficulties will be prevented. It will do more; it will afford to our constituents the best possible evidence of the purity of our motives and regard for their interests, unconnected with selfish considerations.

It may be urged that, if the amendment is adopted, it will abridge the rights of the Representative, by debarbing him from that to which every citizen in the Republic is entitled to aspire. This would indeed be the case for a certain term, to wit: "during the time for which he was elected." But, if it is believed that, to secure the purity of legislation, such an abridgement of right is proper, then the Representative has no right to complain, after he shall have consented to take upon him the legislative function, with a knowledge of such a provision in the Constitution.

A more common argument against it is, that it will place beyond attainment the best talents of the country—for that these can only be developed on the floor of Congress. Whatever weight such an objection might have had in the early history of the nation, it has now very little. At this day offices can be as well filled out of, as in, Congress. The very equal distribution of property throughout the country, (when compared with what it is in other countries,) and the very few splendid fortunes owned by those who have had seats in either House of Congress, united with other causes, among which the free and frequent exercise of the elective franchise may be stated, have produced, and will continue to produce, a rapid change in the members of the Legislature. I have not observed that those who have retired are less worthy, or less wise, than those who have succeeded them.

As before hinted, the Constitution does not now provide a sufficient guard against the exercise of Executive influence upon the deliberations of Congress. At present its only provision upon the subject is, that "No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States, shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office." Here the evil anticipated, and against which provision was made, was the multiplication of offices, and the exorbitancy of salaries. The clause does not obstruct members from obtaining offices previously created, and with the salaries of which they may be satisfied. What is the number of these I have before hinted. That we can move within their tempting vortex with less danger to our integrity than would arise from the open creation of office for our own benefit, is scarcely credible. In truth, the proposed amendment is necessary to the perfection of the clause read. It is true that, to create a perfect guard against all corrupt motives in legislation, is not possible; for instance, it is possible a man might be swerved from correct conduct by the wish to obtain offices for his relatives. In such cases we know not where to stop. At what degree of relationship shall this desire be said to cease? The question admits of no certain answer. But it is not difficult to provide against selfish temptations; and, when this is effected, we shall have done much.

The amendment as proposed has one defect. It does not defeat the possibility of obtaining appointments at the moment of retiring from Congress. Between appointments while a member, and at the moment of ceasing to be so, there is little difference. The evil, if any, is as great in the one case as in the other, if bestowed as the reward of obedience to Executive will. There should, therefore, be a period fixed within which the member may again mix with the great mass of the people before his eligibility to office is restored. During this term, his capacity and qualifications will be undergoing a process of probation and refinement.

If possessed of neither talents nor integrity, he will sink into obscurity, "the world forgetting, and by the world forgot." If, on the contrary, he does possess them, like the Roman, he will be invited again from his retreat, and drawn into the service of his country. I shall, therefore, propose to amend the resolution by inserting the words, "or within one year thereafter."

Before taking my seat, for the purpose of giving all the information I can upon a subject of so much consequence, I will advert to the attempts heretofore made for a similar principle as that under consideration. In the Federal Convention, a similar clause was early introduced, as well in the projet submitted by Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, as in that of an honorable gentleman from South Carolina, now a member of this House, (Mr. PINCKNEY.) Notwithstanding the various modifications and revisions of the Constitution, in that body, before its final adoption in its present shape, this clause was retained until almost its last reading. In the ratification of the Constitution by the States of New York and Virginia, and perhaps by some other States, it was recommended as one of the amendments proposed by those States. Finally, in 1810, a distinguished gentleman from North Carolina, now a member of the Senate, (Mr. Macon,) made an attempt to incorporate the principle into the Constitution, by proposing it as an amendment, in Congress. After considerable discussion, it was recommended to a select committee for amendment, who gave it the following form: "No Senator or Representative shall be appointed to any civil office, place, or appointment, under the authority of the United States, until the expiration of the Presidential term in which such person shall have served, as a Senator or Representative." In this shape it was rejected, for the want of very few votes, in order to make a Constitutional majority. The difference between that proposition and the one under consideration will be readily perceived. That left the whole of the United States open to each new President to select, according to his pleasure, such as he deemed qualified for any office within his nomination; but that, after a Senator or Representative shall have once served in Congress, if but for a day, he was ineligible during that Presidential term in which he shall have done it. In their object, to wit, the securing of legislative independence, the effects of the two propositions will be found to differ more in words than substance.

In the remarks I have made I hope I have done injury to the feelings of no one. I certainly did not intend it. I shall also regret very much that any one should suspect me of alluding more to the present than past Administrations of the Government. I disavow every such intention, and have carefully avoided a comparison between them. On this subject, there is little difference between them.

When Mr. COBB had concluded, the amendment reported to the said resolution by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, was then read and concurred in by the House, and the said amendment, as amended, is in the words following, to wit:

"No Senator or Representative in the Congress of the United States shall, during the time for which he was elected, or within one year thereafter, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States."

On the question to order the resolution to a third reading, a debate arose, which occupied about two hours. The gentlemen who engaged in the debate were Messrs. PINDALL, BRUSH, SIMKINS, NEALE, COBB, ROBERTSON, SERGEANT, and CUSHMAN.

Mr. SIMKINS, of South Carolina, said:—Notwithstanding, Mr. Speaker, the aversion of the House to see its precious time consumed in speeches, yet an imperious sense of duty constrains me to call attention to a measure extraordinary in its nature and consequences. Sir, the proposed amendment is bottomed upon an improper and unfounded distrust of the members of Congress—a distrust not warranted by any thing past or present in our legislative history. The proper selection of all officers in the power of the Executive of the United States depends on a correct and perfect knowledge of the persons to be appointed. This knowledge, in a country so extensive and so diversified as ours, is hard to be obtained. How can it be most accurately obtained? Is the true question now to be discussed and decided. My opinion, most unequivocally, is, that it can be had with more precision and more certainty from the legislative hall of the nation than from any other quarter whatever. Here every member is in the eye of the nation, and on its most interesting theatre. Here it is that a man becomes not only better known, but more perfectly identified with the history, measures, and successes of the National Government, instituted to secure the prosperity and promote the happiness of the whole nation. Here it is that a man's political principles, honesty, and talents, are more thoroughly tested and tried than in any other situation; and here it is that knowledge to see, and experience to inquire the public good, can be most certainly, usefully, and easily obtained.

If the President, in making choice of important officers, not only for his Cabinet, but for foreign missions, and a great many other important objects, is cut off from members of Congress, as the present amendment contemplates, where is he to look, or from what sources can he collect information to direct him? Can he look to the different State Legislatures? If he does, how few can he find there who have so pre-eminently distinguished themselves as to be sufficiently known to the President or the nation. Is he, then, to rely on the representations of factious and partisan newspapers? or, if not, on the representations of men equally factious and partial, endeavoring to promote the views of some connexion or personal favorite, who may or who may not have merit? Sir, the information obtained in this way would be not only vague and uncertain, but would come often through a stream so polluted and muddy as to be of a most dangerous character.

But it may be said that members of Congress may be appealed to for a history of the character and qualifications of those fit to be appointed.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

Admitted; but this introduces a mischief infinitely more alarming than your amendment can remedy. You compel the President to receive their information, which must often be personal, partial, and sometimes, of course, unfounded, instead of giving him an opportunity of judging for himself of men immediately in his view, and upon his own responsibility. When a member serves in this body for years, if he has talent and industry, he must become useful, prominent, and distinguished. He is not only tried in talent, but in political honesty and consistency. He becomes national property, and the President is driven to no second hand, to no uncertain or doubtful channel for character or information. He is enabled to judge for himself.

But this is not the only inconvenience in being compelled to receive recommendations through members of Congress. You thereby make members partisans and intriguers for offices for their personal friends. You increase the evil your amendment purports to remedy. You contaminate and debase the very source which you affect to preserve pure. You set the artful and ambitious among the people to electioneer for members of Congress, to enable them thereby to obtain offices; and you set members of Congress to intriguing for offices, that they may promote and insure their elections.

The member from Georgia who proposed this amendment said, that, in turning his attention for a few years back, he found that the Presidents had taken ten or twelve members from the Senate, and, perhaps, double that number from the House of Representatives, to fill offices within his gift. Agreed, sir; and what does the gentleman prove by this? Has he shown us that these offices have been disgraced, or the National Legislature injured by this course? Can he say that the offices have been not well filled and their duties faithfully performed? I aver that, in general, this has been the case; and, if he wishes to draw any inferences favorable to his amendment, he ought to have shown this. It was his duty to have proved to this body the dangerous consequences arising from the facts he states. Sir, we have seen no such consequences, nor do I believe we ever shall. Intrigues and designs belong more to ambitious men out of Congress than in it, and many instances could be mentioned to prove this assertion. Members of Congress are upon their good behavior before the whole nation. They obtain a political standing and character in the eyes of their country, which become sanctioned and consecrated, and this character and standing can only be retained by a steady, honest, and consistent political course; and let me tell the House, that the President would lessen, and eventually destroy his own character, if he did not appoint men of tried patriotism, unquestionable experience, and distinguished talents. His own reputation is identified with that of the officers of his own creation.

But, suppose you adopt the amendment, where will he go for his distinguished officers? We have already seen that there are very few men whose talents are so exalted, or whose career is so bright, as to introduce them to the view of the President whilst they act in the comparatively narrow compass of a State. He must, then, resort principally to his diplomatic corps in foreign countries for his appointments; and can those who have resided abroad for years, removed from the habits, political institutions and government of their own country, and who may imperceptibly to themselves have imbibed a slight tinge of foreign habits and notions, if not principles—I say, is it safe to confine the President to those, principally, to fill his highest offices?

Sir, I am not disposed to degrade Congress in the manner this amendment contemplates. I have seen often much reason for admiration of the conduct of very many members; and, so far from this illiberal distrust, I have confidence in the body of whom I have the honor to be a member—I deem the members honorable and fit for any trust, and this is the theatre on which to try their integrity and usefulness; and permit me to say they will, in proportion to their services here, be more and more fitted for the higher and more honorable offices, if there are any such.

Sir, it may be said that members should feel a delicacy in opposing this amendment, because it goes to destroy their chance for offices. I, for one, feel no such delicacy—I seek not, nor do I expect promotion—but, for the good of the nation, I would not confine the President in his choices, and, least of all, would I cut him off from a body, from its very nature, better calculated to afford good officers than any other. I, then, see no reason for thus disfranchizing members of Congress, and stigmatizing them in the eyes of the nation; and, Mr. Speaker, permit me to say that, if I were compelled either to exclude members altogether, or to choose from among them alone, I would prefer the latter alternative.

It is, therefore, I think, evident that it would be unwise to exclude the Executive from his choice among members of Congress, because they are, from their very situation, better known to the President and the nation.

Because their political and moral integrity will be more thoroughly tried;

Because they will acquire greater experience and knowledge on a theatre at which almost all men of promise aim; and

Because, by a probation on this theatre, men become more national, more attached to, and identified with the Constitution and measures of their Government; and because they become, in truth, more truly American.

MR. CUSHMAN, of Massachusetts, said, when the resolution was first submitted, he was inclined to view it with benignant sensations; but, upon reflection, he now viewed it with less complacency. The amendment would not answer the purpose contemplated. That ambition must be short-sighted, indeed, which did not look ahead beyond two or even six years. And, supposing a man capable of being moved by any influence that might be exerted upon him, he would make his calculation of being, for the limited term, a good and faithful servant; and then waiting, in humble assurance, after a short period, of entering into the joys of his political lord. But, contended Mr. C., should the amendment proposed lessen the chance of Executive influence, as was the avowed object of the honorable mover, he apprehended more injury from the diminution than benefit. The Executive he conceived to be the weakest co-ordinate branch of the Government. He was unwilling to abridge any of its Constitutional prerogatives, or to impair the influence of any patronage which, by the Constitution, might be attached to it. The influence of the Executive, to his knowledge, never had been improperly exerted; it had generally been salutary in its effects. There could be no just objection to this legitimate influence, that its benefits had been usually experienced by the friends of the Chief Magistrate. Who should be benefited in preference to his friends? who, in his opinion, must also be the friends of the nation. Other things being equal, a preference should be given to friends. Who be to the man who neglects his friends and courts his enemies, and relies on their attachment for his support! It was said of Charles II., of England, that, when he passed an act of indemnity to his enemies, he consigned his friends to oblivion.

Mr. C. hoped that no supreme Executive of the United States would ever incur a similar reproach. Gentlemen, conscious of human frailty, were of opinion that the safety of human virtue depended materially on its exemption from trial. He was not disposed to dispute the justness of the sentiment. They had enforced their doctrine by the highest authority: "Lead us not into temptation." He acknowledged its pertinence—he felt its force. But virtue, Christian virtue, as pure as it is in its source, does not usually flourish without the hope of receiving its appropriate rewards. Will patriotism attain its full vigor if denied all nourishment, every motive that may serve to water its root and expand its germ? Gentlemen had enforced and adorned their reasoning by Scripture language. He trusted he also, without any unfavorable imputation, might be indulged in a similar liberty. "Be not weary in well doing; for in due time you shall reap, if you faint not." The motive here contained is no less useful to animate the patriot than it is the man of piety. The proposed amendment, as it was not calculated to answer the end proposed—and if it were, the effect would not be salutary, as it would lessen a motive to extraordinary exertion for the public good—ought not, in his opinion, to be adopted.

The question was then taken, Shall the said resolution be engrossed, and read a third time? and determined in the negative—yeas 72, nays 87, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Alexander, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Allen of Tennessee, Archer of Virginia, Baker, Ball, Barbour, Bayly, Beecher, Boden, Burwell, Butler of New Hampshire, Butler of Louisiana, Cannon, Cobb, Cocke, Crafts, Crawford, Crowell, Culpeper, Earle, Edwards of North Carolina, Fay, Floyd, Garnett, Gross of New York, Hall of New York, Hall of North Carolina, Hendricks, Herrick, Heister, Hooks, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Kendall, Kent, Little, Marchand,

And so the said amendment was rejected.

MONDAY, April 17.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was committed the engrossed bill for the relief of Ann McIntire, widow and administratrix of Andrew McIntire, deceased, reported the same, without amendment. And on his motion the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SMITH, from the same committee, to which was also committed the engrossed bill for the relief of John Wells, reported the same without amendment. Mr. S. moved that the bill be also postponed indefinitely; when, it was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MORTON, from the select committee, to which was referred the resolution from the Senate fixing a period for the termination of the present session of Congress, made a report in part, which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HARDIN moved that the select committee to which is referred the resolution from the Senate fixing a period for the termination of the present session of Congress, be discharged from the further consideration thereof, which was decided in the negative—yeas 68, nays 71.

Mr. SLOCUMB then moved that the House do now proceed to consider the resolution submitted by him on the sixth ultimo, to fix a period for the termination of the present session.

And the question was then taken, by yeas and nays, Will the House now proceed to consider the said resolution? and was decided in the negative—yeas 86, nays 70.

On motion of Mr. COCKE,

Ordered, That the letter from the Secretary of War transmitting copies of contracts, &c., entered into at the War Department, since the year 1815, for the building and repairing arsenals, magazines, and armories, be referred to a select committee;

and, Messrs. COCKE, SIMKINS, and STORRS, were appointed the committee.

Mr. LOWNDES laid before the House a letter from C. N. BUCK, in relation to the case of the Danish brigantine Henrick; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations on that case.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act relative to the Arkansas Territory," was read a third time and passed.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to annex certain lands within the Territory of Michigan to the land district of Detroit," was read a third time and passed.

"A resolution giving the consent of Congress to a compact concluded between the States of Kentucky and Tennessee, for the settlement of their boundary line," was read the third time and passed.

Mr. STORRS moved that the House do now proceed to consider the bill confirming the title of the Mohican or Stockbridge tribe of Indians to certain lands. The motion was negatived.

STATE OF MANUFACTURES.

On motion of Mr. LOWNDES, the House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him, on Saturday, calling on the Committee of Manufactures to report certain information respecting the state of manufactures in the United States.

On this proposition arose a short debate, in the course of which the motion was supported and opposed as follows: Affirmative—Messrs. LOWNDES, TYLER, BARBOUR, and CULPEPER; negative, Messrs. BALDWIN, SERGEANT, FULLER, GROSS, of New York, and LITTLE.

Those who supported the motion argued, that encouragement was demanded for our manufacturers by increased duties, on the ground that they were now oppressed and ruined; that it was necessary to have these facts to know how far these allegations were true or otherwise—to know whether the distress complained of was in fact real or supposititious.

On the other hand, it was argued, that the revision of the tariff had been proposed by the Committee of Manufactures from considerations of national policy, and not from a minute investigation of details; that the information asked was not such as a committee of this House ought to be required to give, and which each member could as well procure for himself as a committee for him; and that the adoption of the resolve would serve the purpose of delay, &c.

The question being taken, by yeas and nays, on agreeing to the resolve, there were—For the resolution 72, against it 90, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Ball, Barbour, Bryan, Buffum, Burton, Burwell, Butler of New Hampshire, Butler of Louisiana, Cannon, Clagett, Cobb, Cocke, Crafts, Crawford, Crowell, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davidson, Edwards of North Carolina, Ervin, Fisher, Floyd, Fuller, Garnett, Hall of North Carolina, Hardin, Hill, Holmes, Hooks, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Kent, Livermore, Mc-

So the resolution was rejected.

SEMINOLE WAR.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the whole on the bill for the relief of the officers and volunteers engaged in the late campaign against the Seminole Indians, Mr. CAMPBELL in the chair.

The bill was reported to the House.

Mr. CANNON made a few observations in favor of the bill.

Mr. PINDALL moved to lay the bill on the table, with the view of obtaining information whether or not these men received their forty cents per day for the use of the horses, after those horses were dead, until the end of the campaign.

This motion was supported by Messrs. PINDALL and HARDIN, and opposed by Messrs. CANNON, JONES, and ALLEN, of Tennessee.

It was decided in the affirmative—70, to 63. So the bill lies on the table.

SALE OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill extending the time for the redemption of lands sold to pay the direct tax in certain cases.

Mr. SERGEANT moved an amendment to provide how deeds shall be made to purchasers of lands sold for the payment of the direct tax, where there is no collector now to do it.—Agreed to.

No other debate or proceeding took place on this bill. To the same Committee of the Whole was referred two or three other bills; among them, the bill from the Senate, making further provision for the sale of the public lands (for changing the system from a credit to cash payments.)

Mr. ANDERSON delivered a speech of half an hour's length in favor of the bill.

Mr. JONES delivered his sentiments at considerable length against the bill.

Mr. CROWELL, of Alabama, followed, also in opposition to the bill.

Mr. BRUSH, of Ohio, spoke in support of the bill.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky, followed in opposition to the bill.

Mr. FULLER, of Massachusetts, spoke in support of the bill; when, on motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 18.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, and to repeal all other acts upon that subject," reported the same with amendments; which were read, and, together with the bill, ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, the Secretary of War was directed to lay before this House the proceedings of the court martial on the late trial of William King, colonel of the fourth regiment of United States' infantry.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate disagree to the first amendment proposed by this House to the bill, entitled "An act to establish a district court in the State of Alabama;" and they agree to the second amendment to the said bill, with an amendment. They have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act to provide for clothing the Army of the United States, and for other purposes;" and "An act to provide for the expense of surveying certain parts of the coast of North Carolina, and for other purposes;"—in which amendment and bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of State, enclosing a copy of the act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, called for by a resolution introduced by Mr. PINDALL, some days ago, entitled "An act to prevent kidnapping." It was referred to the select committee appointed on the subject of reclaiming fugitives from labor.

The bill this day received from the Senate, for clothing the Army in domestic fabrics; and the bill from the Senate to provide for the expense of surveying the coast of North Carolina;—were severally read twice, and referred.

The engrossed bill extending the time allowed for the redemption of land sold for direct taxes, and purchased on behalf of the United States, was read the third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

PUBLIC EXPENDITURES.

Mr. SIMKINS, from the Committee on Public Expenditures, made a report in obedience to the resolution directing them "to inquire and report the amount of the several items which are charged upon the contingent fund, and whether in their opinion the expenditures may not in future be diminished, consistently with the public interest and the accommodation of the two Houses of Congress;" which were read, and ordered to lie on the table. The report is as follows:

The Committee of Public Expenditures, who were required, by a resolution of this House of the — day of December last, "inquire and report the amount of the several items which are charged upon the contingent fund, and whether, in their opinion, the expenditures may not in future be diminished, consistently with the public interest and the accommodation of the two Houses of Congress," beg leave to report:

That they immediately took into consideration the above resolution, and, although strictly speaking, their inquiry might seem to have been directed to the contingent expenses of the House, of which they are members, yet they thought it embraced within the scope of the resolution to go further. In conformity thereto, they promptly addressed a letter to each of the heads of the Executive Departments, viz.: the Secretary of State, the Treasury, of War, and of the Navy, of which the paper marked A is a copy. That, from the first, they received the letter and documents contained in the envelope marked B; from the Secretary of the Treasury, they received the letter, documents, and vouchers marked C; from the Secretary of War, the letters and documents contained in the envelope marked D; and from the Secretary of the Navy, the letters and items contained in envelope E; which letters, documents, and vouchers contained all the information of importance, touching the said resolution, which could be obtained from these Departments.

It is true that the attention of the committee has been directed to some charges of abuses alleged to have taken place in the Navy Department, some two or three years ago. That to these charges the committee directed the attention of the Secretary of the Department, whose peculiar province and duty the committee deemed it to be to supervise and regulate his Department, and correct abuses, if any existed therein.

Upon the whole, this part of the transaction has ended in charges on the one hand, and details on the other, many of which were of a private and individual character; and, inasmuch as no practical result could, in the opinion of your committee, grow out of a further perseverance in an investigation of such a nature, they think it best to leave the affair with the head of the proper Department, considering that abuses (if any have existed) will be promptly and effectually corrected.

Your committee, in turning their attention to the contingent expenses of this House, (for with those of the Senate they did not feel it their duty to interfere,) applied to the Clerk for information, who, with promptness, gave his personal attention before your committee at two different times, and afforded all the information in his power; the substance of which is contained in a letter from him, herewith submitted and marked F.

That the existence of impositions to a certain but perhaps unavoidable extent, in the quality and even quantity of stationery and other articles furnished this House, and in the wood provided for its consumption, are not only possible, but even probable, although the committee have not been able to designate any particular case, and beg leave to suggest that the correct management, safety, and economy of all these articles must mainly depend upon the vigilance and fidelity of the officers of the House.

After the most diligent investigation which your committee have been enabled to make, their inquiries have resulted in not being enabled to detect any abuses, if any have existed, or do exist; nor have they been able to discover how, or in what manner, the expenditures upon the contingent fund of this House can be diminished, consistently with the public interest, or its comfortable accommodation.

The report was ordered to lie on the table.

The House took up the bill to establish a district court in Alabama, and insisted on their amendment, reducing the salary of the judge from 2,000 to 1,500 dollars, which had been disagreed to by the Senate, and disagreed to the amendment of the Senate adding fifty dollars to the salary of the district attorney.

STOCKBRIDGE INDIANS.

The House took up the bill to confirm the title of the Mohican or Stockbridge Indians to certain lands lying on White river, in Indiana; upon which much discussion arose, and, after several amendments had been proposed, some of which were adopted and others rejected, the question was taken on the engrossment of the bill for a third reading, and decided in the negative by yeas and nays—for the engrossment 52, against it 93:

And so the said bill was rejected.

SALES OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate reducing the price of the public lands, and establishing cash payments therefor.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Kentucky, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. R. said, that it was with reluctance and unfeigned diffidence he had taken the floor to offer to the Committee any thing which he would be able to say on the interesting subject under consideration. He was not friendly to apologetical speeches, nor in the habit of making them. But he owed to the Committee an apology for his inability, owing to the circumstances under which he appeared before them, to make them any adequate return for their kind indulgence in rising, on his motion, to give him a full opportunity to deliver his sentiments. Laboring under severe indisposition, he was totally incapacitated to do justice to the Committee, or to the subject which he was about to discuss. Under this embarrassment, well aware of the magnitude of the subject, and of the delicate and interesting considerations involved in its discussion, and the great interest to be affected by its decision, he would not, if permitted to consult his feelings, obtrude himself on the Committee, but would surrender the floor most cheerfully to some other member who could entertain them more profitably and acceptably than he could hope to do under the most favorable circumstances. But the peculiar situation in which he happened to stand left him no such discretion. He felt himself constrained, by a sense of duty to his State and to himself, to give some of the reasons which would influence his vote.

Having introduced, early in the session, a resolution instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of the measure now under consideration, it was necessary, lest he might be suspected of a dereliction of duty, to defend the policy of the system he had recommended. And, having the misfortune not to be supported by the co-operation of some of his colleagues, who opposed the bill from an apprehension that it would injure the Western country, (part of which he represented,) and aimed a blow at its prosperity and influence, he felt imperiously called upon, by considerations which he could not resist, and obligations from which he should not shrink, to vindicate the policy of his course, and endeavor to maintain the rectitude of his opinions and the integrity of his motives.

He said, that he was not so vain as to suppose that he would be able to offer to the Committee any considerations in favor of the bill which had not occurred to them, but he did hope and believe that he should be able successfully to defend his opinions with the nation, and even the Western country. Crude and uninteresting as the desultory observations he should make must necessarily be, he hoped the Committee would hear him patiently. No one could be insensible to the importance of the subject, or to the necessity of serious and sober deliberation in deciding on it. It was a question in which not only the Government but the people—not only the West but the East—not only the present generation but posterity—was in some degree interested. He feared that its importance was not sufficiently felt, nor its character and its tendencies fully understood.

He would not attempt to give it any factitious importance. It was, intrinsically, as interesting to the people as any subject that engaged the attention of Congress during the present session. Whether regarded in its effects on the fiscal concerns of the Government, or the strength, prosperity, and independence of the West, or its inevitable moral and political tendencies, it had strong claims to the most dispassionate consideration.

Having bestowed on the subject, said Mr. R., all the reflection that its importance and a due respect for the opinions of others required and his limited means permitted, and having come to the conclusion that the passage of the bill was demanded by considerations of policy, which he thought a statesman could not safely resist, he could not hesitate to give it his vote, disregarding the consequences that had been threatened. He felt bound to discharge his duty impartially, and he should do it fearlessly.

He said he regretted that he could not co-operate with his colleague, (the SPEAKER,) whose feelings on this subject he admired, but with whose opinions he could not concur.

But he must be permitted, on this as well as all other occasions of public duty, to pursue the dictates of his own conscience and judgment. He acted, he said, on his own responsibility; and, if he was wrong, it was sufficient for him that he believed he was right. And on this subject, he said, others might think as they pleased, but he felt a strong conviction that the adoption of the cash system would promote not only the interest of the General Government, and of the people of the United States, but the substantial and permanent interest of the Western country.

Mr. R. said, that the question was not whether the plan for selling the public lands, now proposed as a substitute for the one in operation, was unexceptionable, or would effectually prevent the recurrence of all the abuses and difficulties which it was acknowledged had resulted from defects in the latter, but only whether it be more perfect, and better suited to the purposes for which the old system was established.

He said, that the Senate's bill, like all other human productions, however perfect in theory, would no doubt in its execution be found liable to some objections. But these, he felt sure, would be comparatively insignificant; and he thought that the proposed law was not only better than the existing one, but as perfect as the experience of twenty years and the circumstances of the times and the country would enable Congress to make it.

He said, that, in opposition to the bill, it had been urged that the present system was a venerable one, and not to be changed unless practical men should pronounce the change necessary. He did not profess to be a very "practical man," or to know more on this subject than others, but he thought that no one should be denounced as a rash or unskilful innovator, who should, after an experiment of twenty years, endeavor to correct abuses and prevent difficulties which it had disclosed, and which might produce consequences which, if not averted by timely interposition, might embarass the Government and disturb society. He thought that if the system which had been in operation twenty years was known to be defective, it should be amended; and that, if the argument of innovation was applicable now, it never would be inapplicable. As to "practical men," he said, he did not precisely comprehend its import. But he supposed that those who had observed and felt the operation of the present system, from its adoption until now, might be considered sufficiently "practical" for all the purposes of the bill; and, although he was unwilling to adopt the opinions of others, merely because he might consider them "practical men," he would tell the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. JONES) that he believed the most practical men in the United States, on land subjects, were in favor of the change proposed in the bill under consideration. He would ask, who was more "practical" on all subjects that concerned the public lands, than a late Senator from Ohio? (Mr. MORROW.) And whose opinions had, and deserved, more universal influence? He had been well called, by a Senator from Kentucky, in a discussion on this subject last session, (Mr. CRITTENDEN) the Palinurus of the Senate. And was it so soon forgotten that he wished to make the adoption of the system now proposed the last act of his long political life? That he felt and avowed the necessity of reforming the present system? And, said Mr. R. the voice of the people will applaud him.

By the law now in operation, said Mr. R., the public lands are sold in quantities not less than one hundred and sixty acres, and at a price not less than two dollars per acre, one-fourth paid at the time of sale, and the remainder in four years; with interest, if not punctually paid, and the land forfeited if the whole consideration be not paid in five years. The bill before the Committee proposes to sell the public lands for cash, at a price not less than one dollar twenty-five cents per acre, and in tracts containing not less than eighty acres.

The first system, he said, having been tried twenty years, was ascertained to be defective. The last is intended to remedy the defects of the first, which, it was believed, might be effectually and safely done. The first, it was true, had been prepared with great care, and was considered, when adopted, better adapted than any other that could be devised to the ends for which it was instituted. These ends were, 1st, revenue; and 2d, the promotion of the general and substantial interests of society, by extending population, and encouraging industry, and the domestic, social, and civic virtues. But, said he, consistently with those purposes, it is ascertained that it cannot be fully executed. The experience of twenty years had demonstrated its inefficiency, and its tendency, from abuse and accident, to consequences unforeseen and mischievous. Instead of proving a sure resource of revenue, he believed that, ere long, the Treasury could not rely on it; instead of meliorating the condition of the poor, it had been frequently an instrument in the hands of the rich, by which they were enabled to oppress them and enrich themselves; instead of strengthening the Union, and enriching the country, he feared that, if persisted in, it would tend to weaken the one, and embarrass the other; instead of increasing the resources of the West, he believed it would tend to their subduction; in short, he believed that it could not long be continued in operation, without creating the most unpleasant embarrassments in the Government, and among the people. That it was defective, he said, he believed all acknowledged. But, in regard to the nature and extent of its defects, their operation, and ultimate tendency, and their remedies, there was a diversity of opinion. However, for all his purposes, it would only be necessary to show one radical defect, and that the proposed substitute would remedy it, without producing any bad effects that legislation could prevent.

H. OF R.

This radical defect, he said, he found in the credit given to the purchaser, and he believed that the most serious difficulties that had occurred, or would occur, under the operation of the credit system, might be ascribed to the credit.

Mr. R. said that he should not venture to state that the revenue had been diminished by the sale of public lands on credit. It was impossible to ascertain, with certainty, whether there had been diminution in its amount, as the cash system had never been tried; but, he would venture to predict that there would, in a few years, be a loss inevitably, unless the bill before the Committee should become a law. It was well known, he said, that applications had been made, by purchasers of public lands, for many years successively, for indulgence, and that laws had been repeatedly passed, exempting from forfeiture lands which had been purchased on credit, and for which the purchasers had failed punctually to pay. This kind of indulgence had almost become a matter of course. It had been extended, with a few exceptions, annually, for more than ten years. He believed it had never been refused, and he doubted whether it ever would be. A bill had been engrossed this morning, extending the indulgence one year longer; and it was obvious that a similar law must pass at the next session, and for many consecutive years, or the debtors for the public lands must be subjected to great distress, and many of them to ruin. Mr. R. said that he did not wish to be understood as intimating that the indulgences heretofore given were unnecessary or improper. On the contrary, he was sure that they had been proper, and that it would be necessary to renew them. But, he thought that that policy must be unwise which subjected the National Legislature and the people to such vexatious embarrassments, and that any system which required such temporary and mitigating expedients in its operation, must be radically defective. The necessity of continued indulgence indicated very clearly the necessity of changing the system which produced it. Indeed, said he, every argument that has been, or could be, urged in favor of indulgence, tends strongly to show the propriety of refusing, in future, that credit, which has rendered such arguments proper and necessary.

He said that he had heard it frequently stated, and his friend from Tennessee (Mr. JONES) had reiterated it, that the accumulation of the debt for the public lands, and the inability of the debtors to discharge it, resulted from temporary and accidental causes, and that it was not probable that the indulgence thereby rendered necessary would long be required.

He would not, he said, enter into an examination of those circumstances alluded to by the gentleman in support of that opinion, because their character rendered a minute investigation of them unnecessary. He thought it easily demonstrable that the causes of the accumulation of the debt were neither accidental nor temporary: they existed in the nature of the system, and would continue to produce their results as long as it should be kept in operation. The circumstances mentioned by the gentleman may have had some influence on the extent of the increase, but if they had never occurred the debt would have grown, and indulgence have been necessary. The debt had been gradually accumulating for many years: in good times, and in bad times, and under all circumstances.

It could not reasonably be expected that a man who should be able to pay only the first instalment for a tract of land, could transplant himself and family in the Western wilds, open a farm, build his houses, support his family, and be able in four years to save, by the cultivation of the soil, as much as would pay the remaining three-fourths of the consideration. Under the most auspicious circumstances, some of the purchasers must unavoidably become delinquent. But if misfortune or calamity should fall on the public debtor, or the currency should be deranged, or the seasons unpropitious, or the market for agricultural products dull or unprofitable, how would the debt be punctually discharged? But, said he, add to these considerations the exorbitant prices which the advantages of credit tempt the speculator to promise, (and which is the most fruitful source of accumulation,) and which it is impossible that he can ever pay, and how inevitable is the growth of the land debt? It must continue to increase as long as credit shall be given.

Such a system, said he, liable to so many contingencies, must be intrinsically defective. It could not long be continued in operation without defeating the ends of its institution. It could not be executed. He would not say that, if persisted in, it would eventually create a debt so large that it never could be paid; but he would say, and was bound to believe, that the debt would become so much augmented, that its entire collection would be difficult, remote, doubtful, and perilous. And he should not attempt to disguise his apprehension that it never would be entirely collected; or, if collected, that it would be done under circumstances which would prove that it would have been better that it had never been either contracted or coerced. He felt compelled to believe that, if the credit be continued much longer, the Government would necessarily lose a great part of the proceeds of sales, or would have to secure them at the expense of the best interests of the Union.

He was unable to perceive how such a dilemma could be avoided. The people could not pay the debt now due: that debt must increase; the causes are permanent, and the effects inevitable. When, and how, he asked, would it be collected? If it will be difficult or impossible to collect twenty-two million, how much more so will it be to collect, with safety, one hundred million? Will you, said he, refuse further indulgence, and thereby subject the land to forfeiture? Then, passing by other consequences, you distress and ruin many of the purchasers; and, in that event, it will have been unfortunate for them that you had given them credit. If you refuse indulgence, confusion, disaffection, and oppression, will follow: if you grant it, the Government loses revenue. Gentlemen might choose their alternative. But it was certainly the province of an enlightened policy to prevent this dilemma, when it might be possible, by opportune interposition. This, he thought, was now practicable; but no one could say how long it would be so. And if by such interposition the Government should sell its lands for thirty-four cents per acre less, (the difference between cash payments under the two systems,) it will be more than compensated by certainly getting the whole amount of sales.

Mr. R. said that it was useless to talk to him of the security the Government possessed, by holding the title to the land. This security was only nominal. For, while by holding it with a heavy and ruinous debt impending over your land debtors, you keep them comparatively in a state of dependence and tenancy, you will, at the same time be unable or unwilling to evict them, and sell their houses to hungry speculators and strangers. But, if you should, it would be an event that might be deeply felt and long deplored.

The home of a freeman, said he, is dear to his heart; it is sacred; it is the centre of his affections and of his happiness; it is the sanctuary of his wife and children; it is consecrated by being his home, and often endeared to him by being the birthplace of his little ones. Will you venture, for a paltry consideration, to tear this from him, and thereby strike into wild and discordant commotion all those tender things? He felt, he said, that he was touching a delicate subject, on which it would be painful to dilate: he would therefore not pursue it, but content himself by having hinted at it, and barely opening the door to the view of some of the consequences that would attend the credit system.

Mr. R. said, that all his observation and experience taught him to believe that any permanent system of credit, national or individual, was pernicious. It was unnatural and seductive, and generally brought on those concerned in its operations, distress, and not unfrequently ruin. It was nationally a Pandora's box. What else, he asked, was the more fruitful source of the distress with which the people of the United States were now so much afflicted? And what else is the cause of the magnitude of the land debt, and its concomitant embarrassments? Would not the people now be in a better condition if it had never been indulged? And would not the Western country, particularly, be more prosperous and independent if credit had never been given on the public lands? Would it not be, in relation to the General Government, out of debt?

But, in addition to the objections he had mentioned, he said there were many others to the land credit. It deceived and embarrassed the purchaser; it compelled him frequently to promise too high a price for his land; it tempted him to go beyond his means; it placed the occupant in the power of the non-resident speculator, and it subjected the purchasers, of every description, to the control of circumstances which they could not foresee or avert, to the caprice of fortune, and to the mercy of Government.

The purchaser, said he, if there were no credit, would not have to complain of the vitiated paper currency, nor to reproach the Government with refusing to receive of him such depreciated paper as he had been compelled, in his transactions, to receive; nor would the capitalist be able to unhouse the poor man, with his family, who had enhanced the value of the soil by improvements, and who, without his fault, had become unable to pay the whole price for it punctually; nor would the ears of Congress be assailed with reports of nefarious speculations, in fraud of the Government, and to the injury of the poor. Look, said he, to Alabama. What but credit was the cause of the exorbitant prices bid there for land, or of the great speculations that had been there made and attempted? Would not many who purchased there be unable to pay? Was not the magnitude of the debt alarming? He did not, he said, wish to pursue this part of the subject; he had no doubt he was sufficiently understood.

Mr. R. here observed that the objections to the credit system which had most influence with him, were of a character different from those which were merely financial or personal, and of infinitely more consequence in the view of wise policy and enlightened patriotism. They grew out of the moral and political tendencies of credit between the people and their Government. This was, he said, an embarrassing topic; but his duty would not excuse its pretermission. He could not avoid it. It lay across his way. He should, therefore, give his opinion in regard to it without disguise.

History, and a knowledge of the nature of republican government, proved, that the relation of creditor and debtor ought not to exist between the Government and the people. It begets obligations, and interests, and feelings, incompatible with the genius of free institutions. If the citizen must stand in that relation to his Government, it is best that he should be the creditor. If he stand in the attitude of debtor, his interest may not be the interest of the Government, and his feelings may not always be in accordance with his duty. But the objections to such a relation are greatly multiplied and strengthened when it is permitted to exist between the Government and entire community, or a large portion of the whole population. It is then that the Government may be compelled to feel its impotency and the supremacy of those passions which it was instituted to control. And it is then that it may be in danger of degenerating into a government of men and not of laws; of passions, and not principles; of arbitrary force, and not enlightened public opinion.

Sales of Public Lands.

He said, that it had been very seldom the policy of governments to encourage or permit this odious and dangerous relation permanently; and most of those that ever did, had left striking memorials of its impolicy. In Great Britain it exists to a great extent; and there, it is true, it is not deprecated by those who administer the Government, but is considered as the bulwark of the constitution. It fortifies the Government, by making it the interest of the opulent and the influential to maintain it. In this mercenary way public sentiment is stifled, and, instead of being endangered, the Government is almost impregably entrenched behind wealth and aristocracy. Therefore, in England, the public debt is considered a public blessing.

But, for the same reasons, he believed that, in free Governments, it would be considered the greatest curse. What would be the condition of England, if, instead of being the debtor, she was the creditor of her subjects? Who would then be the ministerial champions? Who would preserve the Government from revolution?

Mr. R. said that he did not mean to argue that the creation of a large land debt would eventuate in the disruption of our happy Confederacy, but its tendencies would be towards disunion. If, said he, in England, it is necessary to the existence of the Government that it should be deeply indebted to its subjects, he would submit it to serious consideration, whether, in the United States, the Union would be strengthened, or cemented, by permitting the citizens to be largely indebted to the Government.

If, in England, the indebtedness of the people to the Government would endanger its stability, would it be wise or safe to maintain the converse of the proposition here? He thought no argument could be derived from the peculiar character of the American institutions or people sufficiently strong to render it good, or even prudent policy here, to encourage or permit a large body of the community to become largely indebted to the Government. On the contrary, he believed that a practical or philosophic view of the peculiar texture of the American institutions, would show that such an experiment would be as perilous here as elsewhere. In this free country, said Mr. R., public opinion is the substratum of the political fabric, and the attachment and confidence of the people the cement which increases its strength and preserves its symmetry. Without the support of the first, the whole superstructure is prostrate; forfeit the last, and the fairest and most sacred temple of liberty on earth is in dilapidation. It is not indestructible. It depends more on moral than political principles.

The peculiar conformation of the Federal Government being "imperium in imperio," enhanced the value of public sentiment, and rendered it more necessary to the stability of Constitutional authority that popular confidence should be preserved, and the whole moral strength of the body politic undivided on the side of the Union. The Union of the States, he said, was the first object of the Constitution. Nothing should be encouraged that weaken its ties. They are few and weak enough. Local feelings and sectional jealousies were already sufficiently strong and numerous. He feared it might be unsafe to increase them. It might do mischief; it could not possibly do good. He repeated, that he did not mean to insinuate that the Western debt, if augmented to even one hundred millions, would endanger the Union. He could not utter such a sentiment; but he did mean to say that such a debt would inevitably tend to inspire feelings, and generate interests, at war with the fundamental principles of union. He hoped that there would always be too much virtue and good sense in society to permit any circumstances to produce such an awful catastrophe as dissolution.

But he was an unsafe guardian of the Constitution who would do, or permit to be done, while he could prevent it, any thing that might provoke any attempt or even inclination, towards its destruction. Mr. R. said he felt devoted to Western interests, and had great confidence in Western virtues, moral and political; but, on a national question, which should be decided on national principles, he would be guilty of dereliction of duty if he were to act under the influence of local or sectional feelings. He was not so Godwinian in his opinion of human nature, nor so Utopian in his political principles, as to legislate on the supposed perfectibility of the one, or the practical infallibility of the other. Legislation should be adapted to men and things as they are, and every legislator should regard the passions as well as the virtues of human nature. Why was it, said he, that manners govern laws? Why was it that Solon, when asked whether his laws were as perfect as he could make them, replied, that they were as good as the people would bear?

Mr. R. said, that the people of the West were attached to the Government: he did not wish to see that attachment alienated. They were patriotic: he did not wish to have that patriotism chilled by a system of public policy which, he feared, if persisted in, might have that effect. Their feelings, said he, are with the Union: do not provoke indifference; do not excite their jealousies or their fears, but encourage their confidence, by deserving it. Then, indeed, they would always be found among the first in your councils and in your fields. Then you do not weaken, but strengthen the ligaments that bind the body politic, and you diffuse health and vigor through the system.

But, said he, how different may be its condition if, by continuing the credit system, Congress should compel the West, in self-defence, to oppose, in a body, the passage, or resist the execution of laws which it may be the interest and wish of the East to enact and to enforce; should give the East an engine with which they might annoy and oppress the West, and should distract and pervert the public councils, and array the East and the West against each other? Should this state of things ever occur, (and that it must, sooner or later, under the present system, if continued, seemed to him as inevitable as the decrees of fate,) no man could shut his eyes to the consequences that must follow. He would not portray them; but the effect that would be produced on the feelings and policy of the West, and on the legislation of Congress, not to look to ulterior results, must be seen by all who were acquainted with human nature, or the history of the world. Would not the West be interested deeply in indulgence, while the other members of the Union might be inclined, or even necessitated, to coerce payment? Might not a Western party be created, (and it would be formidable,) with anti-national interests and feelings? Would not the people of the West expect and require indulgence? Might they not be willing, or compelled, to make sacrifices to obtain it? If opposed, might they not be exasperated? If defeated, might they not feel it their duty to resist? Might not indulgence become a prominent feature in Western policy? Might not members of Congress be elected solely with a view to the indulgence? Might they not be willing to make legislative compromises to attain the only end of their election? Would not the East have an ascendancy, almost irresistible, over the West? From such a humiliating and perilous predicament, Mr. R. said he would, while it was yet possible, rescue the Western country. The mammoth land debt, if permitted to grow, would be sufficiently calamitous if it should only lead to some of the consequences at which he had hinted. Such consequences it was the duty of every citizen to endeavor to avert.

He knew, he said, that he would be told, that the people of the United States were too virtuous and enlightened to permit a sectional debt, however large, to influence their political feelings or conduct. But he was not yet prepared to believe that human nature was so far sublimated in the United States, as to be exempt from the influence of interest, passion, or ambition. He said that, if any illustration were necessary to show the effect of a land debt on legislation, and local parties, an experiment had been made in Kentucky, which furnished a very apposite exemplification.

In that State there was a large body of the people indebted to the Government for lands purchased south of Green river, on credit. The debt has been due many years; but at every session of the Legislature indulgence had been granted since the debt became due. Members had been elected to the Legislature, with instructions to obtain a further indulgence. A promise to procure it, or the belief that they would make all necessary efforts, was generally a "sine qua non" to their election. The Green river country had become very strong, and its indulgence had become a sort of party question—a political hobby. It is believed that it has been frequently the subject of "legislative compromise," the consideration for other laws, and other laws the consideration for that. He believed that it was now considered almost a matter of course and of right. He had no doubt that it had frequently been granted against the free consent of the Legislature, and had been the means of passing laws that otherwise would not have been enacted. The State had not got the debt in; he had doubts whether it ever would, the prospect being no better now than it was many years ago.

He said that he believed that the Green river indulgence had been sometimes necessary, and he did not know that it was not even yet proper; but he had alluded to it to show the effect of a land debt on revenue, on party elections, and on legislation. If, said he, such have been the fate and the effects of a Green river land debt in Kentucky, what must be the consequences in the United States of a Western debt? Are the citizens south and north of Green river less united in interest and feeling than the people west and east of the Alleghany mountains? Are the citizens of Kentucky less attached to their State constitution than the Western people are to the General Government? He said that the nature of the Confederacy would prove that a Federal land debt was infinitely more mischievous than any State debt, under any circumstances, on account of the magnitude of the debt, and the conflict of political interests, and feelings, and obligations, not merely in the West, but in the East, and the North, and the South.

He said that, if he should be compelled to select any portion of the population of the United States to defend the Union, in any emergency, he should look to the West.

He concurred fully with his colleague, (Mr. Brown,) that the people of the West were as much devoted to the general interests of the Union, and would make as many sacrifices to maintain them, as any other portion of the American population; and, if it would not be deemed invidious, he would say more. They have given many, and signal proofs of it. But this, he said, was no argument in favor of the credit system—a system that would, in its ultimate tendencies, conflict with those national feelings that now animated them—but, on the contrary, was a persuasive one against it. Having now the warm and cordial support of the West, it would not be wise to persist in a course of measures that must inevitably tend to stifle those moral impulses which prompted it. He would invigorate the arm, and distend the heart of Western patriotism; and not paralyze the one and contract the other; or nerve the one and steel the other against the common interests. He would repeat that he did not believe that, if the land debt should increase to any amount, the Western people would resist, by force, its collection, or desire the subversion of the Government to avoid its payment. But he asked if it could be prudent, in a government depending for its existence and support on public opinion, to make it the interest of the people to embarrass its regular operations, or resist its laws? And, said he, might not a large debt, hanging over one moiety of the nation, create, throughout the whole, interests, and feelings, and conduct, not calculated to advance the happiness of the people, or strengthen Constitutional authority?

Every Government that ever had to encounter a large popular debt, had felt it to be a potent and unwieldy adversary. Why did Lycurgus and Solon abolish all debts, in the organization of their systems of government? Why did the Roman plebeians, after being oppressed by their patrician creditors, raise the standard of revolt, and retreat to Mons Sacer? And why did the patricians ultimately submit? And what were the progress and effects of the long struggle? If, said he, the land debt be permitted to accumulate, and its enforcement be attempted, the West may not resist; they may not murmur; they may not evince sensation; but the debt might not be collected; and he did not wish to see the experiment made. There was no necessity to make any experiment on the temper of the West. They would never willingly "give up the ship;" they would never secede, unless provoked by those who ought to be their friends. And, if they ever should retreat to the sacred mountain, he hoped there would be at least one Menenius and one Valerius among them, who would be able to rally them again under the standard of the Union.

But it could not be the interest of the United States to persist in a system which could produce any consequences which it was the duty of every enlightened and patriotic statesman to prevent; a system that would engender discord and party feuds, and excite jealousies and discontents, and perhaps insubordination.

Every consideration which could operate on his mind, he said, strengthened his conviction that the credit system could not be executed, or, if executed, that it would do much mischief. In its execution, it would defeat some of the ends for which it was established; and he thought it required no argument to show, that a system whose operations were incompatible with its designs, and subversive of the first purposes for which government was instituted, and which counteracts the policy of wise legislation, ought to be abolished. That the credit system was such an one, he had endeavored to show. It ought, therefore, he thought, to be repealed, if one less exceptionable could be substituted. He thought that the bill under consideration furnished such an one. It remained, therefore, for him to offer some reasons to show that the mode proposed was better than that in operation.

Mr. R. said that, if he had been successful in his attempt to prove that the credit system was defective because it was a credit system, it would be unnecessary to consume time by an effort to show that the cash system was preferable, so far, because it was a cash system. As the strongest general considerations which, in his opinion, conduced to show the superiority of the cash over the credit system had already been anticipated in his endeavor to exhibit some of the objections to credit in the foregoing part of his argument, he would not reiterate them. If he had shown the defectiveness of credit, it would necessarily follow that the proposed system was, quo ad hoc, preferable.

Upon that ground he was willing to rest the comparative merits of the two systems, so far as it might depend on the two leading and characteristic features of credit and cash. These were so important and controlling, that a comparison of the more minute traits was unnecessary; because, whatever might be its results, they could have no influence in the decision. But, if such a comparison could be at all material, he was sure it would result in showing the superiority of the existing system in every feature in which they differed.

The principal of these, in addition to the credit and cash, were the minimum quantity of land and of price. The reduction of each in the bill under consideration, was intended to remove the objections that had been urged to the substitution of cash for credit. And in this it was singularly and completely successful.

He thought it was fair to conclude that the bill ought to pass. That it ought there could be no doubt, unless objections could be urged to it more formidable than those to which the existing law was liable, or arguments against it stronger than those which were pressed against the latter.

He said he had heard only two objections to the proposed system. First, that it would oppress the poor man, by giving the capitalist and speculator an unreasonable and unjust advantage over him. Second, that it would retard the population, and diminish the influence of the Western country. He believed no other objections that were even plausible had been or could be made; and these he considered by no means formidable. He thought that a very slight examination would be sufficient to show that they were both evanescent. He expected results from the cash system, in its operation on the poor, the rich, and the Western country, the opposite of those apprehended by its opposers, which he would endeavor briefly to exhibit, in the course of the notice he should take of the objections.

But it should not, said Mr. R., escape notice that, if the objections are in themselves true, they constitute no sufficient argument to prevent the passage of the bill. For, if the interest of the Government and of the body of the people require its passage, it would be unreasonable to demand or permit its rejection, merely because a particular class of the community, or district of country, might be injured by it. Otherwise, all legislation would not only be nugatory, but unjust; because every general law, however much it may promote the interests of the majority, must be incompatible with some individual rights or interests in society. Therefore the political axiom, that private interests should be sacrificed on the altar of the public good, would be a sufficient answer to the objections, if they were founded on correct hypotheses.

But, he said, if it were material to take more particular notice of the objections, he thought it was nearly demonstrable as any moral or political proposition from its nature could be, that the cash system would not only diminish and embarrass speculation, but promote the interests of the poor, and the permanent and substantial welfare of the Western country.

He believed that no other system would tend more to those results, unless it should be one by which the public lands should be gratuitously distributed. And for such a one he was unwilling to believe that there would be any serious advocates.

If there were any such he would recommend to them the immediate abrogation of the credit system, and the substitution of an agrarian law. But, said he, the public land being a common fund, and Congress being its depository, it is their duty to dispose of it in such a manner as to promote the common interest. They are bound by their trust to sell it, and to those who can pay for it. And he thought it could not be matter of complaint that Congress, and not any particular class of private individuals, should prescribe the terms of sale, and that such terms should be offered as would produce the most general good. Neither the poor nor the rich have any right to complain, if credit should be refused. If they are unwilling to purchase the public lands on the terms proposed, they will retain their money, and the public its land, and no injury is done to either.

By the poor, he said, he understood, as regards the argument, not that class of society who are in a state of pauperism, but those who are comparatively in a state of mediocrity, and are unable to purchase land for any other purpose than to occupy it. Under the credit system, a man who has no money cannot purchase; to be able to buy public land, he must have funds, and as much as will be required by the cash system. Gentlemen, he said, had argued against the bill as if they believed that, under the credit system, a poor man without money could purchase a home, and that, therefore, he will be excluded from all participation in purchases of public lands. But he is already excluded. Who can purchase now that may not buy, and as easily, under the cash system? Who will be excluded? Not the man without money; he cannot purchase now. Not the man who is now barely able to pay the first instalment for one hundred and sixty acres, at the minimum price; for he would proceed to show that the same individual might purchase with more certainty and more to his advantage, under the proposed system.

Under the existing law, a man cannot purchase for himself a home, even if there were no competition, unless he is able to advance eighty dollars; and, if he be a prudent man, he will not purchase at all, if that eighty be the whole amount of his pecuniary resources; for, before he can procure a title, he must pay two hundred and forty dollars more, in three instalments, or forfeit his land, with his eighty dollars advanced, if he should be unable to make punctual payment of the whole price. If the credit should tempt him to make the purchase, under the expectation of making money to discharge the debt he incurs, or of indulgence if he should fail, he subjects himself to loss and embarrassment that may result from accident, or from the fluctuation and depreciation of the currency, and places himself in the power of the usurer, the speculator, and the Government. The land would not be his, and he could not be considered an independent citizen, in the sterling import of those words. The little pittance he may, by industry and economy, be able to save, he cannot consider his own until he shall have paid for his land; the land is not his until he can get his patent; he may be dependent on the capitalist for money to procure the title and save his home from forfeiture, or must supplicate the indulgence of Congress; and, at last, after having removed his family many hundred miles, and improved land which he considered his own, either the hungry speculator may take it from him, or the humanity of the Government must interpose. And, if he should die before he shall have made complete payment, he leaves his helpless family in a strange and foreign land, without a home.

But the credit induces speculators, as well as others, to bid a higher price at the sales than would be given in cash, and frequently more than the value of the land; hence, the poor man, with his eighty dollars, is almost entirely excluded from the sales. He is afraid, or unable, to compete with the rich man, or with the speculator. The consequence is, that the rich and adventurous monopolize the best land, and leave only the refuse to the other class.

The speculator buys as much land as he can make the first payment for, under the expectation of being able, before the expiration of five years, to sell it for a higher price. He has, by law, five years, within which to make this experiment, and as much longer as he can prevail on Congress to indulge him; hence, it so often happens that the first is the last payment, and that indulgence becomes so necessary and so frequent, and that the land revenue fails. If the purchaser for speculation can, while the Government will indulge him, sell the land to the man who wants a home, but who was not able to bid against him at the public sale, at a higher price than he promised, by giving long credit, he transfers his certificate, and interposes the poor man between himself and the Government, with liability to pay the remaining instalments, with all the accumulation of interest, and with all other liabilities incident to the credit. If he cannot sell for more than he promised to give, he repeats his application to Congress for indulgence, and they continue to grant it. But, if it should be refused, and the land forfeited, the adventurer will only have lost the amount of the first payment which he had advanced.

What better terms can the speculator, said he, desire? What can more encourage speculation, or oppress the poor and honest man, than the credit system? It increases the facilities and inducements to speculation; it increases the means and number of speculators. This is observed every day. Alabama speaks a language that cannot be misunderstood.

But, Mr. R. said, the cash system now offered is better for the honest purchaser, not only because it enables him to get land with more certainty and with more security, and better land, but because it would put it in his power to get it cheaper, for two reasons—1st. The minimum price is less; and, 2d, land will sell on credit for a price higher than the cash value, by more than the interest of that value.

Under the proposed system a man can purchase eighty acres of land if he can pay one hundred dollars: he gets his patent, and has a home. He is an independent citizen, not in the power of the capitalist or the Government, in regard to his title.

Sales of Public Lands.

H. OF R.

Even if credit would not enhance the price, it is, nevertheless, a fact worthy of notice, that, under the cash system, a purchaser can buy a home for only one-fifth more than the fourth of the credit price, which fourth must be advanced. It is true that he will only get half the quantity, but he does not give half the price; and the smallness of the tract is no objection, but a strong argument in favor of the proposed system, as it regards the poor. For thereby a man will be enabled to procure a home who could not, or ought not, to attempt it now; and those who can purchase more than the minimum quantity will have the liberty to do so.

But, the best land is sold at the public sales to the highest bidder, and the credit will cause it to sell for a higher price than it would for cash by at least one-fifth. This is the difference between the price of eighty acres purchased under the cash system, and the fourth of the price of one hundred and sixty on credit. The consequence is, that a man will be able, under the proposed system, to buy eighty acres at public sale for the amount of only one-fourth of the price of one hundred and sixty on credit. In the one case the purchaser has parted with a certain sum of money, and obtained in exchange a title to eighty acres of land; in the other, he has disbursed the same sum, as only one-fourth of the price of one hundred and sixty acres, to which he has no title, and for which he cannot obtain a patent until he shall have paid the remaining three-fourths. Which would the poor, the honest, the free man prefer? Could there be any hesitancy in the option? Would he not choose the cash system? And would not the speculator, for the same reasons, prefer the credit system?

But, said Mr. R., it has been urged by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. JONES,) that, by requiring cash, too much power is given to money; that the capitalist will buy all the good land, because the poor man will be unable to bid against him beyond the small sum he may have. This argument, he said, was more plausible than sound, and had been already anticipated and answered. But the imposing manner in which it had been exhibited entitled it to a direct reply.

Money, said he, will have power as long as it is money. It is that which gives it value. Its power cannot be destroyed without destroying its value. But he felt sure that its influence in relation to the public land, and its purchasers, will not be augmented, but greatly diminished, by the passage of the bill under consideration, by the reduction which it would effect in the number of speculators, and the extent of their purchases. The credit increases the number of speculators, and the extent of their purchases, in a ratio of at least three to one, and reduces, in a correspondent ratio, the number of other purchasers, and the extent of their purchases. Under the credit system, a speculator, with fifty thousand dollars, will, at the minimum price, purchase one hundred thousand acres of land, the amount of his money being sufficient to complete the first instalment on that quantity. Under the cash system, he will be able to purchase only forty thousand acres. The same quantity of money, then, will purchase almost three times as much land under the credit, as it will under the cash system. The advantages of credit to purposes of speculation will give the same sum the power to purchase the full triple quantity. To purchase one hundred thousand acres under the cash system, there will be required five men with $25,000 each; under the credit system it will be purchased by two men with the same sum. If credit did not increase the price, then two speculators can monopolize as much land under the credit system as five men can under the cash system; and the same quantity of money in circulation would, therefore, increase the number of speculators, and the extent of their purchases, in the proportion of five to two, by allowing credit; and, as before stated, the effect of credit would swell the number to the proportion of three to one. Can any one, said he, fail to perceive the effect which credit has in increasing the number and power of speculators, and, thereby, the power of their money? Will not the poor man have a greater number of competitors? Will there not be less land left for him to purchase? And will not his chances of buying good land be diminished? And would not the number of purchasers for use be greatly diminished, and, thereby, the population of the West be retarded? Under the credit system, the capitalists can monopolize, with the same sum, more land than they could for cash, in the proportion of a hundred to forty. The capital, then, which would purchase 100,000 acres on credit, would, on cash payment, leave 60,000 acres unappropriated, which the settlers could purchase without competition with the non-resident moneyed men. As to that part of the argument which assumes that, in a contest for a particular tract of land, an advantage is given to the rich over the poor man by requiring cash, he said that the same objection would apply with equal force to credit. For, if the poor man could not compete with the rich man, after he had gone in his bid to the extent of his funds, when the whole amount is to be advanced, he must be in the same predicament if only one-fourth of the amount be required. In the latter case, after he had been forced up by the capitalist to as much as he could pay the first instalment of, he could bid no higher. But the objection, he said, would have much more force in it if urged against the credit system; because, by requiring cash, the number of speculators is reduced, and most of their schemes and contrivances baffled.

If any further illustration on this subject were necessary, he said that the gentleman who made the objection had himself furnished a very striking one. That gentleman had said, that, if the cash system should be adopted, the United States would never collect the debt due for land which had been sold, because that system would depreciate the value of the land for which the debt was contracted.

This argument, said he, is a "felo de se;" it cuts its own throat. For why will the cash system tend to depreciate the land sold under the credit system? It is because it gives more advantages to the purchaser; because it is a better system for the purchaser. This is the reason, and the only one. It does give more advantages to the purchaser; not the speculator, but the man who may desire to buy for his own use; it gives him more good land to make his choice in, at a less price, with less competition, with more certainty, and less embarrassment.

Mr. R. said that every view he could take of the subject helped to show that the objection to the cash system, which was founded on the assertion that it will not be so advantageous to the poor man, is indefensible, and that the system was strongly recommended by the advantages it secured to all classes of purchasers, except the speculators. These could not entirely be put down; to frustrate them is only a secondary object. But, if it were a primary one, a more effectual method than the cash system could not well be devised.

The only remaining topic, he said, was the effect that the cash system would produce in the Western country. He repeated, that its effect on the substantial interest of the West, would be beneficial. But, if it should be detrimental, by checking population, he could not, for that cause alone, vote against it. The effect could not change his opinion of duty, but would only tend to diminish his solicitude for the passage of the bill. He did not come here to legislate for any particular section of country, or portion of people of the Union, but for the whole. The laws which his vote might contribute to pass, would operate on all, and, therefore, it was but right that the wishes and interests of all should be consulted. As a citizen, he might delight to obey the dictates of his local feelings or personal wishes, but, as a legislator, he was bound to submit his conduct to the guidance of other and higher considerations.

But, he said, that, if he were at liberty to act on selfish principles to promote local interests, it would be his first and paramount duty to look to his own State, and to confine his views within her periphery. For, if he represented, exclusively, any local interest, it was that of Kentucky. And, if such, he said, were his condition, and such his duty, and it were true that the cash law would check population, he would not hesitate to support the bill: he would hail its passage with acclamations of joy. For, what would more promote the prosperity of Kentucky, than a system which would stop that efflux of money and of population, which had already so much exhausted her, and which was the effect of the system in operation? In so far as the cash system would diminish migration and sales, it would tend to diminish the drain of people and of money from Kentucky. But, he said, he was sure that the law would not have any deleterious operation on Western interests, by checking any population or preventing any sales that would redound to the advantage of the West. If his only object were the aggrandizement of the West, he would vote for it. He believed that nothing which Congress could do by legislation would more certainly promote the prosperity and independence of the West.

The member from Tennessee, (Mr. JONES,) had expressed astonishment that the Western members should differ in their opinion on this subject. He said, he felt as much surprise at it as the gentleman could feel. He could not perceive how the apprehension could be entertained by a Western man, that the cash system would injure the Western country. He was as much devoted to Western interests as any of its Representatives. He claimed it as his duty to be so. He had been charged, obliquely, since it was known that he was in favor of the cash system, with anti-Western feelings and policy. He was as sensitive on this subject as on any other; and he would not say he was imperturbable, but he would say that such charges or insinuations fulminated from the press or the stump could not alter his opinion.

He was not to be driven from his purpose, or deterred from doing his duty by denunciation, or a threat of defection of friends. He said he respected, as much as any Representative should do, the deliberate and temperate voice of public sentiment. But, he believed that public sentiment, in Kentucky, was decidedly in favor of the cash system. However, he must say, that the only way to change his vote was to change his opinion.

Did his colleagues, he asked, suppose that they gave evidence of more attachment to the West by their votes, than he felt? He hoped they would do him the justice to believe that he was as much devoted to the West as any of its citizens. Why should he not be? He had as great a stake beyond the mountains as any other man, and he was bound to the West by as many and as tender ties. Was it not the country of his birth—the home of “wife, children, and friends?” Did it not embosom all that he held most dear? And did it not contain the sacred spot in which the relics of his father reposed? He could yield to none in devotion to its soil and its interests. He loved it not only instinctively, because it was his birthplace and his home, but rationally, because it was the fairest portion of the globe. Its soil is luxuriant, its climate salubrious, its population is virtuous and hospitable, its men are brave, and its women chaste. Bound to him by such ties, and thus deserving his affection, he would never desert its cause. As long as he should continue in its service, he would be faithful to its interests—he would advocate and promote them, and he believed he was doing it by supporting the cash bill; for he believed that the West never would attain the high destinies before it, if the system of credit, which had already so much embarrassed and enfeebled it, should be continued. Why is it, said he, that that country is now so much in debt? Why is the balance of trade so much against it? Why its currency so much devalued and depreciated? Why such a languor pervading that rich and resourceful country?

He knew that these were the effects of more causes than one; the general system of credit was one; but he had no doubt that one of the most prolific sources of the calamities with which the West is afflicted, is the credit on the public lands. This had tempted men to go beyond their means, and contract debts which they could not pay; it had depreciated the Western paper currency, and had tended to augment and vitiate that currency.

APRIL, 1820.

Sales of Public Lands.

H. OF R.

Could any one fail to see its operation in producing these effects? He would ask his colleagues whether the Western country would not now be in a better condition, if there never had been any credit given in the sale of the public lands? Would it not be more independent, and have more and better money? Would it not owe $22,000,000 less? He said that that country never could be restored to its naturally healthy and prosperous state, as long as such an immense debt is suspended over it. It lies on it like an incubus; it paralyzed its best fiscal and moral energies. Was it not desirable to extricate it from this condition? Was it not the duty of its friends to make the effort? He said that he did not know any thing which Congress could do, that would tend more to this result, than the adoption of the cash system. That will prevent the accumulation of the debt, and tend to correct and restore the Western currency. If it should be adopted, those who might migrate from the East, and transplant themselves in the West, would buy only as much land as they could pay for; the purchase money they would carry with them from the East, and all they make on the land for four years would add to the resources, and swell the currency of the West, by being distributed among the people. But, if this system be rejected, then the Eastern emigrants will only make the first payment with their Eastern funds; they will generally purchase as much land as they can make the first payment for; the remaining three-fourths, for which they get credit, must be made in the West, and, when paid, abstracted from its resources. Is there not a great difference between adding the three-fourths to the funds of the West, and abstracting them from them? Will not the credit, then, always oppress the West, render good money scarce, and increase the amount of bad money? Under the credit system, not only is an immense sum annually withdrawn from the West, which, under the cash system, would be retained, but that sum consists of the specie or best paper of the West. The withdrawal of this makes a vacuum, which must be filled by an augmentation of bank paper. This augmentation depreciates and vitiates the currency; this currency the public debtor must take, but the Government will not receive it from him. In addition to those considerations, he said, it should be recollected, that the same quantity of land which would draw from the West $800,000, under the credit, would only take $500,000, under the cash system. Was he not justified in saying that the substitution of the cash system would meliorate the condition of the West? It would enable it to owe less, have fewer banks, and more money.

He said, there was another aspect of the subject entitled to the serious consideration of the real friends of the West. It was the influence which the credit system would give the East over the West. Some of the causes of this influence had been sufficiently explained in considering the other topics of discussion. He hoped gentlemen would recollect them, and make the proper application of them.

He would only add, that a large Western debt would give the Eastern politicians, in a struggle for power, a powerful weapon. It would render it impossible that the West could have a fair and equal contest. It would be the talisman, whose spell, in the hands of dextrous men, might be subjugation or dissolution. Such men would not only have the advantage derived from the debility, languor, and distress, which a large debt would produce in the West, but they could hold the appalling sum in terror over the devoted West, and say pay or submit. Then, said he, might you see enforced the maxim, "Parcere subjectis, debellare superbos." He said he hoped that these consequences would never be realized; but, as a Western man, he was anxious to render their occurrence impossible, and to rescue the West from danger before it might be too late. He said, if he were an Eastern man, and desired supremacy over the West, and labored under such a destitution of principle as to resort to legislative power to effect it, he knew nothing which he would so strongly advocate as the continuance of the credit system. He would make the debt as large as possible. To counteract such policy, he desired the cash bill to pass; and, in advocating it, he felt sure he was vindicating the best interests of the West. He said, let the Western people get out of debt, and leave their posterity free, and then they would have power, and wealth, and independence. Nature had decreed it. They will then preserve their influence, their rank, and their public spirit; they will then move and act in the majesty of their native and characteristic independence; they will be a great, a powerful, and a happy people.

Gentlemen need not fear the march of Western power or of population would be retarded by the cash system. If the view he had taken of the whole subject was correct, the effects of the system would be very different. He could not see how the system would impair the power or diminish the population of the West. Would it impair the strength of the West to get it out of debt, and add to its resources? Or would it diminish or obstruct the current of emigration to the West to offer to the emigrants terms of purchase more advantageous to them and to the country to which they wish to go, than those now offered? Or would it check population to prevent the monopoly of large tracts of good land by speculators, who would not settle on them? He said that, if the cash system would prevent the emigration of any class of citizens to the West, (which he did not believe,) it would be a class that would not be a very valuable accession to the strength, the morals, or wealth of the West; but who would only increase the Western debt, and diminish the real and substantial resources of the Western country.

He said, that the Western country would populate soon enough; men would go there whenever it should be their interest to go. It was not good policy to invite or decoy them there sooner. Let the principle of population and the rules that regulate and control it have their natural operation. Do not endeavor to increase its fecundity or accelerate its results by artificial expedients. It was not desirable to have a mushroom population. Let it grow gradually and naturally, and it will be homogeneous, and happy, and strong. Let the body politic work its own cure, if diseased. There is a recuperative spirit in it, vis medicatrix nature, that will preserve its health and vigor. He did not profess to know much of political pathology, but he thought there could be no doubt that the resources and ultimate power of the West were certain, if its friends would forbear their prescriptions and let things regulate themselves.

H. OF R.

District of Columbia—Tariff Bill.

APRIL, 1820.

Let the population of the West grow on its own natural resources, without the artificial and delusory aid of credit. The surest way to increase an efficient population, which alone will strengthen the resources and power of the West, is to expel luxury and speculation, by stifling their pander, credit, and encourage industry, virtue, and economy. The first step towards this policy is to extricate the West from debt, with all its paraphernalia; to confine its expenditures within its actual means, and make its citizens independent cultivators of the soil, and not the tenants of the speculator or the Government. The cash system, so far as it could operate, would tend to these wholesome results, by distributing the lands in small tracts among the people for their own use, and by frustrating speculation, and preventing monopolies. He expected much good from it; he feared no mischief. He could not perceive any solid objection to it. He hoped, therefore, that it would be adopted.

He had, in a crude and unmethodical manner, he said, offered some of the considerations which would influence his vote. He had endeavored to show that the cash system was required by the fiscal and political interests of the General Government, by the advantages it would afford to the bona fide purchaser, and by the substantial and permanent welfare of the Western country. Whether he had been successful, would appear from the decision of the Committee. Whatever that decision should be, he would be content. He had discharged his duty to himself and his country. If he had erred, he should be supported by the approbation of his conscience, and the clearest convictions of public duty; and he believed he would be sustained by the opinions of his fellow-citizens, and the verdict of posterity. If the bill should pass, he hoped that his friends, who differed with him on this interesting subject, and especially the Speaker, (who would follow him in debate,) might live long enough to witness and to enjoy the benefits which he believed would result from it, not only to the Union and to the poor and actual settler, but to the great interests of the West—to its strength, prosperity, and power, and to the independence and happiness of its people.

When Mr. ROBERTSON concluded, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 19.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to establish the district of Pearl River," reported the same, without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Gabriel Berzat, deceased;" "An act for the relief of the heirs of Edmund McCarthy;" "An act for the relief of Thomas Hunter;" "An act declaring the consent of Congress to certain acts of the Legislature of the State of North Carolina;" "An act for the relief of Ebenezer Stevens and Austin L. Sands, legal representatives of Richardson Sands, deceased, and others;" and "An act authorizing the settlement of the accounts between the United States and Richard O'Brien, late American Consul at Algiers;"—in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said bills were read twice, and referred—the first to the Committee on Private Land Claims, the second to the Committee of Claims, the third to the Committee on Military Affairs, the fourth to the Committee of Commerce, the fifth to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, and the sixth to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom the subject had been referred, reported a bill to enable the inhabitants of the District of Columbia to form a frame of government; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow. The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the inhabitants of the District of Columbia be, and they hereby are, authorized to hold a convention, to determine whether it will be for their benefit to have the rights of self-government extended to them, so far as the same may constitutionally be done; and, if they shall be of such opinion, to form a frame of government, to be submitted to Congress for their approbation.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said convention shall be composed of twelve representatives for the City of Washington, and that part of the county of Washington east of Rock Creek; of eight representatives for the town of Georgetown, and that part of the county west of Rock Creek; and of nine representatives from the town and county of Alexandria. The said representatives to be free white taxable males, inhabitants of said District, above the age of twenty-one years, who shall be chosen by ballot by the free white taxable males, inhabitants of said District, above the age of twenty-one years, on the — day of — next, under the superintendence of such judges, at such place in each of the said towns, and subject to such other directions, as the President of the United States may prescribe.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the persons so chosen shall convene in the City of Washington, at such place as shall be fixed by the President of the United States, on the — day of —, and shall organize themselves by the appointment of a presiding officer, and such other officers as may be necessary. A majority of the members shall constitute a quorum, and their proceedings shall be communicated to the President of the United States, to be by him laid before Congress at their next session.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. JONES, of Virginia, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

APRIL, 1820.

Public Lands.

H. OF R.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to this House his opinion respecting the probable effects which will be produced upon the Revenue, should the bill to regulate the duties on imports, and for other purposes, now pending before this House, be enacted into a law.

This motion, and the proceedings on it, gave rise to a considerable debate.

Mr. BRUSH moved an amendment, (but subsequently withdrawn,) to instruct the Secretary of the Treasury to report to this House when, in his opinion, Congress might be able to terminate the present session.

In the discussion of this motion, some warmth was displayed. In the end—

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to lay the resolution on the table; and the motion was agreed to—yeas 71, nays 67, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Allen of New York, Baker, Bateman, Boden, Campbell, Case, Clark, Crafts, Crawford, Cushman, Dennison, Dewitt, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Fay, Floyd, Folger, Gross of New York, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hall of Delaware, Hazard, Hemphill, Hendricks, Hibshman, Hill, Kendall, Kinsey, Kinsley, Linn, McLean of Kentucky, Marchand, Mason, Meigs, R. Moore, S. Moore, Morton, Parker of Massachusetts, Patterson, Phelps, Pitcher, Plumer, Rich, Richards, Richmond, Rogers, Ross, Russ, Sampson, Sawyer, Sergeant, Smith of New Jersey, Smith of North Carolina, Storrs, Street, Strong of Vermont, Strong of New York, Taylor, Tomlinson, Tompkins, Van Rensselaer, Walker, Wallace, Wendover, Williams of North Carolina, Wood.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Anderson, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour, Bayly, Bloomfield, Brush, Bryan, Buffum, Burwell, Butler of New Hampshire, Butler of Louisiana, Cannon, Clagett, Cobb, Cocke, Cook, Crowell, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Dickinson, Earle, Edwards of N. Carolina, Foot, Fuller, Fullerton, Garnett, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hall of North Carolina, Hardin, Holmes, Hooks, Hostetter, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Little, Livermore, Lyman, McCoy, McCreary, Mallery, Meech, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Virginia, Overstreet, Parker of Virginia, Philson, Pindall, Rankin, Reed, Rhea, Ringgold, Settle, Silsbee, Sloan, Scolumb, B. Smith of Virginia, Stevens, Swearingen, Tracy, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Whitman, and Williams of Virginia.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The House then took up the bill making further provision for the sale of the public lands.

In the further debate which took place on this bill, the main object of the bill (to reduce the price of the public lands from the present price to one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and to abolish credits thereon) was supported and opposed by the following gentlemen: Affirmative—Messrs. ANDERSON, BARBOUR, HARDIN, SLOAN, and STORRS. Negative—Messrs. CLAY, BROWN, BUTLER of Louisiana, COOK, HENDRICKS, JONES of Tennessee, and McLEAN of Kentucky.

Some other gentlemen incidentally engaged in the discussion on amendments, &c.

Mr. SLOAN, of Ohio, spoke as follows—

Mr. Chairman: It is with extreme reluctance that I rise to address you on the present occasion. Unaccustomed to public speaking, I am well aware that I shall fail to express myself in such manner as the importance of the subject requires. Indeed; sir, nothing but the circumstance of my representing a district, in a high degree interested in the decision of the question now under discussion, could have induced me to make the attempt. Sir, I have been a witness of the operations of this credit system, as it is called, ever since the commencement of its existence, and I must be permitted to say, that the evils arising under it have been greatly overrated, and that the results anticipated from its continuance, are not such as are reasonably to be apprehended. On this subject there is, unquestionably, a very great misapprehension. Sir, there is no danger of a dissolution of this Union from allowing the Western people to purchase your lands on credit; I trust I know that people too well to give in to such an opinion. Twenty years' residence among them has convinced me that all such fears may safely be discarded. Nor is the debt, now owing, of such an enormous amount as has been supposed by some gentlemen who have spoken on the subject. They appear to consider the laws which have been passed, from time to time, granting indulgence to purchasers, as applying to the whole debt contracted. This is, indeed, a very great error. The honorable Speaker has calculated that the whole debt owing in the triangle northwest of the Ohio, composed of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and the Territory of Michigan, which will be affected by the law of the present session, will not, perhaps, exceed three hundred thousand dollars. This, calculation, I think, is very likely a correct one, notwithstanding it has been considered as vastly too low by gentlemen who have replied to the Speaker's arguments.

Sir, I have paid some attention to this subject, and, although it is impossible to come at the exact sum, yet I am convinced that the amount is much less than has been supposed—a sum entirely too trifling to excite the alarm which appears to prevail in the case. The whole amount owing, for land purchased in the tract of country to which I have alluded, is something more than seven millions eight hundred thousand dollars—a sum little more than that received from the same district for each of the last four years. But, in order to judge more correctly on this subject, let us examine the forfeitures of the year 1817, one in which no indulgence was given, and we will find that the amount of forfeitures of that year was twenty-seven thousand dollars. From my knowledge on this subject, I know that but a small quantity of the land is sold when exposed to sale for non-payment, but that it reverts to the United States, and is stated in the amount of forfeitures. But suppose that one half of it, in that year, was sold, and the amount not paid for to be $60,000, and even suppose the average of the three last years at double that amount, it would only be $360,000; whilst gentlemen have been treating this question as if they had been from year to year granting indulgence for several millions of dollars, and as though the several laws which have been passed have applied to the same purchasers; when, in fact, all the land purchased prior to the year 1813, has either been paid off or reverted to the United States, and much of that which has been prevented from forfeiture by the laws of 1818 and 1819, has also been paid off, and is daily paying off.

So much, sir, for this vast debt, and the dangers which are apprehended from its accumulation. So much has been said on the subject of the laws granting indulgence, that I will beg leave to examine, very briefly, the history of the present system, and the causes which led to the passage of those laws, and see whether the same objection might not with equal propriety apply to almost every part of our financial system. The law laying the foundation of the present system of disposing of the public lands, was passed in 1800, and, for a considerable time, no lands, except those in the State of Ohio, were brought into market. At this time the currency was sound; we were not then annoyed by banks in every part of the country; every kind of money was then current, and received in payment; commerce was then brisk, and payments were regularly made. This state of things continued without interruption until 1808, when the embargo took place; which prostrated trade, stopped nearly every kind of business, and produced general embarrassment; to this, in 1809, was added the non-intercourse, which continued with little interruption until the declaration of war in 1812. Sensible of the influence of this state of things on those who were indebted to the public, Congress, in 1808, passed a law, extending a credit on a certain description of revenue bonds, and the next year it was extended during the continuance of the embargo.

Having granted this favor to the mercantile class of our citizens, I presume it was considered nothing but fair to extend equal indulgence to the purchasers of public lands, inasmuch as this general embarrassment grew out of measures which the Government considered that the interest and honor of the nation required to be pursued. Accordingly in March, 1809, a law was passed, giving longer time to the purchasers of public lands to complete their payments.

In 1810 a law of a like nature was passed; but, in 1811, no such law passed, and all the lands, the payments for which were due in that year, were either sold or reverted to the United States. In 1812 and 1813, laws similar to those before enacted were passed, with this exception, that those who had availed themselves of former laws, should not be embraced in them. The same provisions were made in the laws which passed in 1814 and 1815. In April, 1815, a law was passed in favor of the purchasers in the Mississippi Territory, but no law was passed in favor of purchasers northwest of the Ohio until 1818; consequently all the lands on which the payments became due in 1816 and 1817 were forfeited. Since which time laws have yearly been passed, applying equally to all parts of the country.

From this view of the subject, it will be perceived that the debt now owing is not of that long standing which some gentlemen have supposed, and that the failure to pay has not arisen out of any disposition, on the part of the purchasers, to rely on the indulgence of the Government, but has been in consequence of the situation of the country, produced by the measures of the Government. It cannot have escaped your recollection that, during the war, and immediately after its termination, the Government experienced very great embarrassment in its fiscal operations; that the credit of the Government was much reduced, and Treasury notes were at a great discount. In this state of things, and with a view to remedy the evil, the Treasury Department submitted propositions to all the banks in the Union, as well those which had received charters of incorporation from the State governments, as those established without authority. These propositions offered to the banks that, in case they would agree to receive and re-issue Treasury notes, the Government would receive their notes in payment for all debts due to the public. Thus it was, that a credit was given to all the banks of the Union, almost equal to a charter granted by this Government. In this state of things many persons became the purchasers of public lands, not doubting but that the notes of State banks would continue to be received in payment. The banking business was not understood by the people at large, and but few persons could anticipate the sudden explosion of that system, which a sudden return to specie payments produced. The purchaser, whose hopes were founded on the prospect of paying for his land in the paper of State banks, was completely disappointed, as few of that description of notes have been, for a great part of the time since the resumption of specie payments, received. Thus situated, it has been found impossible to meet the payments promptly, as they became due.

These sir, are some of the causes which have operated to produce the present state of the debt owing for public lands, but which, I humbly conceive, ought not wholly to be charged to the imperfections of the present system. It has arisen from causes which cannot operate on future purchases, and which, I trust, will never again exist.

Mr. Chairman, I am well satisfied that the present system is a good one, and that the fears entertained of the disastrous consequences are by no means well founded. I have seen one of the most important States in this Union grow up suddenly from the wilderness, under the influence of this system; yet I cannot but feel myself impressed by the strong prejudice that appears to prevail against it. I am well aware that it is believed that the Western people have enjoyed peculiar favors, and that great speculations have been made at the public expense. But let me assure you, sir, that this is not the case, there is but a very small inducement to speculation in public lands; the Government is too large a landholder for any one to come in competition with it. Sir, it is the industry of the Western people which has led to any degree of prosperity which they may be supposed to enjoy. I regret extremely that the Western people should be considered as wishing to live by the bounty of the General Government. I regret that the delegation from the Atlantic section of the Union are so much opposed to the present land laws; and it is this opposition which induces me to consent to the change proposed in this bill. I consider it of importance that all jealousy against the Western country should be allayed; and, as this bill proposes an equivalent for the credit heretofore granted, I may come to a determination to vote for it, and hope it may pass.

Mr. McLEAN, of Kentucky, spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to have detained the Committee on this subject, although an important one, and one on which the prosperity of the Western country much depends. But, as frequent reference has been made to the mode adopted by the Legislature of Kentucky, in disposing of her vacant lands, and the consequences growing out of that, to prove the propriety, or rather the necessity, of passing the bill on your table, and as I represent a part of that section of the State which has been settled under the operation of the Kentucky system, (as it has been called,) and presume I am as well acquainted with the operation of that system as my colleagues who have animadverted upon it, I hope I shall be indulged a few moments on this important subject. Mr. Chairman, what was that system? Before any person was permitted to locate a piece of vacant land, he was required to produce satisfactory proof, to the proper authority, that he was an actual and bona fide settler on the land he wished to enter. If he offered this proof, he was entitled to a certificate for four hundred acres of land, in which was particularly described the land he was settled on; and, upon his paying into the Treasury at the rate of twenty cents per acre, in four annual instalments, he was entitled to a patent for his land, agreeably to his survey made on said certificate.

The Legislature of Kentucky appeared to be more desirous of having the country settled than to make money out of their soil, and their expectations were fully realized. What has been the effect of this system? Owing to the inducements held out to all classes, both rich and poor, by the low price of the land, and the easy terms of payment, together with the excellent quality of the soil, the country settled with a rapidity unexampled. Farms and villages sprang up through the country as if by magic, and a portion of that country is at this time in as high a state of cultivation as any part of the State, and sends to foreign markets as much surplus produce. That country which in '95 was a wilderness, entirely frontier, in which there was scarcely a white man, in 1800 was entitled to one member on this floor; in 1810 to three; and, I have no doubt, at the next apportionment of representation, (unless the ratio is raised,) will be entitled to five.

It may be somewhat surprising, yet it is nevertheless true, that, although the land was sold upon such easy terms, thousands of persons settled on it who were unable to comply with the terms of sale, and the Legislature has been compelled to extend her parental indulgence to them from year to year, and the whole of the debt is not yet extinguished. But, sir, has the State been injured by this lenity? I answer, no; far from it. She has the pleasing reflection of having increased her population and influence, and is now deriving wealth from the labor of her citizens, who are literally sitting under their own vine and fig tree, cultivating their own land, and, by their industry, supporting their families. I am personally acquainted with many persons who were unable to pay for their land when they settled on it, who, by their industry, have raised the means to pay for it out of the land itself, and are now independent, good liver. Under the operation of this law, the settler became a tenant to the State, and, by means of his industry, he paid for his land, and reaped the reward of his labor, by enjoying the advantages of his improvement; whereas, if this land had not been sold upon a credit, he must have become a tenant to an overbearing landlord, and, after making a farm, and valuable improvements for another, he would be compelled to leave it, and go again into the forest. I think there is no man who will say the system adopted by the State of Kentucky was a bad one. My colleagues who are in favor of the bill on your table, say, that the Green river debt has had a pernicious effect on the legislation of the State. I must confess I have never witnessed it, or been under its influence; and I am satisfied neither of my honorable colleagues will be willing to acknowledge that it has caused either of them to do that which they believed to be wrong. Neither am I willing to admit that, if this bill should not be passed, and the old system should be adhered to, that it ever will have an undue influence on the members of this House.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the interest of this nation will be promoted by disposing of the public lands in such a way as to put it in the power of every man, both rich and poor, who wishes to cultivate the soil, to obtain a part of it. If you take care of the poor, and enable them to procure lands, there is no danger of the rich; they can and will take care of themselves. Our Government rests upon the intelligence, independence, and equality of its citizens. All measures which are calculated to keep your citizens on an equality, not only as to personal rights, but as to property, tend to support and preserve your republican institutions; and all measures which are calculated to make the rich richer, and the poor poorer, tend directly to aristocracy. In vain do you say, when a portion of your citizens are rich, and a part of them poor, and dependent on the rich, that they are all upon an equality.

I hope I shall not be understood to say, that the Government ought to deprive a man of that which he has, to give it to the poor; but I do say, that the Government ought to adopt no measure which is calculated to benefit the wealthy part of the community alone, which I conceive the bill on your table will—because it will readily be perceived that no man, under the operation of this law, can procure a title to any of your lands, unless he can advance one hundred dollars. Gentlemen are not aware of the many difficulties which attend moving to, and settling a new country. The expense of travelling is considerable; and a whole year's provisions has to be laid in, and generally at a high price; when this is done, the poor man's funds are exhausted, and he has nothing left to purchase even a half of a quarter section of land. What must he do? He must not only labor to support his family, but labor to pay his landlord for the use of his land. Gentlemen need not tell me that any man who ought to own land can raise 100 dollars. If they were in a situation to see many individuals who move to the Western country, they would change their opinion. Do we not know that many, very many, young persons unite together in marriage, who are not able to purchase the necessary articles for housekeeping and have 100 dollars in cash left to purchase a tract of land? In vain you tell me that this cash system is not for the benefit of the man who has cash, and to the prejudice of the poor man who has it not.

H. OF R.

Public Lands.

APRIL, 1820.

Gentlemen do not reason fairly when they attempt to prove, that it is better to purchase land at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre for cash, than two dollars upon credit. If the present price is too high, reduce it to the price proposed, and then tell me whether it is not easier to purchase land upon the present credit than by paying the whole down, and whether it will not enable many persons to purchase land who will not be able to do so if this bill passes.

Mr. Chairman, if the amendment which I had the honor to offer (which was to permit the person who is settled, or should settle on the land to enter one quarter section on a credit, as heretofore) had prevailed, I would have no objection to the passage of this bill, as it would have encouraged the settlement of the country, and put a stop to that system of speculation which has and will prevail to such an injurious extent. Your best land is generally purchased by speculators who have money, not with a view of cultivating it themselves, but to keep it until the settlement of the country enhances the value, and then sell it to some person at an advanced price. Companies are formed in various parts of the Union, who send their agents to the Western country, who enter whole townships merely with a view of speculation; and thereby the land is taken out of the market until the price shall advance, and the settlement of the country retarded.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have little hopes that this bill will either be amended or be prevented from passing. My colleagues have advanced an argument which I believe to be entirely without foundation, yet, being urged by gentlemen from the West, it will have weight with members of the House, in spite of any thing which can be said against it: I mean the argument, that, if this credit system is permitted to go on, the people of the West will lose their affection for the Government, and the Government will finally lose the money, and the land too. If, indeed, there appeared to be a spirit rising in the West inimical to this Government, it would have been more agreeable to me for it to have been announced by members from other sections of this Union than from the West. But, I will ask, where is the evidence of disaffection towards the Government in the Western country? When has the Government called on this people, either for money or men, and called in vain? I think it would be difficult for any person to point out the instance. I am sure it was not in the last war. We then paid our taxes cheerfully, and, at the beat of the drum, the whole country was ready to rally around the standard of their country. Sir, as it was not my intention to have addressed you on this subject, and as the merits, or rather demerits, of this bill, have been so ably pointed out by the honorable Speaker, I will detain you no longer; but express a hope that the bill will be either amended or rejected by the House.

After the bill had been reported by the Committee of the Whole, a variety of propositions were made to amend it, among which were the following.

The question was taken, by yeas and nays, on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in refusing to strike out the second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth sections of the bill, being that part of the bill which requires the whole payment, on the purchase of a tract of land, to be paid in cash; and the result was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Alexander, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baker, Baldwin, Barbour, Bateman, Bayly, Beecher, Boden, Brush, Burton, Butler of New Hampshire, Campbell, Case, Clagett, Clark, Cocke, Crafts, Crawford, Culbreth, Cushman, Cuthbert, Darlington, Davidson, Dennison, Dickinson, Dowse, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Edwards of North Carolina, Ervin, Fay, Fisher, Floyd, Folger, Foot, Forrest, Fuller, Fullerton, Garnett, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hall of New York, Hall of Delaware, Hall of North Carolina, Hardin, Hemphill, Herrick, Hibshman, Heister, Hill, Holmes, Hooks, Hostetter, Jones of Virginia, Kent, Kinsey, Kinsley, Little, Linn, Livermore, Lowndes, Lyman, Maclay, McCoy, McLane of Delaware, Mallary, Marchand, Mason, Meigs, Mercer, R. Moore, S. Moore, Monell, Morton, Murray, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Newton, Overstreet, Parker of Massachusetts, Parker of Virginia, Patterson, Philson, Pinckney, Pindall, Plumer, Rankin, Reed, Rhea, Rich, Richards, Richmond, Ringgold, Robertson, Rogers, Ross, Russ, Sampson, Sergeant, Settle, Shaw, Silsbee, Simkins, Sloan, Slocumb, Smith of Maryland, B. Smith of Virginia, Smith of North Carolina, Southard, Storrs, Street, Strong of Vermont, Strong of New York, Swearingen, Tarr, Taylor, Terrell, Tompkins, Tracy, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Van Rensselaer, Wendover, Whitman, Williams of Virginia, Williams of North Carolina and Wood—125.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen of Tennessee, Ball, Brown, Bryan, Burwell, Butler of Louisiana, Cannon, Cook, Crowell, Ford, Hendricks, Jones of Tennessee, McCreary, McLean of Kentucky, Metcalf, Nelson of Virginia, Stevens, Trimble, and Tucker of Virginia—19.

Mr. HENDRICKS then moved to amend the bill by adding to the fourth section the following proviso:

“And provided, further, That the actual settler of the soil shall be entitled to the privilege of making payment for his land, if the same shall not exceed one hundred and sixty acres, in instalments, agreeably to the present credit system, as to time of payment, and forfeiture; which settlement shall be ascertained and determined agreeably to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe."

And, the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. McLEAN, of Kentucky, moved to amend the bill by inserting after the word office, where it occurs for the last time in the second section, the following words:

"Unless he shall produce satisfactory proof to the register of the public lands that he is an actual and bona fide settler, with his family, on the lands proposed to be entered; and shall, also, make oath, that he has not previously entered any other lands belonging to the United States; then the said person shall be entitled to enter one quarter section, including his said settlement, upon credit, as heretofore."

And, the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. COOK moved to amend the bill by striking out the second section, and, in lieu thereof, to insert the following:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of July next, credit shall not be allowed for the purchase money on the sale of any of the public lands sold at public sale, but every purchaser of land, which may be sold thereafter at public sale, shall, on the day of purchase, make complete payment therefor; and if any person, being the highest bidder at public sale, for a tract of land, shall fail to make payment therefor on the day on which the same was purchased, the tract shall be again offered at public sale, on the next day of sale, and such person shall not be capable of becoming the purchaser of that or any other tract of land at such public sales. And from and after the period aforesaid, whenever the purchaser of any of the public land, at private sale, shall, at the time of making such purchase, make complete payment therefor, the price shall be one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre: Provided, however, That this provision shall not be so construed as to prevent the purchase upon credit, as heretofore, at private sale."

And, the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. SCOTT moved to amend the bill by inserting therein two new sections, to come in as the fifth and sixth sections thereof, to wit:

"SEC. 5. Be it enacted, &c., That every person, or the legal representatives of every person, who has actually inhabited and cultivated, and who now resides upon any tract of land lying in any district established for the sale of public lands, which tract is not rightfully claimed by any other person, such person, so residing as aforesaid, or his legal representatives, shall be entitled to a preference in becoming the purchaser from the United States of such tract of land, at private sale, upon the same terms and conditions, in every respect, as have heretofore been provided by law for the sale of other lands sold at private sale: Provided, That no more than one quarter section of lands shall be sold to any one individual in virtue of this act, and the same section shall be bounded by the sectional and divisional lines run, or to be run, according to law: Provided, also, That no lands reserved from sale by former acts, or lands which have been directed to be sold in town lots, shall be sold under this act.

"SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, That every person claiming a preference in becoming the purchaser of a tract of land in virtue of this act, shall make known his claim by delivering a notice, in writing, to the register of the land office for the district in which the land may be, wherein he shall particularly designate the quarter section he claims; which notice the register shall file in his office, on receiving twenty-five cents from the person delivering the same. And, in every case where it shall appear to the satisfaction of the register and receivers of public moneys of the land office that any person, who has delivered his notice of claim, is entitled, according to the provisions of this act, to a preference in becoming the purchaser of a quarter section of land, such person, so entitled, shall have a right to enter the said quarter section, or half thereof, with the register of the land office, on producing his receipt from the receiver of public moneys for at least one-twentieth part of the purchase money, as in case of other lands sold at private sale: Provided, That all lands to be sold under this act, which shall not have been previously exposed to public sale, shall be entered with the register at least two weeks before the time which may be appointed for the commencement of the public sale thereof. And every person, having a right of preference in becoming the purchaser of a tract of land, who shall fail to make his entry with the register within the time prescribed, his right shall be forfeited, and the land by him claimed shall be offered at public sale with the other public lands in the district to which it belongs."

And, the question being taken to agree to amend the bill by inserting these sections, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. CROWELL then moved to add to the bill the following section:

"And be it further enacted, That where any person has heretofore purchased more than one quarter section of land, or more than one fractional quarter section, and has not made complete payment therefor, such person shall be permitted to surrender to the register of the land office of the district in which such purchase or purchases have been made, any of the quarter sections, or fractional quarter sections, which he or she may have purchased; and the sum or sums which such person may have paid upon the land so surrendered, shall be carried to his or her credit upon those quarter sections, or fractional quarter sections, which he or she may choose to retain; and the land so surrendered shall be considered as reverted to the United States, and shall be disposed of, in all respects whatever, like other reverted or forfeited lands."

And, the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, moved that the bill be amended by adding thereto the following section:

"And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act shall not extend to the State of Louisiana, but the public lands within that State shall be disposed of according to the laws now in force."

And, the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

And the bill was then ordered to be read a third time to-morrow, without amendment, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 20.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for the expense of surveying certain parts of the coast of North Carolina, and for other purposes," reported the same without amendment; and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the Senate's bill authorizing the designation of the boundary between the States of Indiana and Illinois, reported the same without amendment, and then moved that the same be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. COOK, with a view to acting indefinitely on the bill, moved to lay the same on the table; but the motion was negatived.

Mr. HENDRICKS then opposed the indefinite postponement of the bill, and Mr. ANDERSON advocated it; when,

On motion of Mr. WOODBRIDGE, the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill to establish land offices in the State of Alabama, reported the same with amendments, embracing the establishment of a land office in Indiana; and the bill and amendments were referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRUSH, from the Committee on the Expenditures in the War Department, to whom was referred the subject of the loan of gunpowder, by the officers of the War Department, to Stull and Williams, made report thereon; which was ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act to provide relief for sick and disabled seamen," and "An act granting to the State of Ohio the right of pre-emption to certain quarter sections of land," in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill for regulating the manner of settling the accounts of the several deputy surveyors in the Missouri and Arkansas Territories passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Committee of the Whole took up for consideration the several bills concerning land offices; and, having risen and made report thereon—

The amendment to the bill for the establishment of additional land offices in the State of Illinois, was read; and,

On motion of Mr. COOK, the bill was recommended to the Committee on Public Lands.

Amendments reported to the bill to designate the boundaries of districts and establish land offices for the disposal of the public lands not heretofore offered for sale in the States of Alabama and Indiana, were read, and part concurred in and part disagreed to by the House; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

The bill from the Senate, "to establish additional land offices in the State of Alabama," was ordered to lie on the table, the provisions of it having been comprised in the bill above mentioned to establish additional land offices in Illinois.

Mr. BRUSH moved that the House do now proceed to the consideration of the resolution, submitted by him on the 23d February last, to inquire into the expediency of ascertaining the northern boundary of the State of Ohio; which motion was rejected by the House.

Mr. COBB moved that the House do now proceed to the consideration of the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, and to repeal the several acts heretofore passed for that purpose;" which motion was also rejected by the House.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: "An act to provide relief for sick and disabled seamen," and "An act granting to the State of Ohio the right of pre-emption to certain quarter sections of land," were severally read twice, and referred—the first to the Committee of Ways and Means, and the second to the Committee on the Public Lands.

THE MILITIA.

The bill to provide for clothing the militia when called into the service of the United States; the bill to establish a uniform mode of discipline and field exercise for the militia of the United States; and the bill from the Senate "to provide for clothing the Army of the United States in domestic manufactures," passed through a Committee of the Whole, and were reported to the House.

The first of these bills being taken up—

Mr. MERCER moved to amend it by striking out that part of the first section which provides that the militia, who may hereafter be called into the service of the United States, "shall, in addition to the pay and emoluments heretofore allowed by law, be entitled to and receive the value of a full suit of clothing, in all cases where they shall perform a six months' tour of duty, and furnish themselves with clothing sufficient for said term of service; and in all cases where they shall be called on for a shorter period, or shall be discharged from the service before the expiration of the time for which they had been required, they shall be entitled to receive such proportion of the value of a suit of clothing as may be equal to the time they may have been in service;" and, in lieu thereof, to insert a provision that any one who takes the field for a tour of duty of not less than six months, shall, in addition to the pay and emoluments heretofore allowed by law, be entitled to and receive each a full suit of uniform, including a blanket, &c.

This amendment was, together with the bill, ordered to lie on the table.

The amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole to the bill to establish a uniform mode of discipline and field exercise for the militia was taken up; when,

Mr. FOOT moved to amend the bill by striking out the second section, which provides "that so much of the act of Congress, approved the 8th of

This motion was negatived, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill from the Senate, for changing the mode of disposing of the public lands, was then read a third time; and on the question, "Shall the bill pass?" the vote was—For the passage of the bill 133, against it 23, as follows:

CLOTHING FOR THE ARMY.

The Senate's bill to provide for clothing the Army of the United States in domestic manufactures was taken up.

Unsuccessful motions were made to lay it on the table, and postpone it to the first day of May.

Among other motions to amend the bill was one by Mr. HOLMES, to strike out the proviso, that the domestic goods can be procured at the same prices as goods of the same kind and quality of foreign manufacture.

This motion gave rise to considerable debate, and was at length decided by yeas and nays—85 to 73, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Baker, Baldwin, Beecher, Boden, Brown, Brush, Campbell, Case, Clark, Cook, Cushman, Darlington, Dennison, Dewitt, Dickinson, Eddy,

Mr. FLOYD then, with a view to ascertain what premium was to be paid for goods of domestic manufacture, beyond the price at which articles of the same quality of foreign fabric could be purchased, moved to insert in the bill a proviso, that no contract should be made for goods, nor any goods purchased for the clothing of the Army, at a price more than ten per cent. above that at which articles of the same quality imported from a foreign country could be purchased.

Mr. KINSEY moved to amend the bill by inserting "five" per cent. instead of "ten" per cent.

Mr. FLOYD accepted the amendment as a modification of his own motion.

The question on Mr. FLOYD's motion was then taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative—82 to 78, as follows:

The amendments were then ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time to-morrow.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, moved that the House do now proceed to consider the resolution from the Senate, "proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as it respects the choice of Electors of the President and Vice President of the United States, and the election of Representatives in the Congress of the United States."

Mr. SMITH addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman, the resolution before us is one of more than ordinary importance. It proposes nothing less than to amend that instrument which, to every American, must be considered the palladium of his liberty—the Constitution of the United States—and a part of it, too, which the citizen of a Republic should esteem far the most valuable and important—I mean that part which regulates the elective franchise.

Sir, I am aware of the ground on which I stand. I am aware of the magnitude of the subject before me. That the people of these States have for this instrument the most devoted attachment and profound reverence, must be obvious to the most superficial observer. They view it as the most noble work of their ancestors, and every attempt that may be made to alter or amend it, will excite distrust and jealousy.

But, sir, every day's experience teaches us the frailty and imperfection of all human productions. When we take a retrospective view of the works of man, we cannot deny the vast improvements that have been made in science, in the mechanics, and in every department of human industry. We look back with astonishment at the vague and visionary theories that were, in their day, considered the most happy efforts of human genius. Although I believe that this Constitution surpasses all other constitutions, as far as the sun does in splendor the smallest star in the heavens, yet I am compelled to believe that it is capable of amendment. I am not one of those that believe that our fathers had more virtue and talents than the present generation. I admire the political sagacity of the wise men who framed the Constitution of the United States; and if there is any thing about it that excites surprise, it is, that the work should have been at that day made as perfect as it is. When we view that thing called a great man at a distance he appears to us as a giant, but as you approach him, you find him dwindle down to a pigmy; like the distant horizon, he appears above us, although we may occupy a point much more elevated than the one to which our eyes are directed.

In reconciling the various and conflicting interests of thirteen States, dissimilar in climate, population, and extent of territory, the conventionalists had a difficult task to perform; and, being themselves conscious that the instrument would require amendment, they provided a way by which it might be amended in part, without submitting the whole to the discretion of a convention.

If the proposition before you proposed the adoption of a new principle, I should be ready to shrink from so pernicious and dangerous an undertaking. But such is not the fact. It only goes to regulate established principles, and to place them upon a ground more congenial with the true spirit and genius of a republican government.

Nearly all the States in the Union have exercised the privilege of the elective franchise, at some one period, in the way now pointed out in the resolution on your table.

This amendment proposes that each State shall be laid out into as many districts as such a State shall be entitled, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, to elect Representatives to Congress, and that each district shall, as nearly as can, be composed of contiguous territory, and the same district shall elect one Elector to vote for President of the United States and for Vice President. The other two Electors to which each State shall be entitled, shall be elected by the States, in such manner as the Legislature thereof shall direct.

I am aware that we shall be told that this Constitution does not require any amendment; that it is good enough, and that under it the people have enjoyed, to the fullest extent, their liberty; that it has guided us through peace and war for thirty-two years past; and that, under it, the nation has grown great and powerful. This is true, and the reason for it may be sought and found in the people themselves. Such a brave, high-minded, and virtuous people, unhackneyed in the intrigues and vices of foreign countries and foreign courts, could have gotten on almost without the form of a written constitution.

And it is true that, at this day, when all is calm and tranquil as the morning, when there are no parties in hostile array against each other; that the reasonings that would in other days, and at other times of party rage and violence, have had great influence and effect on the minds of men, have now but little or no effect. And it will be contended, no doubt, by those that are opposed to any amendment, that if there is ever a necessity of amending this instrument, the day is very remote.

Sir, we all view danger at a great distance from us with perfect indifference; but the most hardy amongst us begin to feel its effects as it approaches

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

near to us. Nothing can constitute a more important quality in a statesman than that he should have political sagacity to see danger threatening his country at a distance, and skill to provide before its approach the means of averting it. If, then, there is any defect to be found in this instrument, why should we not apply the remedy at this time? Do gentlemen expect that a more favorable moment ever can present itself?

As before hinted, there was a time when many of the States in this Union acted on the plan now proposed from their own sense of propriety. But as soon as parties of different political characters began to spring up, and when the two great contending parties that have for some years past agitated the minds of the people so much, had formed themselves under their respective leaders, and had put themselves in hostile array against each other; and when the contest for power and ascendancy was yet doubtful, each party, anxious to augment its scope of influence, lost no opportunity to make every thing yield that could be made to yield, to their ambitious views. When it was ascertained that one party had a few hundred votes of a majority in a State, that party would resort to that mode of electing Electors that would promise most effectually to stifle the voice of the minority, and at the same time give the greatest majority in favor of the dominant party. No other considerations than these seemed to have had any influence on the minds of the respective leaders throughout that arduous struggle. But now, when things have resumed their usual channel, and when the minds of men are left free, and can be acted upon by reason and a sense of justice and propriety, why should we not consider coolly and dispassionately whether this amendment might not with safety be made?

In changing from one system to another, for the purposes just enumerated, great heat and confusion was often generated. The State of Pennsylvania, in one of those great struggles, came very near losing her entire vote; the Legislature was nearly equally divided, and the contest doubtful: in that case each party had to make the best bargain that they could. Now, in a struggle of this kind, the voice of the people was not heard, nor their wishes consulted. The leaders of each party were doing, in fair bargain and sale, the best they could for their own interest, together with that of their friends; and we must calculate upon more than the ordinary scope of human imperfection will justify, if we may not suppose that the state of things will again occur, and continue to recur, so long as it shall be left in the power of the State Legislatures to change from one mode to another, as their interest may dictate at the moment.

Massachusetts, at one time, for the purpose of effecting her purpose in the Presidential election, divided herself into districts to suit the sectional residence of the dominant party: districts were made of territory not contiguous; towns were added that were in parts of other districts. I remember, the shape of those districts were so singular that they gave to them the name of Gerrymanders, and called the new mode of districting Gerrymandering.

The State of New Jersey elected by general ticket; but, just before a Presidential election, the Legislature of the State met, and finding that if the electors were chosen by general ticket the vote would not be such as would please them, they repealed the law, and at once proceeded to take the power into their own hands, and chose such from among themselves as promised to serve their views. Can there be stronger evidence than this of the defect of such a system? In this case the people of New Jersey had no more to do in that election, and their voice was as little heard, as was that of the citizens of Canada. At the time of voting for Representatives the voter never dreamed of such a result; he supposed that, at the proper time, he would again give his vote for electors.

Sir, these are so many avenues left open to intrigue, fraud, and corruption, and if they are not made the common passways of the day, it is because the inducements to travel them are at this time not sufficiently strong.

The chief Executive office of this great and growing Republic is a very important one. An office of great trust and of great patronage; and so guarded should the road to that office be, that none should pass thereto without being able to show a passport from the people themselves—from a majority of all the people. But, sir, under the present system, it is possible, by a species of league, of bargain and sale, to place a person in this high office, who shall only have the votes of three-tenths of the people, contrary to the wishes and the interests of seven-tenths of the people of the United States.

I will, to make myself understood, illustrate this in this way: Suppose that the parties that we have had in this country still existed, and were known by the same names of Federalists and Republicans, and that the parties in each of the States of Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and North Carolina, should be equal, or nearly so, to the Federalists; having a very small majority in each State: now, by the general ticket plan, or by the plan of electing electors by the Legislature, each of these States can give the whole number to which they are entitled for the Federal candidate.

The number of Senators in the twenty-two States is 44; the number of Representatives is 186—making, in all, 230; which would be the whole number of votes given for a President: a majority of 230 is 116, which happens to be exactly the number of votes to which the five States above mentioned are entitled. Now, suppose that every man in the seventeen States not mentioned, should be republican, and nearly one half of the five States enumerated republican also, does it not appear clearly that seven-tenths are defeated by three-tenths of the people?

Again, the census of 1810 gave the population of the United States at 7,500,000. The five large States have one half of that number, say 3,750,000; now, as the federal majority was a bare majority in these States, there will be only in these States 1,870,000 Federalists who will have elected the President, to the exclusion of a candidate having the united voice of seventeen States, and almost a majority of the other five, and against the voice of 6,630,000 of the people.

This is actual demonstration; there is no deception in it. Is it, then, a good system that can admit of such abuses as might thus be practised? That the majority shall rule is the vital principle of all Republics. But, sir, that principle does not seem to be secured by the present mode. But gentlemen will say that this is an extreme case, not likely to occur. I admit that it is an extreme case, and, though it might not occur exactly in the form here pointed out, yet it may occur, with some modification, and the effect would be about the same.

May not the day come when such attempts may be made? Sir, we have seen, during the short existence of this Republic, attempts made to subvert the very spirit and meaning of the Constitution, and in regard to the election of Chief Magistrate too. I allude to the first election of Mr. Jefferson. Aaron Burr was run at the same time for Vice President, and the number of votes was equal. The Constitution was not sufficiently definite on that subject; no distinction was required in the votes, and the friends of Burr contended that his claim was equal to that of Mr. Jefferson to the Presidency; and the House of Representatives had to proceed to ballot, according to the mode pointed out in the Constitution, for a President, and it was not until thirty-six separate and distinct ballotings had taken place that a choice was made. Now, sir, in that case it was notorious that not one man had voted for Burr with the view of making him President. But if that defect had been pointed out previous to that time, the advocates for the Constitution, without any amendment, would have cried out that it was an extreme case, and not likely to occur.

The people learn from experience. No sooner did this occurrence take place than the people did resolve to amend the Constitution, so as to guard in future against such occurrences and such abuses. One of the strong arguments used against the proposed amendment is, that it is interfering with State rights. The large States may be deprived of some of their power and influence in the General Government, and States are like individuals; they dislike to part with any portion of their power. It is to be regretted that there should have been such a want of equality in the size and population of the States. If they had been about the same size we would have but little State jealousy compared with what we have at this day, and the only method that I can discover to remedy this evil is by adopting the amendment proposed. At this day it is the interest of the large States, they contend, to retain all this influence. It is true that the large States may, by a kind of bargaining, obtain some more than a due proportion of the offices of the General Government; but this is but little calculated to make the condition of the great mass of the people happy. It may suit the views of a few aspiring men.

But it is at all times difficult to persuade men that they have in their hands more than a due proportion of power and influence; or, if you can make them sensible that they do possess more than a due proportion of weight in the affairs of the State or Union, yet it will be by far more difficult to get them to abandon it. Of this we have constant examples; and here permit me to notice one or two. In North Carolina, that tract of country immediately on the seaboard and for some distance back, was, in the first settlement of the country, laid out into small counties; and the tract of country back, toward the mountains, was laid out into counties of a much larger extent of territory. The Constitution of the State gives to each county one Senator and two Representatives. The effect of this is to give a preponderance in the Legislature to the eastern portion of the State. Although the number of the population in the western counties is almost double, this cannot be altered without a convention, and a convention cannot be called without the consent of the Legislature. Now, sir, attempts have been made to call a convention, from time to time, but in vain. The people cry out for county rights, and, although every man of candor must admit that they are enjoying more than an equal proportion of the power and influence of the State, yet, so sweet is power, that they hold on with the iron grasp of death. I believe that Virginia is in the same situation, and equally without a remedy.

Mr. Chairman, nothing can be more true than that all the citizens of a State should enjoy equal privileges, and that mutual concession and good will should exist in all its parts; but this never can be the case if one portion, by a forced construction of the written compact under which they live, are always endeavoring to exercise powers that, in justice, are not their own, and which belong to another portion in part.

Sir, the proposed amendment will not affect the rights of the States; the federative principle is preserved. There was not any part of the Constitution, in its formation, that was so difficult to fix upon as the part relative to the election of a Chief Executive Magistrate. At one time it was proposed to elect the President directly by the people, on the popular principle; that was objected to (if I am correctly informed) on the ground that the federative principle should likewise be preserved; that the Chief Magistrate would preside over the States, in their federal character, as well as over the people; and that to elect by the people directly would destroy that important feature, which it was thought to be important to preserve. It was proposed, in the next place, that the President should be elected by the joint vote of both Houses of Congress; and this proposition was adopted under the belief that, in that form, the federative and popular principle would be preserved; and it remained fixed and determined until near the rise of the Convention, when doubts began to arise whether the Congress was the proper body to elect the Chief Magistrate. Those that doubted the policy of confiding to that body this important trust, contended that, from the acquaintance and intimacy that would exist between the President and the members of Congress, they might be biased in their judgment towards the incumbent of the Executive chair. But no objection was made to the principle on which such a choice could be founded. It was determined, then, to give to each State in the Union a right to choose as many persons as such State should have Representatives and Senators in the Congress of the United States, who, when thus chosen, should, by ballot, in their respective States, choose a Chief Magistrate.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

This mode combined the popular and the federative principle, and guarded against the objections of bias that were brought against the Legislature, as the Electors thus chosen would be strangers to the Chief Magistrate, and would be most likely to make a correct and impartial choice. The Convention, after due deliberation, adopted this form, and it became a part of the Constitution.

The mode being fixed, the next thing was to provide, in the event of two or more candidates having an equal number of votes, who or what body should decide the contest. It was first proposed that the Senate should, by ballot, decide; but this was objected to, because this would be making the President on the federal principle entirely. It was then proposed that the House of Representatives should decide; this was objected to, on the ground that it would be making the choice solely on the popular principle; but to avoid this objection, it was moved that the House should ballot by States, each State having one vote, which would combine both principles; and in this form it was agreed to.

I have used this to prove that the Convention, throughout, were determined to guard against the encroachments of the States on one hand, and of the people on the other; and that the amendment proposed is no violation of first principles.

Sir, adopt the proposed amendment, and you will give the people a fair opportunity of being heard in the choice of that important officer—the Chief Magistrate of the Union. The majority and the minority in the respective States will have a fair opportunity of being heard. If there are political parties, they can be fairly heard; if the contest is about men, and if there are no political parties, a fair expression of the public mind can be had. It will guard and protect the people against intriguing and designing men. They will not be able to carry their influence into every county and neighborhood in a large State; but they can into those assemblies called caucuses, which are gotten up about the seats of the State Legislatures, during their sessions. If you will adopt the proposed amendment, and the States should ratify it, which I am confident they will, the people will not want from the State Legislatures a caucus to say who shall be electors. They will be able, in their respective districts, to choose a man with whom they are acquainted, on whose intelligence and virtue they can rely, for the choice of a Chief Magistrate. You will bring the election near to the people, and, consequently, you will make them place more value on the elective franchise, which is all-important in a republican form of Government.

As to the modes of election now practised, they are equally exceptionable. If the Legislature elect the electors, you are heaping on them duties foreign to their duties as State legislators; and by this mode you make your system more complex. When the citizen is about to vote for a fit person to represent him in the State Legislature, he must recollect also that the same person is authorized to vote for electors, who, when thus chosen, has a right to vote for a Chief Magistrate. The members, when they convene at their Legislatures, will then have their caucus; and a fair opportunity is offered for intrigue; they will make the electors from their own body, calculated to serve their own views. If the election is by general ticket, the Legislature indirectly elect the electors. They form a caucus, and make out a ticket to suit the dominant party in that State, with as many names on it as the State is entitled to choose electors; and this is sent out to the people. Now, sir, this, in fact, is electing the electors; for the subsequent voting by the people, whatever may be said of it, is a mere form, the "shadow of a shade." For, sir, if the ticket displeases a great portion of the State, yet they cannot well alter it. Who can resist this tremendous caucus recommendation? If there are political parties in the State, the voice of the minority is entirely stifled by this system. And is this the system that will secure State rights; that system with which gentlemen are so delighted?

Sir, let the people have the election brought near to them, unmixed with other elections, that they may know what they are doing when they give in their votes. Do not be fearful of trusting them with what belongs to themselves. They are honest, and it only remains for them to know what is right, and they will do what is right.

But, sir, some say that this is an election that the people do not attend—one that they care but little about; that they care but little whether you elect the Chief Magistrate of the United States in one or the other modes mentioned. If this be true, it is only where you have made the system so complicated that the people do not comprehend it, that they are indifferent about it.

I recollect that when the Legislature of the State from which I come, at a period not very remote, thought proper to take from the people the right of choosing their electors in the accustomed way, by districts, and took the election into their own hands, that it produced a state of excitement never equalled in that State.

The people viewed it as a flagrant encroachment on their rights. This took place when party spirit run high, and at a time when the Republican party were threatened with an overthrow, and the advocates contended that it was a matter of expediency; that in that way alone the Republican party could give their full weight in the then approaching Presidential election; and that the measure was republican. But, sir, this would not appease the wrath of a people that considered themselves deprived of an important right. If this be your republicanism, said they, away with it. You have deprived us of the right of exercising one of our most important political rights, and a privilege that we deem sacred; no apology will or can be received. And, sir, they displaced most of the supporters of this measure with a high hand.

Sir, it is well to cherish this high-minded spirit in the people, and to impress on their minds the value and importance of these high privileges.

Mr. Chairman, if this amendment shall prevail, and be ratified by the States, your President will be the choice of a majority of the whole people of the United States. He will be chosen for his virtue and intelligence, and not because he may be most likely to bestow his favors on a few conspicuous persons in a few of the large States. He will sit easy in his place, conscious that the people are on his side. He will remember that he derived his support from every portion of the Union, and will have an eye to the interest of the whole Union. The large States will be deprived of the power of combining and bargaining for the high offices of the General Government. Sectional feelings will, in some degree, be broken down, and union and harmony will be effectually preserved.

Sir, if ever there be a time when a subject of this kind can be acted on with propriety, it is now. The question can be put to the States when all is tranquil; when there is no party feeling to distort and sway the minds of men. It is a time when the subject can receive a candid and dispassionate examination, and a time when men of all parties can mingle in the discussion without jealousy or suspicion.

The States will not be surprised at the passage of the resolution on your table. The subject is not new to them: the States of North Carolina, New Jersey, New York, Massachusetts, Vermont, Virginia, and Pennsylvania, and some others that I do not recollect, have all given their consent, by their respective legislatures, to the proposed amendment.

And the Senate of the United States have passed this resolution the second time. Should all this have no weight with us? It is only for us to put the question to the States, and, if they reject it, then it is at an end.

And let it be remembered that we do not possess all the power on the subject of amending the Constitution of the United States. That instrument provides another method, or way, by which it may be amended. Two-thirds of the States have the power to demand of us a convention for that purpose, and we have no power to refuse such a demand.

Now, sir, is it not better for us to propose to amend the Constitution in a single point than to be forced, by the States, to call a convention, which, when convened, will have the power to make the whole instrument pass in review? Sir, I think there are but few amongst us, that are willing to submit that instrument to the hands of any set of men at this day. I mean the whole instrument.

Sir, I am done. I thank the Committee for their attention whilst I have endeavored to submit the few reasons which induce me to give the vote which I shall give on this subject. The remarks that I have submitted have been very desultory. I had not thought of speaking on this subject before a day or two past, and I should not have troubled you at this time, but from a belief that some person should bring up the subject; and knowing, as I do, that the State that I in part represent has felt some interest on this subject, I felt it somewhat my duty to call the attention of the Committee to it; believing that, when the subject was brought before them, that it was one that would call to its aid gentlemen of more ability and experience than myself.

Mr. SMITH's motion was rejected by the House. The House then adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 21.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of Ambrose Vasse; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to increase the allowance of the judges of the orphans' court in the counties of Washington and Alexandria," reported the same without amendment, and it was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. KENT moved that the House do now proceed to consider the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, and to repeal all other acts heretofore passed for that purpose;" which motion was rejected by the House.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for clothing the Army of the United States in domestic manufactures, and for other purposes," was read the third time, and passed as amended.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to establish an uniform mode of discipline and field exercise for the militia of the United States," was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill, regulating the manner of settling the accounts of the several deputy surveyors in the Missouri and Arkansas Territories, was read the third time, and rejected.

An engrossed bill, to designate the boundaries of districts, and establish land offices for the disposal of the public lands, not heretofore offered for sale in the States of Alabama and Indiana, was read the third time; and, on motion of Mr. LINN, it was Ordered, That the said bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill authorizing the sale of thirteen sections of land in Canton district, in the State of Ohio, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Thomas L. Ogden, and others; an act to authorize the building of a certain number of small vessels of war;

an act for the relief of Matthew McNair; an act for the relief of Thomas Leiper; and an act confirming the proceedings of the inhabitants of the village of Cahokia, in the State of Illinois, in laying out a town on the commons of said village: in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bills reported by the Committee of Manufactures, and the Committee determined to take up, first in order, the bill "to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes." This bill proposes changes in relation to the duties on goods imported, in the proportions which are denoted in the following table, copied from that compiled and printed for the use of the House of Representatives:

A comparative view of the existing Tariff of Duties on goods imported from foreign countries as established by the act of 27th April, 1816, entitled "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," as amended by the act of the 20th of April, 1818, entitled "An act to increase the duties on certain manufactured articles imported in the United States," and that proposed by the bill now depending in the House of Representatives of the United States, "to regulate the duties on imports and for other purposes."

The bill having been read through—

Mr. BALDWIN, of Pennsylvania, said:—In presenting this bill to the consideration of the House, it is proper that the views of the Committee of Manufactures should be fully explained. The task assigned to them has been one of no ordinary interest: the subjects on which it has been their duty to act may have an important bearing on the whole internal policy of this Government; and the measures recommended are such as, in their opinion, will essentially benefit the nation. In ma-
